THE LORD PRESIDENTS.

XII.—ROBERT DUNDAS OF ARNISTON.

The subject of our portrait was Lord President of the Court of Session from 1748 to 1753. One of his sons, also Robert Dundas, occupied the Presidential Chair from 1760 to 1787, and no family has contributed a greater number of illustrious names to the roll of Scots lawyers than has the family of Dundas of Arniston. Sir James Dundas of Arniston, the grandfather of the first Lord President Dundas, was a Judge of the Court of Session from 1662 to 1666, when he resigned rather than sign a declaration abjuring the National and Solemn League and Covenant. His son, Robert Dundas, was appointed a Senator of the College of Justice in 1689, and held that office till his death in 1726.

Robert Dundas was born in 1685, and admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1709. Success at the Bar came to him rapidly, and he had not to wait long for office. In 1717 he was appointed Solicitor-General under Sir David Dalrymple as Lord Advocate, and though he held the subordinate position, he enjoyed, more than his official superior, the confidence of the Duke of Roxburghe, then Secretary for Scotland, and the other members of the Government.

When Solicitor-General Dundas on one occasion got into trouble with the Judges of the Court of Justiciary. Having been summoned to London he appointed an advocate-depute, conferring on him full powers to carry on all actions on his behalf before the Civil and Criminal Courts, and generally to do everything appertaining to his office which he might have done if personally present. The Bench objected to the appointment on the ground that the Solicitor-General had no power to appoint a depute to appear for him in Court, and Dundas finally wrote to his depute, Robert Craigie, afterwards Lord President, that though the decision of the Judges had been taken without thinking, the point was not one it was worth disputing about. In 1720, Dalrymple resigned and Dundas became Lord Advocate. Two years later he entered Parliament as Member for Midlothian. His tenure of office terminated in 1725, when the Walpole Ministry was formed, and Duncan Forbes of Culloden became Lord Advocate. In opposition Dundas was closely associated with the Duke of Roxburghe. He resumed his practice at the Bar, and held from 1721 to 1736 the office of Dean of Faculty. He acted as leading counsel for the defence in the trial of James Carnegie of Finhaven for the murder of the Earl of Strathmore. The case, which was tried in 1728, was notable not only for its own circumstances, but as being the occasion on which the right of a jury to return verdicts of "guilty" or "not guilty" as against verdicts of "proven" or "not proven" was vindicated. Carnegie was found "not guilty."

In 1737 Dundas was appointed a Judge of the Court of Session, and in 1748 he was elevated to the office of Lord President, which he held till his death in 1753. Lord Woodhouselee wrote of him: "He shone equally as a powerful pleader and an ingenious reasoner. His eloquence, though as various as the nature of the case required, was consequently subservient to his judgment; and though master of all the powers of expression, he rarely indulged in what is properly termed declamation. As a judge he distinguished himself no less by the vigour of his talents and his knowledge of the law than by his strict principles of honour and inflexible integrity."

One of the sons of the Lord President was, as already stated, one of his successors in the office of Lord President. Another was the Right Hon. Henry Dundas, First Viscount Melville. One of his grandsons, a son of the second Lord President, was Lord Advocate from 1789 to 1801, and thereafter for eighteen years Lord Chief Baron of Exchequer.

Three important changes in Scottish legal procedure have been proposed during the vacation which has just closed. They deal with the House of Lords, the Court of Session, and the Sheriff Courts respectively. In the first two instances the measures legalising the proposed changes have been carried through. In regard to the third, the Sheriff Courts, a Bill to regulate procedure there has been read a first time in the House of Commons. In another column an outline is given of the main features of the Bill. In regard to appeals to the House of Lords, questions were asked some time ago in Parliament as to the period of two years which is allowed in the ordinary case before a judgment of the Court of Session becomes final. In England an appeal to the House of Lords must be taken within a year, but Scottish appeals were regulated by sect. 25 of the Act 6 George IV. cap. 120, which allows an appeal to be presented any time within two years. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Advocate both expressed a view in favour of shortening the period, and on the 6th inst. the standing orders of the House were amended so as to reduce the period during which appeals must be taken from the Court of Session to the House of Lords, to one year instead of two as formerly. The change is one which will be generally approved, as one year is amply sufficient time for deliberation as to the advisability of appealing, and the possibility of an appeal often subjects a successful litigant in the Court of Session to an unnecessarily long period of uncertainty as to the ultimate result. In the ordinary case appeals are generally presented within a few months of the judgment, but within recent years there have been several instances of appeals being taken almost at the end of the two years allowed. For example, the appeal in the case of Macdougall v. Nisbet, reported in our issue of this week, was taken only seven days before the expiry of the two years. Procedure in the Court of Session has been in many respects materially altered and improved by the Act of Sederunt of date 30th March, which having lain on the table of both Houses of Parliament for thirty-six days, and not having been objected to, has now become a binding enactment to be read as part of the Court of Session Act 1868. Section 106 of that Act gave the Court of Session power to pass Acts of Sederunt for regulating the practice of the Court in respect of the matters to which that Act related, and "so far as may be found expedient for altering the course of proceeding hereinbefore prescribed in respect to the matters to which this Act relates or any of them." On one or two occasions the Court has exercised the powers conferred on it by the Act and made minor alterations in procedure, but the new Act of Sederunt makes far more important changes than any of its predecessors. The text of the Act will be found in an Appendix to our edition of the statutes which is issued with this part. The new regulations as to amendment of records, abolition of supplementary actions, power to amend so as to obtain a larger or different remedy from that originally concluded for, simplification of the form of summons and of procedure in reductions, extension of the class of business which can be done at Vacation Courts, and the facilities for interdicts and other proceedings in the Bill Chamber, all tend to save expense, to avoid delay, and to facilitate the administration of justice. The provision under which in actions of damages, where a sum of less than £50 is recovered by the verdict of a jury, the pursuer is not to be entitled to charge more than half the taxed amount of his expenses (unless the judge certifies that he shall be entitled to recover a larger proportion not exceeding two-thirds thereof), will have a most salutary effect in discouraging a class of action which had become an abuse in the Court of Session. The arrangement for the constitution, when necessary, of a Third Division of the Inner House takes the place of a provision in sect. 8 of the Court of Session Act. That section provided for a Court of four Lords Ordinary to hear cases which did not come into the Inner House by Reclaiming Note. Such a Court sat on a few occasions shortly after the passing of the Act, but the result was far from satisfactory. There was only one Judge left in the Outer House, and the remedy for the congested state of business at that time was worse than the disease. Under the new Act, the Third Division will be able to take up any class of Inner House business, any three Judges may sit in it, and the removal of one Judge from the Outer House will enable the three Divisions to sit with three Judges each. The profession, and the public in Scotland, would much deprecate any proposal to permanently reduce the number of Judges sitting in each Division. A decision by a Court of Four Judges inspires confidence and tends to discourage appeals to the House of Lords. Nothing is more unsatisfactory than a judgment of two Judges reversing the opinion of a Lord Ordinary which is concurred in by the dissenting Judge in the Division. As a temporary arrangement, however, to get rid of the accumulation of arrears in the Inner House the proposal is an admirable one, and it may be hoped that after the Third Division has sat for two or three months the arrears will be overtaken. The constitution of the new Court has not yet been announced, and it is understood that it will not commence its sittings till towards the end of the present session.

The state of the rolls in the Court of Session and the figures in the Inner and Outer House, as after the first Box Day, was referred to in our issue of 13th April. On the second Box Day 76 new cases were called, 27 before Lord Dundas, 7 before Lord Johnston, 20 before Lord Salvesen, 4 before Lord Mackenzie, and 18 before Lord Guthrie. 53 additional cases were called on Tuesday and Thursday. On these days 51 new cases were sent to the rolls of the First Division and 8 to those of the Second. The Court of Session resumed its sittings on Tuesday All the Judges were present except Lord Ardwall who has been slightly indisposed. His Lordship took his seat in the Second Division on Thursday.

SCOTTISH LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.

New Keeper of Register of Sasines.

The King has been pleased, upon the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, to appoint Mr J. Smith Clark, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts, Edinburgh, to be Keeper of the Register of Sasines, Edinburgh, in room of the late Mr J. Hope Finlay. Mr Smith Clark, who comes of Forfarshire stock, was born in Musselburgh in 1851. He was educated in Dundee, and served an apprenticeship in the office of Mr Haliburton, solicitor there. In 1868 he came to Edinburgh, and after spending some years as a clerk in the office of Mr M'Breyer, he became assistant to Mr Lawrance Macara, W.S., with whom he afterwards entered into partnership. On the death of Mr Macara in 1875 Mr Smith Clark continued the business in his own name. In 1897 he assumed as a partner his son, Mr D. Smith Clark, W.S., and the firm name was changed to that of J. & D. Smith Clark. In his student days Mr Smith Clark obtained high honours in the Law Classes. He took an active part in the work of the Scots Law Society, and his gifts as a speaker and a resourceful debater are remembered by those who were his contemporaries there. Thoroughness has been the characteristic of all his work; and his energy, common sense, and the instinctively legal bent of his mind, have combined to give him a large measure of professional success. He is a sound conveyancer, though by no means a slavish follower of precedent. He has conducted a large Court practice, and has been agent in many important cases; amongst others, in the numerous keenly-fought litigations in which he has appeared as legal adviser to The Assets Company. Mr Smith Clark is a member of the Commission which is now sitting on Registration of Title in Scotland, and whether the result of their deliberations may be to establish a new system or to maintain the old one, Mr Smith Clark is well fitted to take command of the important legal department of which he is now the head. Mr Smith Clark has always been a keen Liberal, and has done much effective platform work for his party.

The New Clerk of the Bills.

The King has been pleased, on the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, to appoint Mr T. Swinton Paterson, S.S.C., Edinburgh, to be Clerk of the Bills and Sequestrations in the Court of Session, Edinburgh, in room of the late Mr Duncan Antonio. Mr Paterson, who is a son of Mr Alexander Paterson, merchant, Edinburgh, was born in 1861. He was educated at Watson's College and at the Edinburgh Institution, and in 1885 took the degree of Bachelor of Law in the University of Edinburgh. In the same year he was admitted a member of the S.S.C. Society, and in 1886 he joined in partnership Mr James T. Gibson, W.S. The firm of Gibson & Paterson continued till 1893, when Mr Gibson went to Australia. Since then Mr Paterson has conducted business alone. In December 1905 he was appointed by the Lord Advocate Agent for the Crown as ultimus hæres. For a number of years Mr Paterson was Secretary of the West Edinburgh Liberal Association, and represented the Liberals in the Registration Court. He was election agent for Mr Edwin Adam in 1900, and for Mr (now Lord) Courtney in 1905. He has taken an active interest in the work of the Edinburgh Night Asylum and the Edinburgh Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. He is known as a sound, careful lawyer, and is in every way well equipped for the delicate and responsible duties of his new office.

Mr James Marchbank, S.S.C., Edinburgh, has been appointed Agent for the Crown as ultimus hæres in Scotland in room of Mr T. Swinton Paterson, recently appointed Clerk on the Bills. Mr Marchbank, who is a partner of the firm of Cuthbert & Marchbank, S.S.C., was admitted to the Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Court in 1882. He has acted as election agent for Mr Arthur Dewar, K.C., M.P., in the Southern Division of Edinburgh.

THE SHERIFF COURTS BILL.

Some years ago a Departmental Committee was appointed to take evidence and report upon the procedure in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland and any suggested reforms. It met under the chairmanship of Lord Advocate Graham Murray, and afterwards of Lord Advocate Scott Dickson, and in 1904 made an exhaustive and very valuable report. A committee of experts was formed, who drew up a Bill on the lines of the Departmental Committee's report and submitted it to the law officers of the day, but no progress was made in the late Parliament. The present Government have now taken the subject up, and have introduced a Bill dealing with Sheriff Court procedure which is partly a consolidating and partly an amending Bill. Its object is to consolidate the provisions of a large number of statutes dealing with Sheriff Courts, and at the same time to simplify the procedure and to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts. The Bill deals with a large variety of topics, and in the schedule to it there is a code of Sheriff Court procedure, so that in the space at our disposal it is not possible to do more than summarise briefly some of the principal changes in the law which are proposed, without entering into any discussion of them on their merits.

Sheriff's Ordinary Court.—The jurisdiction of the Sheriff will be extended to (1) actions of declarator (except actions of declarator of marriage and nullity of marriage and actions to determine status); (2) actions of aliment, or separation and aliment, and for regulating the custody of children; (3) actions of division of commonty, or division and sale of common property; (4) actions relating to heritable right or title (except actions of adjudication save in so far as now competent, and actions of reduction); (5) suspensions of charges upon decrees of registration proceeding upon bills, bonds, contracts, etc., registered in the books of the Sheriff Court or others competent where the debt, exclusive of interest and expenses, does not exceed £50. There is a proviso that either party may at the closing of the record or six days thereafter require the case to be remitted to the Court of Session in the case of actions (a) relating to heritable right or title, or (b) relating to division of commonty, or division and sale of common property, where the value of the subject in dispute exceeds £50 by the year, or £1000 in value. The same rule applies to actions relating to the right of succession to moveables where the subject in dispute exceeds £1000, and the Sheriff may on cause shown, or ex proprio motu, remit actions of separation and aliment or custody of children to the Court of Session. It is provided by another clause that, subject to the provisions of this Act (by which the Sheriff-Principal may grant leave to appeal to the Court of Session upon important questions of law), and of the Small Debt Acts, all causes not exceeding £50 in value competent in the Sheriff Court shall be brought and followed forth in the Sheriff Court only, and shall not be subject to review by the Court of Session. These provisions will greatly add to the work and increase the importance of the Sheriff Courts. Not only will their jurisdiction be privative in all actions under £50 in value, but it will now be competent to bring actions for separation and aliment on the ground of adultery or cruelty, which at present take up so much of the time of the Supreme Court, in the Sheriff Court. Moreover, questions as to heritable estate of any value may be settled there so long as neither party exercises his right to have the case remitted to the Court of Session. Expert opinion has for a long time been in favour of extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs. Upon this question reference may be made to the articles by Sheriff Mackay and Sheriff Dove Wilson on the Sheriff Courts in Green's "Encyclopediæ," and to the discussion of the whole subject by the latter in his most recent book on "The Law of Process." Whatever criticism may be made on details, on the whole these changes will undoubtedly be most beneficial.

Summary Cause.—A new class of causes called summary causes is created by the statute, and include (a) Applications or appeals to the sheriff under special statutes where no other procedure is prescribed; (b) claims (except those under the Workmen's Compensation Act) for payment of money exceeding £20 and not exceeding £50; (c) any other cause which the Sheriff, of consent, may order to be treated as a summary cause; (d) summary suspension applications. The Debts Recovery Court, which never was popular, is now abolished, but the procedure in a summary cause (with some modifications), and the right to appeal to the Sheriff, will in future be the same as it is in that Court at present. No appeal will lie to the Court of Session unless the Sheriff-Principal shall find that there are important questions of law involved, and shall grant leave to appeal.

Sheriffs.—The clauses dealing with the appointment, retention of office, removal and retiral of Sheriffs, are mainly a consolidation of the law as at present. Three changes are introduced with reference to Sheriffs-Substitute: (1) A Sheriff-Substitute of five years' standing, though not an advocate, will be eligible for the office of Sheriff-Principal; (2) the limits on the salaries of Sheriffs-Substitute are removed; (3) in the event of illness the Secretary of Scotland may grant leave of absence and appoint a temporary substitute, whose salary will be paid by the Treasury. It is understood that the last change will put Sheriffs-Substitute on the same footing upon that matter as the County Court Judges in England.

Procurators-Fiscal.—The position of these officials is so greatly changed in recent times from being responsible to, and taking his orders in criminal matters from, the Sheriff, to reporting all questions of importance to the Lord Advocate or his deputes, and receiving his instructions from them, that it is only proper that their appointment should be vested in the Lord Advocate. Clauses are added as to their removal and appointment of deputes.

Appeals.—The interlocutors of the Sheriff-Substitute, which may be appealed to the Sheriff, are very much the same as at present. No appeal lies to the Court of Session unless the value of the cause exceeds £50 and the interlocutor appealed against is a final judgment; or is an interlocutor—(a) Granting interim decree for payment of money; (b) sisting the action; (c) against which the Sheriff, either ex proprio motu or on the motion of either party, grants leave to appeal. Appeal to the Court of Session for jury trial is also provided for.

Jury Trials.—The necessity of obtaining a speedy and inexpensive settlement of disputes under the Employers' Liability Acts has induced Parliament to restrict the raising of actions under these Acts to the Sheriff Court. This was carried one step further by the Workmen's Compensation Act of last year. Undoubtedly the effect was to deprive the parties of their right to have these questions settled by a jury. The Lord Advocate, by taking advantage of the precedent set by the inquiries before a jury under the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry Acts, proposes to restore to employees the right of trial by jury in actions against their employers. The Bill provides that in actions under the Employers' Liability Act 1880, or alternatively under that Act or at common law in respect of injury caused by accident arising out of and in course of the employment, where the claim exceeds £50, either party may, at the closing of the record, require that the cause be tried before a jury. The verdict of the jury is to be applied by an interlocutor of the Sheriff. Appeal to the Court of Session is allowed on the grounds (1) That the verdict has been erroneously applied; (2) that the verdict is contrary to evidence; (3) that the Sheriff has unduly admitted or excluded evidence, or misdirected the jury; (4) that an award of damages is inadequate or excessive. The difficulty of framing an issue is ingeniously met under the rules in the schedule, by requiring the Sheriff to state in an interlocutor the questions which he proposes to submit to the jury. After a little practice, this method may be found superior to the adjustment of an issue as at present practised in the Court of Session.

Small Debt Court.—The limit in this Court is raised from £12 to £20. Some discussion took place before the Departmental Committee as to whether a right of appeal should be allowed in this Court. The balance of opinion was in favour of finality, on the ground that this Court was popular among the poorer classes, because the process was inexpensive and the decision speedy. If appeal were allowed, there would always be the risk of greater cost and delay. Moreover, the difficulty in particular cases may be met by the Sheriff's power to remit a case to the Ordinary Roll. Some minor changes are introduced into the rules of this Court.

The Bill also deals with such matters as Removals, The Poors Roll, etc., to which it is not necessary to refer in detail.

Rules for procedure are embodied in the schedules to the Act, which the Court of Session have power to alter or supplement by Act of Sederunt.

In so far as it provides a simpler and more inexpensive means of deciding cases with regard to separation and aliment and money claims of small amount, which are the cases affecting especially the poorer classes of the people, the Bill will recommend itself to most legal reformers. Moreover, there is a growing feeling in favour of the restriction of the power of appeal in cases of small money claims. Indeed, some would carry it much further than has been done in the Bill. It is difficult to foretell what the effect will be on the employment of counsel. The work in the Court of Session will probably be lessened, but, on the other hand, counsel may be much more frequently employed than at present in the Sheriff Courts, especially at the busier centres of population.

In the interests of the public it is earnestly to be hoped that the Bill may speedily be passed into law.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF LAW AGENTS.

Taxation of Feu-Duties.

A special general meeting of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents in Scotland was held on 25th April in Dowell's Rooms, Edinburgh, to consider certain resolutions with reference to that part of the report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons upon the Land Values Taxation (Scotland) Bill, 1906, which dealt with the taxation of feu-duties, adopted at a meeting of representatives of the principal law societies of Scotland held on 8th March last. Mr George D. Ballingal, W.S., presided over an attendance of about thirty gentlemen. The resolutions referred to set forth:—

That the statement that, in law, a superior was owner of land, and that feu-duty was truly the rent of land, on which statement certain recommendations of the Select Committee were based, was erroneous as a statement of the law of Scotland, and that the law of Scotland was correctly stated in the passage in the Minority Report of the Local Taxation Commission to which the late Lord Kinross, Lord President of the Court of Session, gave his sanction, that the feuar, so long as he paid the feu-duty and observed the other stipulations of the feu charter, was the proprietor or owner of the land.

The argument that ownership of feu-duties was ownership of land, and that feu-duties were therefore a proper subject for local taxation, because the Conveyancing Act of 1874 included estate of superiority under the definition of an "estate in land," was unsound for two reasons: in the first place, the statutory definition was for purposes of title only, and in no way affected the intrinsic quality of the right; and, in the second place, the statutory definition included various forms of property, such as heritable securities, which could not be regarded in any view as ownership of land.

That inasmuch as the owners of feu-duties, ground annuals, and other burdens on land had been regarded, according to the law and practice of Scotland, as incumbrancers, and inasmuch as feu-duties, ground annuals, and mortgages on land have been sanctioned by the Trust Acts as investments for trustees, it would constitute a breach of public faith and involve serious loss to a very large number of innocent persons if the revenue from such investments were to be subjected to local rates.

That if, for reasons of State policy, it should be thought desirable to make a change in the system of levying local rates to the effect of subjecting feu-duties and other burdens on land to local rating, existing rights and interests acquired on the faith of the existing law ought to be respected in accordance with the assurance given by the Lord Advocate in the House of Commons.

The last resolution was to the effect that the existing state of uncertainty having disturbed public confidence and paralysed the sale of feu-duties and ground annuals, to the serious loss of trustees and other investors, the Government be requested to make a public statement in the sense of the Lord Advocate's assurance, and that copies of the resolutions should be sent to the Prime Minister and others.

The Chairman said that about a year ago at a special meeting of the Society the Land Valuations Taxation Bill was considered, and the Society had then before it a report by a Committee, which was adopted. That report disapproved generally of the principle of taxation of land values, but as regarded taxation of feu-duties the report touched very lightly on the subject, in respect that the Lord-Advocate had stated in Parliament that that portion of the Bill, so far as relating to existing feu-duties, would not be proceeded with. The matter of taxation of feu-duties was, however, touched upon, and the Society disapproved of that principle in the Bill at that time, but since that meeting was held the Bill had been before a Select Committee of the House of Commons. That Committee had taken evidence and issued its report about the end of last year. The terms of the report generally were to the effect that the Bill then before the House was disapproved of, but, so far as he could gather, on grounds not quite similar to their reasons for disapproval. But, further, the Select Committee, he thought to the surprise of most lawyers, took up a position as regarded the taxation of feu-duties contrary altogether to the views indicated by the Lord Advocate. Their (the Society's) view was that in this matter the Committee had gone wrong. Already the effect of the report had been to greatly depreciate feu-duties. At the present moment feu-duties were practically unsaleable, and that was an extremely hard case for trustees and others who had to realise their securities, and for other investors. He thought in these circumstances it was right they should let their voice be heard. The Faculty of Glasgow Procurators took the matter up some time ago, and called a meeting representative of the various leading societies. These were the Society of Writers to the Signet, the S.S.C. Society, the Faculty of Procurators, the Society of Advocates in Aberdeen, the Society of Solicitors in Dundee, and their Society, and after some discussion they passed the resolutions, which were generally to the effect that the report proceeded on false lines, and that the proposed taxation of feu-duties was wrong. He moved that the Society should confirm the resolutions come to at the joint meeting of law societies on March 8.

Professor Brown, Glasgow, seconded. He thought the Select Committee, even though it was presided over by so very eminent a gentleman as the Solicitor-General, and even though he had given his imprimatur to the terms of the report, it contained a great deal of very bad law. The idea of ownership in the holder of a feu-duty was due, in his opinion, solely to the fact that it was a relic of the old feudal system, which had no real existence; and if they just attempted to answer the question what was an owner, he thought they could solve the difficulty very easily. An owner was one who had the possession and power of disposal of land, to whose heirs the land would go in ordinary succession, and who had otherwise the right of property in the land. But there might be half a dozen or more superiors, holders of feu-duties, all in direct sequence each with the other. In regard to these holders of feu-duties which of them could claim to be really the owner? They began with the Crown. Was the Crown really the owner in the sense they understood ownership? and so on with the different degrees of superiority, and it was a rather significant fact that the Committee had not given them any light whatever in regard to what was to be done with ground annuals. A ground annual, in his view, differed in no respect from a feu-duty except on account of its permanency, nor did it differ in any point of principle from a bond and disposition in security except on account of its terms. The whole difficulty had arisen from a false interpretation of the law as it stood, and that mistake had arisen from the technicalities of the feudal system. Mr J. W. Whitelaw, Dumfries, moved the previous question. It had again and again been stated, he said, that local rates were imposed on and in respect of rental. That was not so. If they were going to tax the proprietor because he got so much rent into his pocket, it would be absurd to tax the tenant because he had to pay so much rent out of his pocket. The fact was, local taxes were imposed as a payment for services rendered. They should oppose the proposals, and tender their opposition to the Secretary for Scotland. Mr Alexander Jeans, Greenock, moved that feu-duties and ground annuals should be taxed for local purposes, but subsequently withdrew his motion. Mr A. B. Shearer, Greenock, seconded the previous question. He said unless they were going to tax feu-duties, and tax existing feu-duties, the taxation of feu-duties would be a mere form of words. If they were only going to tax feu-duties in the future, they might as well not tax them at all, because the superior would merely add the tax to the feu-duty which he exacted. The discussion being concluded, it was intimated that there were 160 proxies in favour of the resolutions and 2 against. A vote of those present resulted:—For the resolution, 24; previous question, 2, so that the resolutions were confirmed by 184 to 6. The Chairman was appointed to represent the Society on the deputation to the Prime Minister.

LEGAL AID FOR THE POOR.

A "Central Legal Aid Society," designed to help in bringing the resources of the law within the reach of the poor, was formed at a meeting over which the Lord Mayor of London presided on 3rd inst. at the Mansion House.

Letters expressing sympathy with the movement were sent by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Salisbury, Lord Kinnaird, the Bishop of Stepney, Mr J. W. Cleland, M.P., the Rev. H. Adler, Chief Rabbi; Mr A. Chichele Plowden, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Canon Horsley, and many others. Lord Loreburn, in the course of his letter, said: "Everything which will place poor people in a position as advantageous as that of rich people for defending their rights and obtaining access to the Courts of Justice, when that is necessary, ought to be encouraged. I do not know how the associations of poor men's lawyers are doing, but if properly managed they may well be of much utility. In regard to proceedings in forma pauperis, I shall be prepared to consider any practical suggestions. Any proposals which will have for their effect the cheapening of legal proceedings and the protection of poor men against loss by their inability to pay for legal assistance are certain to meet with widespread support, and will surely be supported by me." Lord Salisbury wrote that his experience in county magistrates' courts led him to welcome the recent legislation, which enabled the presiding magistrates at quarter sessions, among other tribunals, to assign counsel to poor defendants. The Bishop of Croydon moved a resolution expressing gratification at the work of the "poor men's lawyers," and the hope that more such voluntary associations would be formed. It was, he said, the regrettable position at present that the poor were inclined to look upon the law as an instrument rather of oppression than of help. Mr Percy Alden, M.P., seconding, said that in practice, if not in theory, there was in this country one law for the rich and another for the poor. The motion was carried, and a resolution calling for further provision in the interest of poor persons with regard to civil litigation was moved by Sir John Macdonnell, C.B., LL.D., who declared that the present system of allowing poor people to sue in forma pauperis was defective. Sir John Bamford Slack, F.R.G.S., himself a "poor man's lawyer" of many years' experience, seconded the resolution, which was carried. Sir Charles Mathews proposed a resolution urging that in all criminal courts professional assistance should be provided gratuitously for accused persons unable to pay for it. He said that he should like to live to see it brought about that in London's New Sessions House no prisoner was placed in the peril of trial without having the benefit of professional legal assistance. He would suggest the preparation of a list of counsel, of not less than three years' standing and not more than ten, who were willing to give gratuitous service in any case allocated to them by the presiding judge. He believed that if the judges would co-operate in carrying out that suggestion the Bar would not be unwilling to do their part. The proposition was seconded by Mr J. P. Coldstream, W.S.—who said that the system now prevailing in Scotland was almost perfect —supported by Mr Cecil M. Chapman, Metropolitan Police Magistrate, and adopted. Other speakers included Lord Reay, P.C., Mr B. Fossett Lock, Mr H. Y. Stanger, K.C., M.P., Dr W. R. Bisschop, and Mr W. R. Bousfield, K.C. A resolution formally constituting the Central Legal Aid Society to carry into effect the previous motions was carried unanimously.

LAW AGENTS' EXAMINATIONS.

The quarterly examination in law was held in Edinburgh in April. Seventy-three candidates presented themselves for examination. Sixty-six of these were examined in all the subjects, and thirty-nine passed. Seven candidates being graduates in law (LL.B. or B.L.), were examined in Court procedure, and all passed.

The following is the official list of those who have passed the Examination in Law:—Robert Smith Aitchison; Thomas Mitchell Alexander; James Craig Allan; William Anderson; Alexander Fyfe Barr; Daniel Trench Beath; Harold Robert Bird; Alexander Bisland Boyd, B.L.; Thomas Dunlop Brown; Alfred Ernest Copeland; Robert Davidson; Alexander Denoon; James Hastings Edwards, M.A., B.L.; Adam Robert Fraser; James Muir Galloway; William John Gilchrist; Alexander Gray; James Gray; Douglas Harper, M.A., B.L.; James Keay; Duncan Kennedy, B.L.; Thomas Lillie; David Linning, jun.; Matthew Harold Murray Lochhead; William M'Culloch; George Clunie Macgregor; Albert Alexander Mackenzie, M.A., LL.B.; Charles Gordon Alexander MacKinnon; William Marchbank; Herbert Mellor; Gordon James Milligan; David Moffat; Charles John Davie Munro; Alexander Miller Murray; John Mackenzie Orr; James Symington Quig; James Reid; Robert John Reid; James Scobie, jun., M.A., LL.B.; John Simon Scott; John Gordon Simpson, M.A., LL.B.; David Willocks Skea; Francis Souter; James Binnie Tait; Andrew Topping; Thomas M'Kinlay Weir.

THE 1904 LAW CLUB, EDINBURGH.

Between sixty and seventy members of the 1904 Law Club attended the annual dinner of the Club, which was held on 5th April in the Carlton Hotel, North Bridge, Edinburgh. Mr Hugh A. Heggie, the President, presided, Messrs Geo. R. Fleming and John Roddick were croupiers, and among others present were Professor Rankine, Sheriff Guy, Mr Forbes T. Wallace, solicitor, an ex-President of the Club, and Mr A. A. Fraser, advocate. After the loyal toasts, Mr M'Ewan gave "The Imperial Forces," and Mr H. Livingstone replied. "The Club" was proposed by Mr A. A. Fraser. It was, he said, in a very flourishing condition. This spoke volumes for the originators of the club. He did think it was an admirable Club, and one that deserved all assistance. Mr G. R. Fleming, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Club, acknowledged the toast. When the Club was formed in 1904 it was not anticipated they should proceed on the lines now being followed. The membership at the start did not exceed a dozen. In the following year the membership was increased, but the annual dinner was the sole bond of membership. Last year they introduced a series of debates, and it was resolved to widen the constitution, and invite members of the legal profession to become members. That was the beginning of their prosperity. They now had a membership of ninety-two. The Chairman gave "The Profession." Law he described as the corner-stone of a nation. If there was no law there would be chaos. And yet there were times when one felt called upon to rescue the legal profession from carping, petty, and false criticism. It was a fallacy for anyone to say that members of the legal profession were the people to raise strife. Why, they were ministering angels endeavouring to still troubled waters, to bring peace and concord. Sheriff Guy, who replied, took occasion to advise his hearers on some of the niceties of the law. He advised them to be very careful and precise about written pleading. "Don't state more than you need to say," he remarked; "but always state enough." Don't let them try to improve upon their pre-recognition. Let them take it for granted that a careful agent had given all a witness had got to say. He warned them not to cross-examine blindly, but to be pretty sure what the answer was to be. In regard to oratory—he excepted jury trials, where a good many tricks of the trade might be pardoned—he advised them not to bore the judge by saying the same thing over and over again. Mr F. T. Wallace proposed the "Alma Mater," and Professor Rankine replied.

The Late W. Peacock Edwards, Esq., S.S.C.—The death took place on the 14th inst. at his residence, 17 Belgrave Crescent, Edinburgh, of Mr William Peacock Edwards, senior partner of the firm of Skene, Edwards & Garson, W.S. Mr Edwards, who was in his seventy-eighth year, was a native of Forfarshire. He came to Edinburgh as a young man, and acquired legal training and experience in the office of the late Mr John Hope, W.S., and in other well-known Edinburgh offices. In 1856 he was admitted a member of the S.S.C. Society, and at his death was third senior member of that body. Early in the "sixties" Mr Edwards joined Mr William F. Skene, W.S., and that partnership continued until Mr Skene's death about fifteen years ago. During the whole of his professional career, Mr Edwards enjoyed the confidence of a large circle of clients, and his firm acted as agents for a number of the principal landowners in the North and West of Scotland. At an early stage he interested himself in the crofters' agitation. He took a prominent part in the discussion of the Crofters Act, and of the various schemes put forward for the alleviation of the condition of the crofter and congested districts in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. He was for long associated with the Canada North-West Land Company, of which he became managing director. In that capacity, and as agent for several Highland proprietors, he organised a scheme of emigration for crofters and others from the congested districts of the country. Under the auspices of that scheme a considerable number of men went to Canada, and in the great majority of cases the venture proved prosperous. Mr Edwards was regarded as an authority on all matters of land management, of which he had had large experience. He held the office of trustee in many family and estate trusts. In all matters of business he was an exceptionally shrewd and able man. For many years he was a director of the Commercial Bank of Scotland, and he was connected with various other public companies. Before the passing of the Private Bill Legislation Act for Scotland he was much engaged in connection with private legislation work in London. In politics he was a Conservative, but he took no part in the public discussion of political questions.

The Late Hugh Davidson, Esq., Solicitor, Lanark.—Mr Hugh Davidson, Braedale, Lanark, who died there on 29th April, was one of the most influential and best known men in the Upper Ward of Lanarkshire. Born at Lanark in the year 1828, and educated in his native town, he proceeded to the University of Edinburgh, and was employed in the office of Messrs Mackenzie, Innes & Logan, W.S. In 1858 he returned to Lanark, was assumed as partner in the firm of Messrs Gray & Anderson, Writers, and on the death of Mr Stephen Gray he succeeded that gentleman as Procurator-Fiscal for the Upper Ward of the county, both in the Sheriff Court and the Court of Justices of the Peace. In addition to these public appointments, which he held for over thirty years, he was successful in acquiring an extensive practice as a solicitor. He was Chairman of the first School Board of the Royal Burgh of Lanark from 1873 to 1876, and has since taken a deep interest in matters educational. Of the history of Lanark in the Upper Ward he was the chief authority, and wrote many articles on such matters, which are treasured by those interested in historical research. He was a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries and a Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and the holder of many semi-private appointments in connection with various Upper Ward charities and trusts. He was approached at one time by a deputation to allow his name to be brought forward with a view to the Provostship, but he ultimately refused, owing to the pressure of business. Mr Davidson was a devoted Churchman, and the moving spirit in the erection of St Kentigern United Free Church in Lanark.

The Late David Miller, Esq., Solicitor, Hamilton.—Mr David Miller, solicitor, Hamilton, died suddenly at his residence, Shawburn, Burnbank, on 8th April. He was born at Perth fifty-seven years ago, and was educated at the Trades' School there and at Perth Academy. Beginning his law apprenticeship in Glasgow, he subsequently qualified for the legal profession at Edinburgh University, and started business as a solicitor in Hamilton thirty years ago. Mr. Miller was a man of varied gifts, and by the members of the Bar at Hamilton he was greatly respected for his unfailing geniality of disposition and obliging nature. He was one of the first persons in Hamilton to begin amateur photography, and as an artist, whether in the use of the brush or pen and pencil, he earned no small reputation. He also wrote on local history, and was the author of more than one play.

The Late D. A. M'Tavish, Esq., Solicitor and Banker, Johnstone.—Mr D. A. M'Tavish, agent of the Union Bank of Scotland at Johnstone, died on 24th April at the age of fifty-five years. Mr M'Tavish was head of the firm of Holmes & Co., Solicitors, and he acted as factor and agent for Mr John Charles Cunningham of Craigends, late Parliamentary candidate for West Renfrew. He was also agent for several West Highland landowners, was a member of the County Council, and until lately Chairman of the Johnstone Conservative Association. He was also Chairman of the Johnstone Combination Hospital Board. He was a native of Islay.

The subject of the portrait in our next issue will be the late Walter Haddon, Esq., Solicitor, Hawick.

The King, on the recommendation of the Home Secretary, has been pleased to appoint John Roskill, Esq., K.C., to be Recorder of Burnley, in place of Henry Gordon Shee, Esq., K.C., resigned on appointment as Recorder of Liverpool.

Mr Thomas Kennedy Douglas, Scone, has been admitted a Law Agent by the Lords of Council and Session.

Mr John M'Michael, M.A., LL.B., Commercial Bank Buildings, Callander, has been admitted a Law Agent by the Lords of Council and Session, and has been assumed as a partner in the firm of Messrs M'Michael & Buchanan, Solicitors, Callander.

Mr Kerr A. Simpson intimates that he has commenced business at Lesmahagow as a Solicitor and Law Agent. He will also carry on business at No. 8 Albany Street, Edinburgh, in association with Mr George S. Donaldson, S.S.C.

Mr Robert Somerville, W.S., 16 Rutland Square, Edinburgh, has assumed Mr James Black Cameron, LL.B., W.S., as a partner. The business will in future be carried on at the above address under the firm name of Somerville & Cameron, W.S.

Mr John Lumsden, agent for the Commercial Bank, Callander, has been appointed to the agency of the branch at Stobcross, Glasgow, and Messrs M'Michael & Buchanan, solicitors, have been appointed joint agents of the Callander branch.

Appeals to House of Lords. — Standing Orders of the House. At a sitting of the House of Lords on the 6th inst. the Standing Orders of the House relating to Appeals from Scotland were amended so as to reduce the time during which appeals may be taken from two years to one year.

Among those called to the English Bar by the Inner Temple on the 24th April last was Mr Hector Burn Murdoch, Advocate, who was admitted to the Faculty in 1905. Mr Burn Murdoch obtained a special prize in Constitutional Law and Legal History at Easter 1906, and in the final examination at Hilary 1907 was awarded a Certificate of Honour.

Interim Sheriffs-Substitute for Lanarkshire.—Two new interim Sheriffs-Substitute for Lanarkshire have been acting during the vacation. Sheriff Moncrieff held Courts in Glasgow, and Sheriff Spens at Hamilton. Both are (says the "Glasgow Herald") advocates of considerable experience, and enjoying large practice at the Bar. Mr Alexander Moncrieff, who is taking the place of Sheriff-Substitute Davidson at Glasgow, was admitted a member of the Faculty in 1894. Having received an excellent legal training in Glasgow, he soon gained a good footing in the Court of Session. A fluent pleader, and having a thorough grasp of his cases, he commands the attention of the Bench. Mr J. G. Spens, who is temporarily performing the Sheriff-Substitute's duties at Hamilton, also belongs to a Glasgow legal family. He was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates in 1899. From the first he had a fair share of general practice, and as years passed that practice increased until now he is one of the busiest junior practitioners at the Bar. He has a large Glasgow business connection, and takes a particular interest in shipping cases.

FOR THE POOR OF THE PARISH.

By Henry H. Brown, Procurator-Fiscal, Cupar.

It is related of Mrs Gilpin on a famous occasion that "though on pleasure she was bent, she had a frugal mind." In similar phrase it may be said of our ancestors that, though they were resolutely bent on the protection of sporting rights, they had a charitable mind. In most of the older statutes relating to game and trout-fishing the penalty, or part of it, is directed to be utilised for the poor of the parish in which the offence was committed. It was thought astute policy to make the poacher provide for the poor. Ideas respecting the best mode of relieving poverty have changed in the last century, and altered circumstances often compel the prosecutor to ask himself,—"How shall I carry out the statutory direction?" The question has been answered in various ways, so that diversity of practice exists, both as to the terms of the conviction, and the disposal of the money.

The first point is not important. It was decided in the case of Hume (1846, Ark. 88) that the respondent discharges his duty under the Act by paying the penalty to the Clerk of Court, and therefore the terms of the conviction do not present much difficulty. Although competent to omit any direction as to the disposal of the penalty, it is expedient to insert one, either directly or by reference; thus,—"Directs the penalty when recovered to be paid by the complainer to the Moderator, or other officer, of the Kirk Session of the said Parish of A., for the use and benefit of the poor of such parish"; or, "Directs the penalty when recovered to be applied by the complainer in the manner prescribed by the said Act." Doubt may in this particular be obviated by using the latter form.

The second point is of greater moment—the proper application of the money. An examination of the statutes dealing with game and fishings from 1772 to 1860 shows that the direction takes five forms:—

(a) To the use of the poor of the parish (1772).
(b) To the overseer (in Scotland, Inspector) of the poor of the parish, for the use of the general rate of the county (1831).
(c) To the moderator or other officer of the Kirk Session of the parish, for the use and benefit of the poor of such parish (1832).
(d) To the poor of the parish (1845).
(e) To the Inspector of the Poor of the parish on behalf of such poor (1860).

Some prosecutors make no distinction, and in all these cases pay the penalty to the Inspector of Poor. This seems to be the obvious course as regards forms (a), (b), (d), and (e); but in form (c) the proper recipient is the moderator or other officer of the Kirk Session.

A curious question has been known to arise in practice. A portion of a large parish may have been disjoined from it, and erected into a new parish. When an offence has been committed in the new parish, it may be asked—What poor ought to benefit from the penalty, those of the original parish or those of the smaller area? The answer depends upon the terms of the disjunction and erection. If the disjoined portion has been erected a parish quoad sacra tantum, the erection affects only ecclesiastical rights and obligations, such as religious services or the proclamation of banns. In that case the poor of the whole original parish should share in the penalty. But if the erection has been quoad omnia, the right passes to the poor of the disjoined portion. The practical importance of the question rests in this, that the prosecutor will in the latter case have to libel the offence as having been committed within the new parish. The provisions of the Local Government Acts have also affected parish boundaries to a large extent; but under them little difficulty can arise, because the lands disjoined or annexed, as the case may be, become part of the new parish as regards all matters of civil administration.

The system of utilising the penalties of poaching for the benefit of the poor has been abandoned in modern statutes, and might well be abrogated. It has nothing to recommend it economically, socially, or judicially. I am afraid that the poor do not greatly benefit by this device of the charitable mind of our ancestors, and I know that it is an annoyance to those who have to administer the law.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Furber v. Fieldings Ltd.

Statute—Moneylenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. cap. 51), sect. 6 (d).—A valuer advanced money at 15 per cent. interest on bills of sale to any person to whom there was no personal objection, such advances bringing legitimate valuation business in an indirect manner. Held that he did not require to be registered as a moneylender.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore, J.).—23*rd February* 1907.

Joseph Thorley Ltd. v. The Orchis Steamship Co. Ltd.

Ship—Bill of Lading.—Decision of Channell, J. (supra, p. 135), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Cozens-Hardy and Fletcher Moulton, L.JJ.).—25*th February* 1907.

Cairn Line of Steamships, Ltd. v. Corporation of Trinity House.

Ship—Light Dues — Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sect. 85.—Held that light dues were payable on the deck space occupied by coal which was to be consumed in the ship's boiler fires, the provisions of sect. 85 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, not being limited to space occupied by freight-earning cargo.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.).—25*th February* 1907.

Burton v. The Companies Registration Agency

Statute—Moneylenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. cap. 51), sect. 1.—Decision of Bucknill, J. (supra, p. 148), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Cozens-Hardy and Fletcher Moulton, L.JJ.).—26*th February* 1907.

Darling & Son v. Raeburn & Verel.

Ship — Charter-party — Construction.—Decision of Kennedy, J. (supra, p. 19), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Farwell and Buckley, L.JJ.).—27*th February* 1907.

S.S. "Albano" v. S.S. "Parisian."

Ship—Collision.—Where two vessels were converging on a pilot-cutter for the purpose of getting a pilot, held that they were crossing vessels in the sense of the rules for preventing collisions at sea, although the vessel whose duty it would then be to keep out of the way had little motion in her on arriving at the cutter.—Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (Lord Macnaghten, Lord Davey, Sir Arthur Wilson, and Sir Gorell Barnes).—27*th February* 1907.

Whittall & Co. v. The Rahtkens Shipping Co. Ltd.

Ship — Demurrage.—A charter-party provided that the charterers might have the option of using neighbouring loading ports, "paying all port charges, and time shifting port to count as lay-days." Thirteen running days were allowed, "Sundays and holidays excepted," for loading, "to commence when the steamer is moored and ready." On arriving at the loading port the steamer was put into quarantine, and when there was ordered to a neighbouring port to load, whither she went on getting out of quarantine. She also loaded on a Sunday and a holiday. Held that the time going to the neighbouring port was to be counted in the lay-days although the vessel had not previously been moored at the original port of loading, that the Sunday and holiday were to be counted as lay-days, but that the expression "port dues" did not include pilotage dues.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.)—28*th February* 1907.

Mayor, etc., of the Borough of Lambeth v. South London Electric Supply Corporation Ltd.

Electric Lighting—Transfer of Powers—Collateral Agreement.—A local authority got power under a provisional order to carry on an electric undertaking, and they were entitled, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, to transfer their powers. They entered into two agreements with the defendants, viz.—(1) for a transfer of their powers under the provisional order, this agreement receiving the sanction of the Board of Trade, and (2) for the construction and maintenance by the defendants of a dust destructor and the disposal of the refuse of the borough, this agreement not being sanctioned by the Board of Trade. Held that the local authority having power under the Public Health Act to dispose of its refuse, the second agreement was valid, and that it did not require the consent of the Board of Trade.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Farwell and Buckley, L.JJ.).—28*th February* 1907.

Moulis v. Owen.

International Law—Illegal Contract—Gaming Debt.—Decision of Darling, J. (supra, p. 95), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Cozens-Hardy and Fletcher Moulton, L.JJ.).—1*st March* 1907.

The "Wallsend."

Ship—Collision—A vessel became a wreck by collision through the fault of the other colliding vessel, and the owners of the wreck had to pay for its removal. Held that the owners of the vessel in fault were liable to repay this amount.—P.D. and A. Div. (Bargrave Deane, J.).—4*th March* 1907.

The "Bodlewell."

Ship—Collision.—A vessel which was being run at a loss in order to secure a footing in the trade, with the hope of afterwards earning a profit, was damaged by collision through the fault of the other vessel. Held that the owners of the damaged vessel were not entitled to claim from the owners of the vessel in fault damages for the loss of the use of their vessel.—P.D. and A. Div. (Bargrave Deane, J.).—4*th March* 1907.

Thornton v. Little.

Property—Servitude.—Held that a right granted to the owner of a house of user of a footpath for "her tenants, visitors and servants" included a right of user by pupils attending a school carried on at the house.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—5*th March* 1907.

The "Oravia."

Ship — Collision. — The plaintiffs' vessel sighted the defendants' vessel at a distance of about three miles, both being on courses on which they would have passed clear. The defendants' vessel was then lost in a fog bank and the plaintiffs' vessel kept on her course and did not sound her whistle until she heard the whistle of the defendants' vessel, which had altered her course in the fog bank. Held that the defendants' vessel was not in fault in not altering her course or sounding her whistle until then.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Cozens-Hardy, M.R., and Fletcher Moulton, L.J.)—7*th March* 1907.

Polsue & Alfieri v. Rushmer.

Nuisance—Increase of Noise—Standard of Comfort—Printing Machinery.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIII. p. 152) affirmed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, Lord Robertson, and Lord Atkinson).—11*th March* 1907.

Smitton v. The Orient Steam Navigation Co. Ltd.

Carriage—Liability of Carrier—Held that the liability of a carrier for goods in the personal control of a passenger did not alter when the passenger went to sleep at night in his berth and placed the goods in a receptacle in his cabin provided for the purpose. Held also that fault on the part of the marine superintendent of a shipping company in the matter of the construction of the cabin of a ship was not the fault of the owners in the sense of sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. — K.B. Div. (Channell, J.)—11*th March* 1907.

The Late WALTER HADDON, Esq., Solicitor, Hawick.

When a man has for more than a generation lived in the eye of his native town; when he has filled many public offices of responsibility and trust; when he has been identified with public movements and enterprises which appeal to public sympathies and evoke criticism as well as praise, his death is likely to be widely and deeply felt in the community among which his labours were spent. And when on his death no word is heard but of regret and appreciation, it may be said that he not only bulked largely in the public eye, but merited the respect and confidence with which his fellow-townsmen regarded him. Such a man was the late Mr Walter Haddon, solicitor, Hawick, who died at his residence at Colislinn, there, on 8th April last.

The son of a manufacturer in Hawick, Mr Walter Haddon was born in the year 1841. He served his apprenticeship with the late Mr Thomas Purdom, solicitor there; and after attending the law classes in Edinburgh, returned to his native town in 1864, where he took over the business of the late Mr Charles Kirk and commenced practice under the name of Kirk & Haddon. In the same year he was appointed Treasurer and Collector to the Police Commissioners, an office which he held till his death. Other appointments which came to him in subsequent years included Sub-Distributor of Stamps and Sub-Collector of Imperial Taxes; Sheriff-Clerk Depute, which he held until the weekly Sheriff Court was established in Hawick; Clerk to the School Boards of the Parishes of Cavers and Lilliesleaf; Secretary to the Upper Teviotdale Fisheries Association; Agent of the Royal Bank of Scotland, and a member of the Board of Advice for the South of Scotland of the Caledonian Insurance Company.

Mr Haddon had an extensive private practice, and his counsel was much sought after, especially in questions of estate management and agricultural affairs. He acted as factor for Cavers estate from the year 1879, and was also a director of the Teviotdale Dairy Company, in whose affairs he took much interest.

To his public duties and an assiduous attention to the interests of his many clients, Mr Haddon added a zeal for the practical responsibilities of citizenship. As a member of the Hawick District Committee of the Roxburgh County Council, and also as a member of Cavers Parish Council, he was able to bring to the work of these Boards a trained mind, large experience, and an enthusiasm for the public service. The Border Mounted Rifles, now extinct, and the Hawick Archæological Society, also were sharers in his multifarious interests.

It may not be within the scope of this article to touch upon the private life of a man. But to one who knew him well, Mr Haddon was happiest with his family around him. By the banks of his beloved Slitrig, with rod in hand, or on the moors with gun and dog, he appeared at his best. There the worries of business were forgotten, and on such occasions his mind was centred on the pleasures of sport and the joys of friendship.

Before commencing the business in Hawick Sheriff Court on Wednesday, 10th April—

Sheriff Baillie, referring to the death of Mr Haddon, said that although not practising in the Court of recent years, he had done much good work in the old days when only the Small Debt Courts had been held in Hawick. At that time he was Depute Sheriff Clerk, and rendered valuable service both to the Court and to the members of the Bar. He thought, however, it was not so much Mr Haddon's connection with the Court by which he would be chiefly remembered. He would be remembered as a very excellent man indeed, a very sound adviser, and a very good friend to all his clients. He always did his very best for them, and consulted their interests in every way. He set a very honourable example to the members of his profession, and he was sure they were all the poorer by his death.

Mr J. R. Purdom, on behalf of the Bar, concurring in all that his Lordship had said, added that Mr Haddon had been very well known to them for a great number of years, having practised as a lawyer since 1864. He was Dean of their Faculty, and senior member of their profession, and had been known to them both as a friend and professional gentleman. He had always been held in very high esteem, and trusted by a very large body of clients with important business, and was always understood to be one of the shrewdest men in the town, and one of the clearest and most level-headed men in the profession. He did not think they could pay a higher compliment to a professional man that that. He held a great many public offices in the town with appreciation, and there was no doubt that his death was a very serious loss to the community.

It was, of course, on his resignation, over a year ago, that Lord Young actually severed his long and memorable connection with the administration of law in Scotland. Since then he has taken no part in public affairs. But it is only his death that has fully brought home to the minds of his countrymen that Lord Young's life work is finished and that he will sit in judgment no more. We venture to think that, amid all the tributes to his position and worth which his removal has called forth, the extent of the loss to Scottish jurisprudence has scarcely been adequately realised. Justice has been done to his powerful intellectual qualities; and more than justice, perhaps, has been done to the exuberance and brilliance of his sardonic humour. But surely something less than justice has been accorded to his greatness as a lawyer and as a judge. Lord Young was a great lawyer. Moreover (apart from a tendency to too contemptuous or impatient treatment of what he considered either prolix or untenable), he was a great judge. He was such a lawyer and such a judge as were scarcely once excelled in his own generation. Not only was his knowledge of law exceptionally wide and exceptionally ready; he had assimilated its principles in a rare degree; while his discrimination between the essential and the accidental or the spurious never failed. He has left his impress on the case law of his time more extensively than merely his own powerful and courageous decisions would imply, for beyond a doubt he leavened, in no small measure, the views of his brother senators.

Faculty of Advocates.—A meeting of the Faculty was held on the 17th May—the Dean of Faculty, Mr William Campbell, K.C., presiding. Committees were appointed to consider and report upon the following Bills now before Parliament: — Sheriff Court (Scotland) Bill, Small Landholders (Scotland) Bill, the Intestate Husband's Estate (Scotland) Bill, also the Companies Bill and the Companies (Debenture and Debenture Stock) Bill.

Election of Procurator of the Church of Scotland.—In the General Assembly on 21st May Lord Balfour of Burleigh proposed the election of Sheriff C. N. Johnston to the office of Procurator, in room of the late Sir John Cheyne. He was, he said, old enough to remember four Procurators, three of whom were promoted to the Bench. Sheriff Johnston had long served the Church efficiently, with much sacrifice to himself and with great benefit to the Church at large. He had acted with Sheriff Johnston on the Church Interests Committee, and a more unselfish and devoted son the Church did not at the present time possess. The Rev. Dr Fisher, Morningside, seconded the nomination. Mr James Wallace, as the senior member of the Bar having a seat in the Assembly, supported the motion, stating that Sheriff Johnston's position as Sheriff of Perthshire, his ability as a lawyer, his knowledge of church law and procedure, and the eminent services he had rendered to the Church, both by speech and pen, fully entitled him to the high office for which he had been nominated. The motion was unanimously agreed to. Sheriff Johnston, when called in, appeared in full-bottomed wig, and was congratulated by the Moderator on his appointment. Having taken the oath of office, he returned thanks, stating that he hoped to be able to discharge the duties in a manner not altogether unworthy of the traditions of the office. A portrait and biographical sketch of the new Procurator appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. III. p. 13.

His Imperial Highness Prince Fushimi, accompanied by his suite, paid a visit to the Parliament House on Saturday, 16th May. The Prince, who was received in the Judge's Robing Room by the Lord Justice-General, was conducted by him to a seat on the Bench of the First Division, where he remained for a few minutes and heard part of a discussion before that Court. The Dean and the other officials of the Faculty of Advocates were thereafter presented to His Imperial Highness, who paid a short visit to the Parliament Hall and Advocates' Library.

The Late William Thomson, Esq., Solicitor, Dumfries.—We have to record the death of Mr William Thomson, solicitor, Buccleuch Street, Dumfries, which took place on Monday, 20th May, at the residence of his brother in Ayr. Mr Thomson had been seriously ill for about a year, and had been laid aside for some months. In October he installed Mr John Dickie to manage his business, and appearances in his court cases were made on his behalf by a fellow-member of the Bar, Mr James Hyslop, solicitor. Mr Thomson had made for himself a high reputation in his profession, and had built up an extensive business, and his death at the early age of forty-four is much regretted. Born in Ayr, he was apprenticed to the law in the office of Mr Kirkpatrick, solicitor, there. He had a distinguished career as a student in Glasgow University. In 1886 he gained a place in the honours list for Conveyancing, and acquitted himself with great credit in the Scots Law Class. In 1887 he gained the second prize for eminence in ordinary Conveyancing class examinations, and second prize in special written examination on "the completion of titles in feudal conveyancing." For some years he served in the office of Messrs Black, Honeyman, & Monteath, writers, Glasgow. In 1889 he was admitted a law agent, in which year he came to Dumfries, where, as stated, he succeeded, by sheer ability and application, in coming to the front in legal circles. For a number of years he was one of the most prominent figures in Court work in Dumfriesshire and the Stewartry. He was no hectoring cross-examiner, but endeavoured rather by steady persistence to gain his points, and as a pleader he deservedly had a high reputation. His pleasing and obliging manners earned for him the respect both of his fellows of the Bar and the general public. For some time he was on the Dean's Council of the Faculty of Solicitors. He was agent for the Licensed Victuallers' Association, and Secretary to the Dumfries and Galloway Property Investment Company. In politics he was a Liberal, but beyond appearing as one of the platform party at political meetings, he took no active share in political campaigns. He was unmarried.

Levee at Holyrood.—His Grace the Lord High Commissioner on Wednesday, 22nd May, held a levee, which was attended by the Senators of the College of Justice, members of the Faculty of Advocates, of the Society of Writers to His Majesty's Signet, of the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts, the Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh, representatives of the Royal College of Physicians and of the Royal College of Surgeons, of the Society of Chartered Accountants, and of the Faculty of Actuaries in Scotland. The Judges present were:—The Lord Justice-General, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord M'Laren, Lord Kinnear, Lord Stormonth-Darling, Lord Pearson, Lord Dundas, Lord Ardwall, Lord Johnston, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie. Among the other gentlemen who attended the Levee were: Faculty of Advocates—Mr William Campbell, K.C., Dean of Faculty; Mr James A. Fleming, K.C., Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway, Vice-Dean of Faculty; Mr A. A. Grainger Stewart, Treasurer of Faculty; Mr W. K. Dickson, Keeper of the Advocates' Library; the Right Hon. C. Scott Dickson, K.C.; Mr C. N. Johnston, K.C., Sheriff of Perthshire; Mr Donald Crawford, K.C., Sheriff of Aberdeen; Mr George L. Macfarlane, K.C.; Mr G. L. Crole, K.C.; Mr R. L. Orr, K C., A.-D.; Mr John F. M'Lennan, K.C., Sheriff of Caithness; Mr A. L. M'Clure, K.C., Sheriff of Argyllshire; Mr John A. Reid, K.C., Sheriff of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland; Mr T. B. Morison, K.C., A.-D.; Mr Edwin Adam, A.-D.; Mr A. M. Anderson, A.-D.; and many members of the Junior Bar. The Society of Writers to the Signet was represented by Mr G. M. Paul, Deputy Keeper; Mr John Cowan, Treasurer; Mr W. S. Fraser, Fiscal; and Mr W. S. Haldane, Crown Agent. The President of the S.S.C. Society, Mr John Campbell, the Vice-President, Mr William Robson, and the Treasurer, Mr Charles Ritchie, also attended.

Edinburgh Legal Dispensary.—The annual meeting of the subscribers to the Edinburgh Legal Dispensary—an institution which was founded seven years ago for providing poor persons with legal advice—was held on 20th May in the Goold Hall, St Andrew Square. Mr G. M. Paul, D.K.S., presided. The report stated that every week an average of about twenty-four persons attended the rooms. The number of clients who sought assistance in the course of the year was 848, as against 857 in the previous year, and there were 1194 consultations, compared with 1232 in the preceding year. The year's income was £53, 7s. 5d., and the expenditure amounted to £56, 14s. There was a balance in hand of £6, 14s. 3d. The Chairman, in moving that the report be approved and circulated, remarked that Mr John P. Coldstream,

W.S., was entitled to the high credit of having been the first to suggest the idea of instituting a legal dispensary in Edinburgh, and it was mainly by his care and watchfulness that it had been made a success. The motion was seconded by Mr Grainger Stewart, Advocate, and was unanimously agreed to. Mr A. Hewat, Mr J. E. Dovey, C.A., Sir John M. Clark, Bart., Mr James Urquhart, and Mr W. S. Haldane, Crown Agent, commended the Dispensary to the support of the public.

Mr George Allison Scrimegour, solicitor, who has been for the last six years principal assistant to Messrs Thurburn & Fleming, solicitors, Keith, has commenced business on his own account at Portsoy.

AN IMPERIAL COURT OF APPEAL.

At the meeting of the Colonial Conference on 26th April the following resolution of the Commonwealth of Australia was moved by the representative of that Colony:—"That it is desirable to establish an Imperial Court of Appeal." The meagre minute of the proceedings which was communicated to the press bears that the resolution "was submitted and discussed." We are left to infer—from the discussion, and on the principle of exclusion—that the proposition was not accepted.

At present it is sufficiently accurate to say that there are two Supreme Courts of Appeal for the Empire. The inhabitants of the United Kingdom appeal to the House of Lords; the King's people beyond the seas appeal to His Majesty in Council, and the appeal is disposed of by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council under the orders of reference.

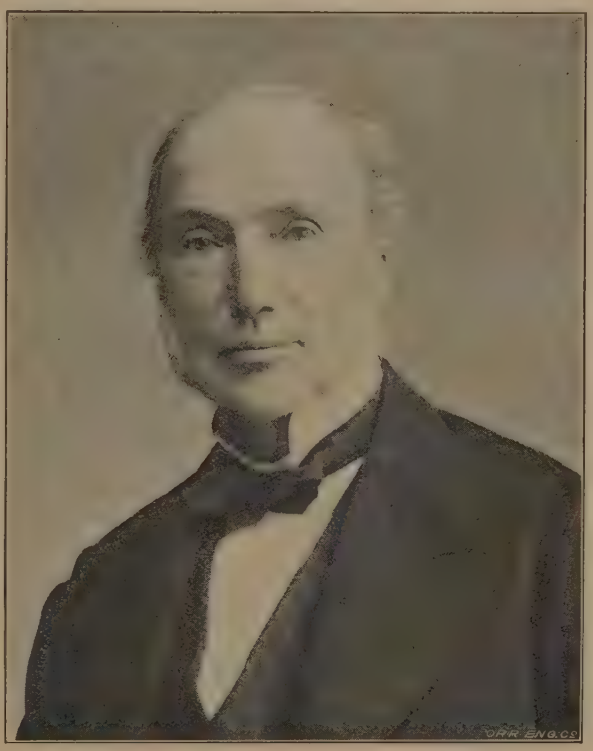
The proposal to constitute one Court for the whole Empire would certainly have the advantage of securing uniformity. There, however, we venture to think its advantages would end. It cannot be doubted that the system of appeal to the Privy Council has worked well. The composition of the Judicial Committee (as amended by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 41, and 58 & 59 Vict. c. 44, to the effect of admitting members experienced in Indian and colonial law) is generally approved; and the findings of the Committee have always commanded confidence and respect. In the circumstances in which the tribunal has to work, moreover—dealing with appeals which come from both hemispheres and from very near both poles—commendable despatch has generally characterised its labours. Nor can it be said with truth that its rules and procedure are either exceptionally complicated or tedious, or that to invoke its aid involves undue expense. In all these respects, it may be conceded, there is room for a certain amount of improvement. But, as human institutions go, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal has worked well. The Colonial representatives one and all bore testimony to its success; while the Lord Chancellor had an easy task as its apologist. Mr Deakin, who moved the Australian resolution, had an alternative suggestion to offer. If one uniform Court could not be established, he stated, Australia desired an Order in Council giving a Colony power to transfer its appeals to the Lords if it wishes. Such an arrangement would leave other Colonies who desire no change to continue as at present. With this alternative also Lord Loreburn was able to deal effectively. He pointed out that the judges of the House of Lords Appeal Court are all members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and available for service upon it, while the Committee has this advantage over the House of Lords as an Imperial Court, that it is strengthened by the inclusion of judges who have had experience in the Colonies of all forms of colonial law. There would not be any advantage in substance if the Judicial Committee were displaced as suggested in the alternative.

The conference, therefore (wisely, as it humbly seems to us) did not adopt the Australian resolution, but addressed itself to the improvement of the venerable existing tribunal. To this end the resolution submitted by General Botha, in which the Prime Minister of Cape Colony had concurred, was adopted. As amended and accepted, the resolution was in these terms:—

"This Conference, recognising the importance to all parts of the empire of the appellate jurisdiction of His Majesty the King in Council, desires to place upon record its opinion (1) that in the interests of His Majesty's subjects beyond the seas it is expedient that the practice and procedure of the Right Honourable the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council be definitely laid down in the form of a code of rules and regulations; (2) that in the codification of the rules regard should be had to the necessity for the removal of anachronisms and anomalies, the possibility of the curtailment of expense, and the desirability of the establishment of a course of procedure which would minimise delays; (3) that with a view to the expansion of uniform rights of appeal to all Colonial subjects of His Majesty, the various Orders in Council, instructions to governors, charters of justice, ordinances, and proclamations upon the subject of the appellate jurisdiction of the Sovereign, should be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining the desirability of equalising the conditions with equal right of appeal to His Majesty; (4) that much uncertainty, expense and delay would be avoided if some portion of His Majesty's prerogative to grant special leave to appeal in cases where there exists no right of appeal was exercised under definite rules and restrictions."

The Late LORD YOUNG.

It is with great regret that we record the death of Lord Young, which took place in London on the 21st ult. Since his resignation, two years ago, Lord Young had enjoyed fairly good health, and about a month ago, feeling sufficiently vigorous to go South, he took up his residence in the chambers in the Middle Temple which belonged to him as one of the Benchers of that Inn. When in London he overtaxed his strength and met with an accident as the result of sudden heart failure. After a time he rallied, and it was hoped that he might be able to return to Edinburgh. But the improvement in his condition was not maintained, and after an illness of nearly a month's duration he passed away within a few weeks of his eighty-eighth birthday.



A portrait and biographical sketch of his distinguished career as a lawyer, a politician, and a judge appeared in our columns when he resigned in 1905 (Vol. XIII. p. 1). It is needless to repeat the facts which were there detailed. The notes which follow are from the pen of one who was long associated with him and was privileged to enjoy his friendship.

The death of Lord Young, at the great age of eighty-eight, severs a link with the far past, and is an event of no ordinary kind in the Scottish legal world. It is strange to recal the fact that as a boy he frequently had tea in Dumfries with Bonnie Jean, the widow of Robert Burns, in the very house in which the poet died. He was at the Bar before the days of the penny post, even before people got letters done up in the Mulready envelopes now so dear to stamp collectors. When he was a student he used to see the coaches starting from the head of Leith Walk for Dumfries and other provincial towns. The year George Young attended the Conveyancing Class he had among his competitors the late T. G. Murray (whose only son is now Lord Justice-General), Patrick Fraser, who rose to be a Judge, and Samuel Raleigh, a Castle-Douglas boy, who became in due time manager of the Scottish Widows Fund. It is sixty-seven years since he took the oath as an advocate before Lord President Hope in what is now the Second Division Court; for at that date the present First Division building was still unfinished, and the Second Division judges sat in what is now known as the Law Room.

It is perhaps not altogether inappropriate that his death took place in London, for it sometimes appeared as if his great gifts would have been seen to more advantage and had larger scope in the wider sphere of the English Bar, of which he became a member in 1869, and many of whose most famous men were his intimates when as Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General he sat in Parliament. Some years ago one of his brethren, who did not always see eye to eye with him, admitted somewhat reluctantly, "I daresay he is the ablest of us all, but he does not care much for the rules of law. If these conflict with his view of what should be, so much the worse for the rules of law."

It was his great characteristic to be more than a mere lawyer. He took an interest in aspects of a case that had nothing to do with rules of law. He would interrupt junior counsel by asking "How much did this testator leave?" "How old was he when he died?" and other similar questions, to which budding Counsel had paid no attention, and could not answer. When he found out that the subject of dispute was of trifling value, he was scathing in his remarks about the absurdity of litigating over trifles. If, on the other hand, he thought a matter important, he spared no pains or trouble. If he was likely to be in a minority, his energy was redoubled. In The Assets Co. v. Bain's Trustees he wrote and re-wrote his judgment, and no doubt was vastly gratified that he was unanimously upheld in the House of Lords; but he could only be got to say, with a grave look and a twinkle in his eye, "It may be right for all that." What astonished one most, even up to the last, was the rapidity of his mental movements, and the unexpected turns he could give to apparently trifling incidents He thoroughly appreciated the answer of a witness who, on being asked "What doctor attended the deceased?" replied "Oh, there was no doctor; he just died a natural death."

Lord Young did not mind treading on other people's toes. Years ago he brought a Bill into Parliament abolishing the Feudal System. His reforming zeal led him to abolish offices which he considered were sinecures. To the place-hunter this is the one unpardonable sin, and is sure to create enemies. Further, his undisguised contempt for anything in the nature of stupidity was a cause of offence to an even larger class. "I have not made up my mind yet who I shall vote for," said someone in the Wigtown burghs. "Well, when you have made up what you are pleased to call your mind, perhaps you will give me your vote," was the reply. To a Tory admirer who once said to him across the dinner-table, "Upon my word, Young, I'm thinking of joining your party," swift as lightning came the answer: "Oh, no, K. If I were you I wouldn't; the party is weak already." There was, moreover, a fearlessness in his Lordship's expressions of opinion at all times. Once pleading a case in the House of Lords he was interrupted by one of the judges, who said, "There is a remedy for every wrong, Mr Young." "No, my Lord," he replied; "if your Lordships should decide this case against me there is no remedy." He lived long enough to learn that even a House of Lords decision, when it results in practical absurdity, may be rectified, though only after expense, delay, suffering and commotion past all reckoning. A young man was once asked by Lord Young what he intended to become, and replied saying he meant to become a member of the W.S. Society. "Oh," said Lord Young, "I thought I had abolished that body when I was Lord Advocate," adding "How long does it take to qualify to become a W.S.?" On learning that it involved an apprenticeship of five years, he said, "Yes, I suppose that is on the principle, expressed by the Latin poet, nemo repente venit turpissimus, No man becomes a scoundrel all at once."

To say, as is the fashion, that Lord Young was not a successful judge may mean a great deal among lawyers. However, this was the very reason why he was such an interesting personality to the great body of his fellow-countrymen. They desired to see the law giving effect to their sense of what was right and equitable. Lord Young was accustomed to use the expression "the good sense and meaning of the transaction is this," and then to proceed to show what ought to be the law. If he thought the result of quoted cases was unjust, and if the precedents of learned legal pedants tended in that direction, then he had little or no respect for them. He was inclined to adopt the view that it would have been all the same if the whole of the old cases reported in Morrison's "Dictionary of Decisions" had been exactly the reverse of what they were. No wonder, perhaps, that those who, before everything, defer to precedents thought this was playing fast and loose with very serious matters.

He had a marvellous memory, and it was richly stored with splendid passages from the Bible, from the Book of Psalms, and from the Scottish Paraphrases. His knowledge of English literature, and particularly his love of poetry, were very marked, and he was accustomed to quote in old-world fashion from the great poets of the past. Wordsworth he knew thoroughly, and he had a particular fondness for stately passages from Tennyson. After repeating one of these he would relate how a friend once took Tennyson for a week-end to a country inn. When leaving on the Monday morning the friend thought the least he could do was to tell the innkeeper what a famous man had been living in the house. "My companion," he said, "is a poet. His name is Tennyson." The innkeeper replied, "A poet! damn him, and he has had the best bedroom."

Lord Young was all his life a lover of little children; their sayings, their ways, and their society were dear to him. No sight was more familiar on the streets of Edinburgh than his Lordship driving in his carriage with a child seated opposite him. Only once after his resignation did he ever drive up the Mound. It was too much for him, recalling too vividly the long years of strenuous professional toil, but he merely said, "I don't think we shall come this way again."

We rather think Sir George Reid painted Lord Young's portrait many years ago. It is to be hoped that in due time some representation of him may adorn the walls of the Parliament House to remind future generations of one of the greatest advocates whom Scotland has produced.

P. W. C.

No part of the "Scots Law Times" was issued last Saturday, as practically no reports were then ready for publication. The double numbers issued on March 30th and April 13th, at the close of Volume XIV., contained reports of (with one or two exceptions) all cases decided before 20th March. Very few cases have been decided so far this session, and, as the opinions of the Judges do not appear in the "Scots Law Times" until after they have been revised by their Lordships, some reports are not ready for publication for some time after the dates on which the judgments are given. In order that reports may be issued whenever they are ready, a double number of the "Scots Law Times" is published when required.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

The "Tactician."

Ship — Collision — Pilot.—A collision occurred through the fault of a compulsory pilot who was in charge of the defendants' vessel. Held that the defendants were liable in respect their master was also to blame, because he did not point out to the pilot that the plaintiffs' vessel was at the time of the collision stationary, the collision being caused by the pilot mistaking the lights of the plaintiffs' vessel for those of a moving ship.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Fletcher Moulton, L.J.).—12*th March* 1907.

James Nisbet & Co. Ltd. v. The Gulf Agency.

Copyright — Disjunction.— The plaintiffs, for the purpose of an annual publication which they issued, sent a list of questions to various persons, and from the answers compiled biographical notes which were contained in their annual publication. The defendants, who also issued an annual publication, copied from the plaintiffs' biographical notes. Before this action was raised the defendants sold their book with the copyright therein. Held that the plaintiffs were owners of the copyright in the biographical notes, and that they were entitled to an injunction against the defendants.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—13*th March* 1907.

Bank of England v. Cutler.

Reparation — Damages — Warranty.—The defendant filled up and handed to the plaintiffs a form containing certain particulars, and the plaintiffs thereupon prepared a transfer of India stock standing in their books in the name of M. M. P. The defendant went to the plaintiffs' bank with a woman whom he identified to them as M. M. P. (the defendant having the privilege of identifying holders of stock for the purpose of transfer in the bank books), and this woman executed a transfer of the stock in the name of M. M. P. The stock was afterwards transferred to a bona fide purchaser for value. The defendant had acted in this matter in the bona fide belief that the woman was M. M. P., but it afterwards transpired that the name M. M. P. signed by her was a forgery. When this was discovered the plaintiffs purchased in the market an equivalent amount of India Stock which they transferred to M. M. P. Held that the defendant, having requested the plaintiffs to perform a ministerial act, which they were bound to perform on request, in consequence of doing which they had suffered loss, was under obligation to reimburse them for the loss sustained.

The "Anselm."

Ship—Collision.—Held that the Rules for Preventing Collisions at Sea applied to the Para estuary, being an inland water in which the tide flowed which was navigable by seagoing vessels; that the provision making the Rules applicable to such waters was not ultra vires; and that a course dictated by good seamanship was a course "authorised by" the Rules.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Fletcher Moulton, L.J.).—13*th March* 1907.

Dakhyl v. Labouchere.

Reparation—Slander—Fair Comment.—In an action of damages for defamation against the proprietor of a newspaper on the ground that the plaintiff had been described as "a quack of the rankest species," the presiding judge directed the jury that a quack meant a pretender to skill which the pretender did not possess, and that if there was a personal attack the paragraph complained of could not be fair comment. Held that there had been a misdirection; that the judge had usurped the function of the jury in deciding the meaning to be attributed to the word "quack" as used in the passage; and that the defendant was entitled to the verdict of the jury on the questions (1) whether the statement was justified, and (2) whether, if not justified, it was fair comment.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Robertson, and Lord Atkinson).—14*th March* 1907.

Smith v. Associated Omnibus Co. Ltd.

Master and Servant — "Workman" — Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. cap. 90), sect. 10.—Held that the driver of a motor omnibus was a workman within the meaning of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—15*th March* 1907.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Law of Water and Water Rights in Scotland. By James Ferguson, K.C., Sheriff of Forfar (formerly Sheriff of Argyll and Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin and Nairn). Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907.

Price 45*s. net.*

The learned author of this treatise is well known as a Scottish legal writer. He has written the standard work on the Law of Roads, and is the part author of a well-known book on Railways. His experience as a judge in several counties with extensive sea-boards and abundantly supplied with rivers, must have given him a wide experience in legal questions connected with water. That fact, coupled with the acknowledged excellence of his previous books, ensures for the present volume a hearty reception. Its subject is one which has not hitherto been discussed in detail by any Scottish writer, and Sheriff Ferguson may be congratulated both on the choice of his subject and on the way in which he has dealt with it. The book, which extends to a little over 1000 pages (of which an appendix containing Statutes and Provisional Order Rules occupies over 400 pages), is divided into nine parts:—The Sea and Seashore; Public Rivers; Lochs; Private Rivers and Streams; Surface and Underground Water; Water Pollution; Water Supply; General Legal Responsibility and Statutory Rights; Canals, Ferries and Harbours. From these headings it will be seen that Mr Ferguson has taken a comprehensive view of the scope of his subject. Almost in every branch there are recent decisions of the Scottish Courts. The Moray Firth case in the Court of Justiciary, as to fishing in territorial waters; the case of the Dumfries Harbour Commissioners (14 S.L.T. 680), as to the defective state of a harbour bottom, in the Second Division; The Inveresk Paper Company (14 S.L.T. 790), as to the entering of a conduit in the Valuation Roll, in the Lands Valuation Appeal Court; and the case of Dougall v. Magistrates of Dunfermline (14 S.L.T. 656), in the Outer House, are among the recent judgments which are referred to in the text. There is a plentiful citation of English cases, and a detailed index adds to the convenience and usefulness of the book.

The Law of Building, Engineering, and Shipbuilding Contracts. By Alfred A. Hudson, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Third Edition, in two volumes. Vol. I. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1907.

Price £2, 12*s.* 6*d.*

Mr Hudson's work on Building Contracts is an eminently practical one. The author has technical knowledge gained as an architect, and that, added to his legal training, has contributed to the success of the former editions of this book. It first appeared in 1891. The second edition was issued in 1895, and the third edition, which has been brought down to date and much enlarged, is completed by the issue of this, the first volume. The second volume, which was noticed in the "Scots Law Times" some weeks ago, consisted of a digest of cases on the subject, many of which are not reported elsewhere, and contained numerous forms for use in building and engineering contracts. Vol. I. is in the form of a systematic treatise. The rules to be deduced from decided cases are stated with great clearness and precision, and the value of the work is enhanced by the "illustrations" of the rules, printed in smaller type, which contain more in detail the facts of the cases on which rules are founded. Mr Hudson has not only exhaustively dealt with English case law, but has noted the more important decisions of the Scottish, Irish and American Courts. He treats of the authority of architects and engineers, of their duties and liabilities, and of the charges which they are entitled to make. The chapter on "Tenders and Contracts" may be specially commended, also the chapter on the difficult subject of "Extras." But the excellence of the whole book is far above the average of legal treatises.

The Lawyers' Manual. Edited by R. Geoffrey Ellis, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, and Max A. Robertson, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London and Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907.

Price 10*s. net.*

The Lawyers' Manual of Reference is the successor of a publication of which two issues have appeared under the title of "The Law Annual." It contains considerable additional matter, and is somewhat altered in form and arrangement from its predecessors. It is subdivided into sections on the same principle as the Parliament-House Book, with which Scottish practitioners are familiar, and gives the text of a very large number of statutes applicable to England. An epitome of Colonial Law is a useful feature in the work, and a great deal of information is to be found in the 350 pages, which contain a "Compendium of Points of Law, alphabetically arranged."

The Late ALEXANDER HOWE, Esq., W.S.

By the death of Mr Howe, which took place on the morning of the 24th May, Forfarshire has lost one of her best sons and the legal profession one of its most able members. Born in the county town of Forfar on 26th April 1820, he had entered upon the eighty-eighth year of his age. He was the oldest W.S. engaged in practice, although his name stood third on the list of Writers to the Signet. He joined the Society in the year 1849. His life has been an example of continuous industry and quiet activity. Thrown on his own resources at an early age, he came to Edinburgh in the "Thirties," and good fortune secured him a place in the office of Mr John Mackenzie Lindsay, W.S., the Whig Crown Agent, afterwards Principal Clerk of Session, and later Director of Chancery. Mr Lindsay was not slow to recognise the abilities of his youthful assistant, who became his partner so long ago as the year 1844. Associated with them originally was Mr T. G. Mackay, W.S., and for many years the firm of Lindsay, Mackay & Howe carried on a large and influential legal and factorial business. The firm, during Mr Howe's connection with it, has from time to time changed in personnel and in name, but the subject of this notice has all along been its moving spirit and guide. He was a "born lawyer." No client ever had a sounder and safer adviser. Nothing left his hand half done. His draughtsmanship was characterised by lucidity and simplicity, and it may safely be asserted that no deed prepared by him ever required a law suit to settle its proper construction.

Though unknown to the present generation in Parliament House, Mr Howe's figure in days gone by was not unfamiliar there. Many important litigations have been successfully piloted by him, — notably the Stow and the Gask succession cases and the Awe Salmon Fishing suit.

Having lived to so great an age, and being of a retiring disposition, Mr Howe was known, even by sight, to comparatively few lawyers of the present day, but those with whom he did come in contact had the greatest respect and esteem for him. Combined with a dignified presence he possessed an urbanity of manner which had its own peculiar charm.

For several years Mr Howe was a Director of the British Linen Bank and of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, both of which positions, however, he resigned many years ago. At the time of his death he was an Extraordinary Director of the former institution.

In private life Mr Howe was a warm friend and a hospitable host. Many acts of kindness and charity were known only to himself and the recipient. Though taking no active part in public or municipal life, he contributed liberally to all deserving objects. To the end he was an expert and enthusiastic angler. Argyllshire latterly was his summer resort.

The Lord Justice-General left Edinburgh on Saturday, 1st inst., for London, en route for Royat, France. Lord Dunedin made an excellent recovery from the serious illness from which he suffered in autumn of last year, and it will be remembered that he was able to return to Court in December, at least a month earlier than his medical advisers expected. He has, however, been advised that to complete his cure he should now undergo a course of treatment at Royat, and he has gone there to take the waters. His Lordship hopes to return to Court on 3rd July, and on that day the first sitting of the Third Division will take place. Notice of this has been given by Act of Sederunt, which nominates the three Judges appointed to constitute the Court.

Act of Sederunt appointing Judges and Clerk for additional Division of the Inner House.—Edinburgh, 7th June 1907. The Lords of Council and Session, in pursuance of powers vested in them by the Court of Session Act, 1868, sect. 8, as amended by Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907, sect. 1, hereby appoint Lord M'Laren, Lord Pearson, and Lord Ardwall to sit on and after Wednesday, 3rd July 1907, as a Court for the hearing and disposal of causes standing on the Rolls of the First Division; and further, appoint Mr John Cairns, Depute Clerk in the Outer House, to act as Clerk of said Court.—J. H. A. Macdonald, I.P.D.

Sheriff M'Lennan, K.C., Sheriff of Caithness, Orkney and Zetland, has granted a commission as Honorary Sheriff of these counties in favour of Mr Thomas Mackenzie, Sheriff-Substitute of Ross, Cromarty and Sutherland at Dornoch. Sheriff Mackenzie holds the distinguished position of senior judge—not by age but by length of service—certainly in the United Kingdom, and probably in the British dominions. He was born in 1831, and was appointed a Sheriff-Substitute on 8th October 1859. His portrait appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. XI. p. 37.

The rule under which civil servants retire on attaining a certain age doubtless has many advantages, but it sometimes prevents the community getting the full benefit of the knowledge and experience of valued public servants. Mr William Andrew, who has been for many years in the office of the Solicitor of Inland Revenue at Edinburgh, retires this month, and his resignation will be much regretted in the Parliament House. He is well versed in all the intricate details of the often perplexing Revenue laws, and the courtesy with which he has always placed his knowledge at the disposal of his opponents has been much appreciated both by counsel and agents. Having retired from the public service, he has intimated that he is prepared to advise members of the legal profession with regard to questions in connection with the Death Duties, and to frame and to pass at the Inland Revenue Office the relative Accounts; to advise as to the stamping of Deeds, and to carry through the adjudication thereof; to prepare Returns of Income Tax and Claims for repayment of same; to carry through the registration of Companies under the Companies Acts; to attend to the insertion of Notices in the Edinburgh and London Gazettes. His business will be carried on in Glasgow as well as Edinburgh.

Mr Charles Powrie Campbell, The Ross, Glencarse, Perthshire, has been admitted a law agent by the Lords of Council and Session.

The Court will not sit on Friday, 28th inst., that day having been appointed by His Majesty's command to be kept as a Holiday in celebration of the King's Birthday.

Mr J. Ogilvie Grey, S.S.C. and P.N., 33 Castle Street, has been appointed by the High Court of the Orange River Colony a Commissioner in Edinburgh to examine witnesses and to take affidavits therefor.

Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts.—At a statutory meeting of the Society, held on 4th inst., the following appointments were made for the ensuing year, viz.:—President, Mr John Campbell; Vice-President, Mr William Robson; Fiscal, Mr Campbell Smith; Librarian, Mr John Mathison; Treasurer and Collector, Mr Charles Ritchie; and Secretary, Mr A. Ellison Ross. Messrs Robert Gray, LL.B., 45 Frederick Street, and John M'Clure Brodie, B.L., 44 Frederick Street, were admitted members of the Society.

The Hawick Police Treasurership.—At a meeting of Hawick Town Council on 31st ult., the question of filling up the vacant offices of Police Treasurer and Collector, formerly held by the late Mr Walter Haddon, was under consideration. The Provost's Committee stated that in terms of the remit they had reconsidered the whole matter, along with the summons served by Mr Adam Laing, Burgh Chamberlain, to have it declared that he was entitled to the office of Treasurer, and relative letter offering to have it settled by stated case or reference. This showed that Mr Laing did not now maintain a claim to the office of Collector. The Committee, without prejudice to the Council's legal rights or the claims of either party, now recommended that the office of Burgh Chamberlain cease to exist, and that the duties be merged in the Treasurer of the burgh; that Mr Adam Laing be appointed Treasurer at a salary of £130 per annum; and that Mr James Conn, solicitor, be appointed Collector to the burgh at a salary of £150 per annum, these appointments to commence on 15th August next, and to be held during the Council's pleasure, subject to three months' notice on either side, and each party to give security for £1000. On the motion of Provost Melrose, the recommendation was unanimously agreed to.

The Late P. A. Speirs, Esq., Advocate.—The death of Mr P. A. Speirs, formerly Sheriff-Substitute at Roxburgh, which took place at Bonjedward House, near Jedburgh, on the 26th ult., is much regretted by a large circle. During the last two or three years he had suffered from recurrences of severe illness, and though he possessed great recuperative power and was till recently in fairly good health, his death did not come as a surprise to his friends. He was a son of Mr Archibald Speirs, of the Honourable East India Company's Service, and a grandson of Mr Peter Speirs of Culcreuch, Stirlingshire. Born in 1842, he was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and took the degree of B.A. in 1864. Two years later he was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates. In 1877 he was appointed Sheriff-Substitute for the Skye district of Inverness-shire, and took up his residence at Portree. Nine years later he was transferred to Jedburgh as Sheriff-Substitute of the Counties of Roxburgh, Berwick and Selkirk. That office he held till 1897, when he retired on account of his health. In the ten years which have passed since then he was always ready to give the benefit of his experience and assist in the work of the Sheriffdom as an honorary Sheriff-Substitute. He discharged his judicial duties most faithfully. His work was done unobtrusively. A certain diffidence of himself led him to spare no pains in arriving at his decisions. He was eminently fair minded, had a sound judgment, and was courteous and patient to those appearing at his Court. In private life he had many friends, and they regarded him with real affection. He was fond of outdoor sports, and was an excellent shot. He was a Deputy-Lieutenant of Stirlingshire. A portrait of Sheriff Speirs appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. IV. p. 129.

At the Jedburgh Sheriff Court, on the 30th May, Sheriff Baillie, referring to the death of Mr Speirs, said that during his years of service in that Court its work had been most admirably and efficiently carried out. That was due to Sheriff Speirs, who brought to the discharge of his duties qualities which eminently fitted him for the position he held. With a sound and useful knowledge of the law of Scotland, he possessed many gifts of a high order. His innate and all-pervading kindliness would long be affectionately remembered in the county.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Lloyd's Banking Co. Ltd. v. Cooke.

Personal Bar—Bill of Exchange.—S signed in blank a stamped piece of paper which was to be filled in by C as a promissory note for £250, and paid to the plaintiffs in security of an advance of that amount. C filled it in for £1000, which sum the stamp covered, and which amount C received from the plaintiffs in return for the note. Held that S was estopped from denying his authority to fill in the amount of £1000.—Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Cozens-Hardy and Fletcher Moulton, L.JJ.).—1*st March* 1907.

Wilson & Furness-Leyland Line Ltd. v. British and Continental Shipping Co. Ltd.

Principal and Agent—Trust.—The defendant company, who acted as loading brokers for the plaintiffs, received advance freights and paid disbursements on their behalf, and from time to time rendered accounts showing the balance to the credit or debit of the plaintiffs. The money received for the plaintiffs was paid into the defendant company's general bank account with the plaintiffs' consent. On the defendant company's liquidation, held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to claim the money in the defendant company's general bank account as being advance freights collected and held in trust for them.—K.B. Div. (Walton, J.).—13*th March* 1907.

The "Crusader."

Ship—Master—Authority.—A ship having stranded, the master sent a letter to a firm who had acted as ship's agents at the last port of call asking for a powerful tug and saying that a salvage boat would be of assistance on the principle of "no cure no pay." The ship's agents hired a tug for which they became personally liable, and wired to the owners of the stranded vessel that their interests were being attended to. On the tug's arrival the master of the stranded ship refused her assistance except on the principle of "no cure no pay"; and an agreement was made between him and the representative of the ship's agents on board the tug for payment of £4000 if the vessel was floated and safely brought into the nearest port. The ship was floated and brought into port. In an action for payment of the £4000, held that the master of the stranded vessel had no power to enter into the above agreement on behalf of the owners, there being no necessity.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—15*th March* 1907.

In re Grant Richards. Exparte Deeping.

Contract — Breach — Bankruptcy. — An author sold the copyright in his book to the publisher for a royalty on each copy sold. The publisher became bankrupt. Held that the author was only entitled to a claim of damages, and that the money received for the sales was not received in trust to the extent of the amount of the royalties.—K.B. Div. (Bigham, J.).—18*th March* 1907.

Barnes v. Lucile Ltd.

Reparation—Damages—Dog.—In an action of damages for the bite of a dog, held that it was not necessary to prove that the dog had previously bitten anyone, if it was proved that the dog was at times of a ferocious propensity. —K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.). —19*th March* 1907.

Attorney-General v. London County Council.

Revenue—Income Tax.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIII. p. 68) reversed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, Lord Robertson, and Lord Atkinson).—19*th March* 1907.

Villar v. Gilby.

Will—Construction.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 4) reversed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, Lord Robertson, and Lord Atkinson).—19*th March* 1907.

Malone v. Laskey.

Reparation — Personal Injury. — The plaintiff was the wife of the manager of a company who were sub-lessees of part of premises belonging to the defendants. The lessee was Witherby, and the plaintiff and her husband lived on the premises. The defendants were under no obligation to repair the premises, but owing to complaints by the plaintiff and her husband to Witherby, transmitted to the defendants, they repaired a cistern, which was said to be in a dangerous condition, by putting a supporting bracket below it. The bracket fell and injured the plaintiff owing to (1) a (private) nuisance caused by vibration due to an engine on adjoining premises belonging to the defendants, and (2) defective workmanship in repairing the condition of the cistern. Held that the defendants were not liable in damages to the plaintiff.—Court of Appeal (Gorell Barnes, P., Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—20*th March* 1907.

His Majesty's Postmaster-General v. National Telephone Co. Ltd.

Statute—Telegraph Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. cap. 73), sect. 5.—Held that telegraphs do not fall within the exception of those "used solely for private use" unless they are used solely for the private use of the owner of the telegraph. Held also that the defendants by supplying and maintaining a fire-alarm system consisting of boxes in streets connected with fire stations, and an electric bell so placed as to enable tramway servants to warn members of a club of the starting of the cars, no telephone being attached in either case, and the owners of the lines being the corporation and the club respectively, were transmitting telegrams in contravention of the above Act. — Chan. Div. (Swinfen Eady, J.)—20*th March* 1907.

Statute—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. cap. 55), sect. 211 (1) (b).—Decision of Divisional Court (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 19) affirmed. — Court of Appeal (Cozens - Hardy, Vaughan-Williams and Buckley, L.JJ.).—21*st March* 1907.

Day v. Kent Collieries Ltd.

Company—Debentures.—A company issued debentures to rank pari passu, and it was provided that at a meeting of debenture-holders each should have one vote "in respect of every principal sum of £10 secured by the debentures." A bank held debentures as security for an overdraft. Held that they were entitled to a vote for every £10 of face value of debentures so held, although that was more than double the amount of the debt due. Held also that the company was entitled to take power to re-issue paid-up debentures to rank pari passu with the others.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.).—22*nd March* 1907.

Parkin v. South Hetton Coal Co.

Master and Servant—Wages.—A putter in a coal pit was paid according to the amount of coal drawn per day, but his wages were only payable fortnightly. Held that his wages accrued de die in diem.

Master and Servant—Breach of Contract. —The putters in a coal pit, who were under a fortnightly engagement, owing to a dispute about the wages due to one of their number, ceased work so as to lay the pit idle. Held that they had committed a breach of contract.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—23*rd March* 1907.

Oppenheimer v. Fraser & Wyatt.

Statute—Factors Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 45), sect. 2.—Decision of Channell, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 158), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Sir Gorell Barnes, Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—25*th March* 1907.

The Hopper No. 66.

Ship — Collision. — Decision of Bargrave Deane, J. (ante, Vol. XIII. p. 159), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Sir Gorell Barnes, Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—25*th March* 1907.

The King v. The Governor of Brixton Prison.

Criminal Law—Extradition.—A prisoner was convicted in absence in Belgium of larceny. According to Belgian law there was a prescriptive period after which he could not be punished. Before that period elapsed he was convicted and sentenced in England, and a magistrate made an order of committal for his extradition, such extradition to be carried out on the expiry of his sentence. His sentence expired after the prescriptive period according to Belgian law had elapsed. Held that the order for the prisoner's extradition was valid, and should be carried into effect.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—25*th March* 1907.

Latchford v. Kelsey.

Revenue—Excise.—A farmer who occasionally used a cart for conveying his farm labourers to and from their work had not taken out a carriage license. Held that he was not liable to conviction for keeping a carriage without a license.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—25*th March* 1907.

"The Commonwealth."

Insurance—Marine.—Decision of Bargrave Deane, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 19 sub nom. "The Welsh Girl") affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Sir Gorell Barnes, Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—26*th March* 1907.

Company—Winding-up.—An order made for the compulsory winding-up of a company while a voluntary winding-up was in progress, although the petitioner did not say that he would be prejudiced by a voluntary winding-up.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.).—26*th March* 1907.

Williams v. Richards.

Statute—Dogs Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. cap. 56), sect. 2.—Held that a dog may be proved to be "dangerous" within the meaning of sect. 2 of this Act by evidence of danger to other animals, and that evidence of danger to human beings is not necessary.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—26*th March* 1907.

North Staffordshire Colliery Owners Association v. North Staffordshire Railway Co.

Railway — Rates — Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 54), sect. 1 (1).—Held that sect. 1 (1) of this Act did not set up a standard of rates as at 31st December 1892 up to which they might be increased without the railway company being under the onus of proving the reasonableness of the increase, but that that onus was upon the company in the case of every increase.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—26*th March* 1907.

Evans v. Weatheritt.

Statute—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. cap. 63), sects. 9, 25.—In a prosecution for a contravention of sect. 9 of this Act the appellant proved a contract with a third party to supply the whole of his milk for twelve months, containing a sufficient warranty; the delivery of the milk sold to the prosecutor in the state in which it was delivered to him by the third party; and that he bought no milk from anyone else. The milk was delivered during the currency of the contract with a delivery order which made no reference to the contract. Held that the appellant had established the defence allowed by sect. 25.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—26*th March* 1907.

THE LORD ADVOCATE AND THE FREEDOM OF DUNFERMLINE.

The freedom of Dunfermline was conferred on Monday evening on Mrs Louise Whitfield Carnegie, wife of Mr Andrew Carnegie, and the Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., the Lord Advocate. The Town Council conferred the freedom on the Lord Advocate "in testimony of their admiration of his honourable character and eminent public services, and in recognition of the distinction his brilliant gifts and attainments have brought to this his native city of Dunfermline." The ceremony took place in St Margaret's Hall, and was attended by over fifteen hundred of the townspeople, to whom invitations had been sent. Provost Macbeth presided, and among others present were Mrs Shaw, Mr Carnegie, the Sheriff of Fife (Mr Cullen, K.C.), Lord Bruce, Mr John Ross, LL.D.; Mr John D. Hope, M.P.; Sheriff-Substitute Hay Shennan, Mr T. B. Morison, K.C.; Mr Robert Munro, Advocate; Mr W. Dunbar, Advocate; Mr M'Cormick, LL.D., Secretary of the Carnegie University Trust, and Dr Hew Morrison, Edinburgh. Apologies for absence were received from Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the Marquis of Linlithgow, the Earl of Elgin, and many others.

After the presentation to Mrs Carnegie, who made a short speech in reply, the Provost handed to the Lord Advocate a burgess ticket enclosed in a silver casket bearing the Shaw crest and the Dunfermline Burgh Coat-of-Arms. In making the presentation the Provost said that when he had the privilege, a few weeks ago, of proposing that the freedom of the city should be conferred on one who occupied a prominent position in the present Administration, the motion was carried without a dissentient voice. Many, both in the Council and Committee, thought Mr Shaw was worthy of the high honour because, amongst other things, of his politics, and others notwithstanding his politics. That was a fact of which any man might feel justly proud. They in his native city had watched his onward career with pride and affection. A son of Dunfermline in the beginning, he was now a son of the people. Belonging once to them, he now belonged to the nation. He was one of those "who never turned his back, but marched breast forward, never doubted clouds would break," and commencing life with no exceptional advantage other than the inestimable benefit of parents who lived for their home and their children, Mr Shaw entered on a strenuous life. Dux medallist at the High School of his native city, he at the University of Edinburgh proved himself to be an able and resourceful student, and both in his arts and law courses he upheld the promise of his youth. In 1886 he was appointed an Advocate-Depute, and in 1894 Solicitor-General. To-day he held the highest office attainable at the Scottish Bar. Trusted as the Lord Advocate is by his constituents, he had by sheer ability and force of character and high purpose made a place for himself in the House of Commons. It was not merely because of the exalted position which he held in the legal world, or as a man of letters, or in the world of politics, that they had assembled to do him honour, but also because of what he was as a man, who, during his whole career, had proved himself to be of unimpeachable character, of pure and lofty motive.

The Lord Advocate replied as follows:—

Mr Provost Macbeth, members of the Corporation, and my good friends and fellow-citizens of Dunfermline,—There are occasions in life when one is not only startled, but completely circumvented by human kindness. My appreciation of your goodness and my wonder at the situation in which I find myself help me to recognise that gratitude speaks best from silence. And yet your arrangements to-day have so hemmed me in that not only must I speak, but, alas, I must gratify your curiosity and suit the occasion by certain allusions in the odious vicinity of autobiography. Why you should compel me to this I do not know. Not even my allegorical progenitor—who, I suppose, was the prodigal son—had this put upon him. I have come back amongst you, and you have, so to speak, fallen on my neck and kissed me, all, of course, in a strictly proper and a strictly metaphorical sense. You have even served up for me the fatted calf. There it is in that silver casket. But I fear you have done violence to Scripture in the remainder of the story. It is not said that the prodigal was asked to give to the festive meeting any account of his ongoings during his absence; and the fact that it is recorded that "they began to be merry," makes it clear to my mind that there were no speeches on the occasion. Yet, as I say, you have mastered and circumvented me: I must stand and deliver. Let me tell, therefore, my brief story to you with becoming modesty and without affectation.

Mr Provost, your eloquent words, while they have greatly erred in their indulgence towards myself, do, I know, sincerely express the affection towards me of this "Auld Grey Toon." This is a very precious burgess ticket, and these are very precious words, to me and mine. To be accounted so worthy by those I hold so dear, it would require a heart of marble to resist the impression that all this ceremony makes. You have conferred upon me the greatest honour which it is in the power of any community to bestow, upon either son or stranger. The stranger you adopt, and by the act you add to his high distinctions; me you do not adopt. I am, I always have been, and always shall be, your own.

Looking round me to-day, I reflect how the scene has changed. Two generations have passed—from youth to age, from age to memory; all the activities of my manhood have been spent elsewhere, and yet when I return in answer to your kindly summons, I recal in the faces, both new and old, which greet me here, the lineaments of former days; and the power of old associations gets its grip upon me. How—to take only one instance—how can I fail at this moment to realise that within a stone-throw of this building rises the venerable Abbey, and that in its shadow, ever as the day declines, the curfew booms across my father's and my mother's grave? Are these sad memories? Nothing of the kind. Of him—he died in my infancy—I of course remember little. His reading and his faculty for humour and pith in closing a discussion became proverbial, and for many years any saying at once weighty and witty was wont to be dubbed by his name. And I remember those who had been his friends from youth—men like the late Provost Whitelaw—paying their tribute to his character by conjuring me to be like that good man my father. Of her—it would not be fitting that I should publicly venture on that hallowed ground. Her infinite forbearance with the little dare-devil of a boy left on her hands; the memory of it all amazes, humbles me. The mother of Thomas Carlyle used to declare that "her Tammas was a gey ill man to deal wi'," and Froude, the historian, shakes his head over this and mourns and misquotes it. He might have spared himself the trouble. How could an Englishman understand? The same thing has been said of much smaller Thomases than Carlyle. My mother said it a hundred times of myself, but it conveyed not a spark of reproach; it was a term of real endearment. So long as the principle was sound—and I admit that she was stern enough on that head—she encouraged the energy, and she defended even its irksomeness with her quaint proverb, "Rather a coal than a clod!" Gradually, even through the frolic of youth, some ideas became instilled and very plain—as, for instance, this about work and play—that scamped work was always mean, and good fun was always clean; or this other—that the regulation pattern did not matter over much if only the heart kept sound. And so adventurous freedom had its run, and forbearance watched it with a caution and a smile.

That forbearance and that fine association of goodness with warmth of heart, penetration of judgment, and strength of mind, these very things met me again at the next and final stage of my career in this town. It happened in this way. I had got my schooling at the High School of Dunfermline, and being dux medallist just as I had turned fourteen I became conscious that I was past the available machinery for secondary education, and neither fit in years nor attainments to enter the University. There struck me as something wrong here, and I made a mental note of it. The gap I refer to, the career which appeared closed but which I felt should be open, these things have changed much since my boyhood, and in the years of my public career I have humbly tried to help the change. As it was, I had to be set to something, and so found myself starting a legal career with, after a little, the unbounded advantage of being the confidential helper of Dr John Ross. He, to my delight, worked upon the very same maxims, practised the very same abounding forbearance, and showed in his character the very same association of goodness with clear-sightedness and strength, as those with which I had become familiar from my earliest days. But, of course, he introduced me to a wider ambit of knowledge and experience. And it was in him that I saw, as in a fine and living picture, what are the qualities — accuracy, ungrudging industry, tenacity of purpose, and sureness of hand—which, with the elevation and persuasiveness which can alone spring from a love of letters, are the qualities which go to the wise guidance and courageous management of men and of affairs. So far as Dunfermline is concerned that is about all the story which I dare tell. The old High School had given me of its best; and the gap which I then deplored in my scholastic life had been, as I discovered later, more than filled up by an inkling of business and of knowledge of the world. As to the love of work, it was not that I had learned in part to "scorn delights and live laborious days," but that I had also learned that that line represented only half of the greater truth, namely, that laborious days are themselves a delight and that there are an exhilaration and a joy in achievement. And so Dunfermline's share in me, that about which you asked me to speak—at least, its open share in me—seems to come to a close. You see for yourselves the advantages. They were not strictly derived from place or climate, from traditions or surroundings, but from near association with what transcends all these, that best product of any city, good men and women. Rest assured, citizens of Dunfermline, that the secret of your worth and greatness lies just there. Not your golden fortunes, or that kings were born or dwelt within earshot of where we stand; not that your merchandise still grows in volume, or that you hold your place in the material advancement of the world. Not that, but rather this: that, freshly inspired by all these things, you keep in your midst, or send from amongst you to the bounds of the earth, good men and women.

Such memories as these are too often made the occasions of municipal self-glorification. Now, I may say at once that I doubt the wisdom of the practice, and I do not come to praise you but to show you a much greater respect. You get impatient, do you not, with the trumpetings of self-praise by a man? Tell me, if you please, wherein is the difference in moral quality between such trumpetings on the part of a man or on the part of a city, a kingdom, or even an empire? My view is the very simple one that the wider the area of vainglory, the bigger is the blow to self-respect. But yet when I think of it, how infinitely larger are your possibilities and your chances now even for that best product to which I have referred! Your High School on its secondary and its technical sides is on a scale unknown in my youth, and ranks with the best in Scotland. In your College of Hygiene you are the pioneer in a too neglected branch of education; and in your Carnegie Trust a colossal fortune will be more and more employed in initiating you not only into the delights but the practice of art. Yet all these things come to you, I feel assured, not as a privilege of slothfulness and pleasure, but as a call to culture of the mind and of the spirit, to those gentler manners which are civilisation's finest fruit, to the uprooting of vulgarity in every habit of your community's thought, and to that distinction at once in achievement and in virtue which can make any city famous in the annals of the world.

The philosophy of the entourage, the theory that surroundings are everything and that we are the children of circumstance, all that is already somewhat passé. I never much believed in it, inclining always to the view which squared with Scottish independence of mind, that man was man and master of his fate. Persons are more than circumstances, but the interaction of personal influence, the power of personal associations, the uplifting of words of cheer, the restraining of words of counsel, the force of personal example, these things, through every part of my life's experience, I have come to prize more and more highly as the leverage, not only of kinship, but of progress. I well remember, for instance, how in my young manhood, when philosophy and history and law were each presenting their attractions, when I was lecturing in the University on the one, writing on the other, and practising the third, one kindly figure appeared in each arena to beckon me onward —Calderwood to make me his assistant professor; Masson to put me on the staff of the "Britannica"; and Lord President Inglis, by kindly appreciation which I shall never forget, cheering me in the practice of a learned profession. Help indeed, counsel, encouragement, and over them all that great forbearance to which I have referred,—these things have been experienced by me also at every later stage from men of marked distinction. Did I labour in public affairs? Say it was the Church. Having been brought up to believe that principles which are worth holding are worth fighting for, when a time of testing and of suffering came, and my wig happened to be on the green, then it was that my association with Dr Rainy became much closer, and there ensued an intimacy of converse with him which will ever remain one of the serenest pleasures of memory. Say it was education. What I believed in and was fighting for seemed to very estimable men to be but a dream —beyond the attainments of a frugal nation: and suddenly a large measure of realisation took place by the world-famous University benefaction of two million pounds sterling by a fellow-townsman, Andrew Carnegie—and the privilege was given to me of association with one of the most notable bands of trustees that any nation has ever seen, headed by your neighbour, Lord Elgin. Was it the stormier world of politics? It was the same story repeated,—of encouragement, counsel, forbearance. And, however humble may have been my function in the co-operation, yet to have passed through storm to sunshine with one who has become the Prime Minister of this country, and who daily adds lustre to the greatness of that pre-eminent position—these are experiences very striking and memorable. But the interest of Dunfermline in them is peculiar, and is this—that, as you will have observed, the bulk of these experiences have been gained in association with the burgesses of your own good town, Dr Ross, Lord Elgin, Mr Carnegie, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman! And so to-day I am humbly filled with a great thankfulness that you have been pleased to place me on your burgess roll and by their side. I begin to think that there must be something in a place after all, and that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in my philosophy. What the magic is I know not, but the fact is distinctly notable that among them, your burgesses have no small share in managing the affairs of the British Empire and even the philanthropy of the world.

I wonder if another dream of mine will ever come true? You hear the plea so frequently made for a great national school of art, and that is well. But I remember that some of the greatest triumphs of art were achieved by municipalities no bigger than your own, so that the schools of Pisa, Bologna, Verona and Venice, to name no others, have left to the world the finest trophies of the imagination of man. If it is replied to me that these municipalities had their great patrons, men of rank, men of wealth and high estate, I answer that you too have your Grand Duke whose lavish generosity outdistances the gifts of a score of Italian princes. There is the beginning of much in this direction in Scotland already. Glasgow has its noted school, Aberdeen struggles upward, and Dundee makes its beginning. Perhaps in the fulness of an early time the art of Dunfermline, the fruit of enlightened imagination working upon a most romantic history, may yet enrich the world. Very well indeed do I know that the actual government even of a small city like this is engrossed, not with these dreams, but with those details which concern the hardships, the squalor, the misery, the social curses which afflict large sections of our population. May you have enlightenment and strength, preserving these higher ideals to which I have alluded and wielding these instruments for advancement with which you are so favoured, to address yourselves to this humble daily task of civic effort in such a manner as to justify your high opportunities and character.

I shall conclude with two brief words. The first is one devoted to personal regard. The charm of this occasion is increased to me and mine by the fact that to-day you do honour to Mrs Andrew Carnegie. I will only say of her husband, what I fear he has very often declared of my own case, that I know not how in the world he came to the good fortune of such a wife. I dare not presume to touch upon her character. You will find it sketched beforehand in the last chapter of the book of Proverbs. But I may say that the grace of your act and the grace of your lady burgess are worthy of each other. As for myself, I leave you with this final word. Amid the struggles of a pretty full and strenuous life, in all the services to which I have been or may be called, in all the posts of duty, humble or high, which I have been or may be charged to fill, I trust that in the future, as in the past, there will ever remain for me among the incitements to fidelity, the thought of the kindly watching eyes of my fellow-citizens and the desire to do no discredit to the town which bore me.

Mr Carnegie, in the course of a speech later in the proceedings, said: I wish to say this about Mr Shaw. It was reading his article in the "Nineteenth Century Magazine" that first attracted my attention to the question of Scottish Universities and the great idea of opening the door, free from the schools, into the universities, without money and without price. I wish to make that public recognition which brought me in communication with him, and that is the way that I came across the great idea in the whole affair.

JOHN LAMB, Esq.,

ADVOCATE.

Mr John Lamb, who belongs to a well-known Brechin family, was born in 1871 and was educated at Merchiston Castle School—an institution in which he takes great pride, and of which he is, and has been for some years, a Director. After leaving school he proceeded to the University of Edinburgh, and graduated there as Master of Arts in 1894. Thereafter he entered the office of Messrs Tods, Murray & Jamieson, W.S. (of which his uncle, Mr George Dalziel, is a partner), and had the benefit of two years' training in its Parliament House department. In 1897 he was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates.

Mr Lamb has for long been known as an independent thinker, and has made a close and thorough study of political questions. A convinced and enthusiastic Liberal, he worked hard for his party. He acted as Treasurer, and afterwards as Secretary, of the Scottish Reform Club, and the efficiency of the electoral machinery of the Liberal Party in Scotland in 1905 was in no small measure due to his energy. In 1906 he was nominated by the Secretary for Scotland as Secretary of the Royal Commission on Registration of Title in Scotland, and a few months later the Lord Advocate appointed him his Legal Secretary in room of Sheriff Gardner Millar. For a few months before he went to Dover House he acted as Reporter for the Official Reports of the High Court of Justiciary.

Mr Lamb has many personal qualities which singularly fit him for the post of Legal Secretary. His duties are responsible, and often require delicate handling, but he is amply endowed with tact, shrewdness, industry, and common sense; he is always courteous, and his work is never either scamped or allowed to fall into arrear. He is rapidly becoming as popular at Westminster as he is in the Parliament House.

The House of Lords has this week been busy with Scottish Appeals. On Tuesday their Lordships delivered judgment in the cross appeals in the case—the last of a long series—between the Clippens Oil Company and the Edinburgh and District Water Trustees. Both appeals were dismissed, the House finding no sufficient reason for disturbing the award of £27,000 of damages given by the First Division. The judgment is among our reports issued this week. The opinion of Lord Collins in the case is the first which his Lordship has delivered in a Scottish appeal. Two other Scotch cases have been heard, Colquhoun v. Glasgow Faculty of Procurators' Widows' Fund, and Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Dunlop Motor Co., in both of which judgment has been reserved. The appeal by the Bile Beans Manufacturing Company has been or is to be withdrawn, and there is now only one Scotch case standing for hearing. The list of English appeals is also almost exhausted, and the House has not been so well abreast of its judicial work for many years.

Resignation of Professor Kennedy of Aberdeen.—Mr N. J. D. Kennedy, K.C., Professor of Scots and Roman Law in the University of Aberdeen, has intimated, by letter which was read at the meeting of the Aberdeen University Court on Tuesday, that he is to resign that office at the end of the academic year in September. This step is taken in consequence of his recent appointment to the Sheriff Principalship of Renfrew and Bute. The Court resolved to advertise for a successor, and to proceed to the appointment at its next meeting in July. The salary attached to the Law Chair at Aberdeen is £600 per annum.

Mr Robert Stewart Brown, 33 Marchmont Crescent, Edinburgh, has been admitted a Law Agent by the Lords of Council and Session.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Wagstaff v. Jalland.

Will — Construction.—The testator W. went through the form of marriage with D. J. in the knowledge that she was a married woman. He left a will in which, after a gift to "my wife D. W.," he gave the annual produce of his residuary estate to "my said wife during her life if she shall so long continue my widow for her own use and benefit, and from or after her decease or second marriage," etc. He died while D. J.'s husband was still living. Held that D. J. was entitled to the annual produce of the residuary estate.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—26*th March* 1907.

Perkins v. Stead.

Master and Servant — The Contract — Master's Liability.—The defendant purchased a motor car in London, the vendors providing a driver to drive the car to Barnet, from which place the defendant's driver was to drive it to the defendant's house. On the road to Barnet, the defendant and his driver being passengers in the car, the plaintiff's motor bicycle was injured through the negligence of the person supplied by the vendors to drive the car. Held that the defendant was liable, on the ground that that person was at the time his servant.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Bray, J.J.).—9*th April* 1907.

Adamson v. Adamson.

Husband and Wife—Desertion.—A husband left his wife and told her that she would get nothing from him unless she agreed to sign a deed of separation, when he would make her an allowance of £1 a week. She had a child three months old, and had no friends to go to and no means of subsistence. She signed the deed. Held that she was not thereby a consenting party to the separation.—P. D. and A. Div. (Bucknill, J.).—9*th April* 1907.

Newmark v. The National Phonograph Co. Ltd. and The Edison Manufacturing Co. Ltd.

Copyright—Copyright Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. cap. 46), sect. 2.—Held that a phonographic record on a wax cylinder was not a sheet of music, and therefore a book in the sense of sect. 2 of this Act.—K.B. Div. (Sutton, J.).—10*th April* 1907.

Leicester & Co. v. Cherryman.

Statute—Pawnbrokers Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. cap. 93), sect. 30.—Held that an order made under sect. 30 of this Act did not preclude the owner of the stolen goods from exercising his common law rights for their recovery.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Bray, JJ.).—12*th April* 1907.

Hull Steam Shipping Co. v. Lamport & Holt.

Ship — Charter-party. — The defendants chartered a ship belonging to the plaintiffs to go to, inter alia, the Boca and there deliver cargo "at the customary discharging places named by the charterers' agents into lighters or alongside . . . . wharves as per bills of lading." The owners authorised the charterers "to sign bills of lading for the cargo as usual," and the cargo was to "be brought to and taken from alongside at the charterers' risk and expense." The charterers signed a bill of lading for cargo to be discharged at D's wharf at the Boca. On reaching that place the ship was not allowed to discharge except at one place on account of explosives being on board, and D's goods had to be lightered. Held that the charterers were liable for the lighterage.—K.B. Div. (Channell, J.)—15*th April* 1907.

Friendly Society—Expulsion of Member.—The rules of a friendly society stated that "it shall be exclusively composed of members of the Loyal Orange Institution of England." A member of the society was expelled from the Orange Institution, and the society thereupon passed a resolution expelling him from membership. Held that he was not entitled to be reinstated as a member of the society.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Bray, JJ.).—16*th April* 1907.

Hooper v. Furness Railway Co.

Carrier—Liability.—The plaintiff went for an evening cruise on one of the defendants' steamers. During the cruise he purchased a ticket which contained conditions relieving the defendants from liability for their servants' negligence. The plaintiff did not read the conditions, and no sufficient notice was given to him that the ticket contained conditions. His hand was injured owing to negligence on the part of servants of the defendants. Held that he was entitled to recover damages from them.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Bray, JJ.).—16*th April* 1907.

Thellusson v. Valentia.

Club—Alteration of Rules.—Decision of Joyce, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 5), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Kennedy, L.J.).—17*th April* 1907.

Mayor, etc. of Hastings v. Letton.

Company — Dissolution — Lease — Termination.—A lease was granted to a company, and there were two sureties for payment of the rent, the lease containing an express clause binding the sureties to pay. The company was dissolved. Held that the dissolution of the company terminated the lease, and that the sureties were no longer liable for the rent.—K.B. Div. (Darling and Phillimore, JJ.).—17*th April* 1907.

Jude v. Reid Brothers Ltd.

Copyright—Assignment.—Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 94), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—19*th April* 1907.

Simon v. London General Omnibus Co. Ltd.

Reparation—Negligence.—When the plaintiff was a passenger on a bus belonging to the defendants, the driver drove round a corner close to the curb, with the result that the plaintiff's elbow, which was projecting over the rail, came in contact with a fingerpost affixed to an electric standard, and was injured. The fingerpost was almost flush with the curb. Held that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the driver of the bus.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Bray, JJ.)—20*th April* 1907.

Waddington & Sons v. Neale & Sons.

Principal and Agent—Mercantile Factor—Factors Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 45), sects. 2, 7.—The plaintiffs employed H to sell pianos for them. H gave a piano to the defendants, a firm of auctioneers, to be sold by auction, and received an advance of £10. H then disappeared. The plaintiffs then claimed the piano from the defendants, who refused to deliver it up. The piano was sold by arrangement, and the defendants refused to pay over the price except under deduction of their costs and the £10. Held that the defendants were not protected by the Factors Act, and were bound to pay over the whole price.—K.B. Div. (Darling and Phillimore, JJ.)—20*th April* 1907

White, Tomkins & Courage v. Wilson.

Contract—Illegal—Restraint of Trade.—The defendant entered into a contract of service with the plantiffs which provided that he would not for a period of five years after leaving the plaintiffs' employment enter or be in the employment of any house carrying on the business of manufacturing or producing any special product as therein defined, or carry on or be engaged in any such business, but there was an exception in favour of any business not competing or calculated to compete with the plaintiffs. Held that the stipulation was not so unreasonable as to be void.—Chan. Div. (Swinfen Eady, J.).—24*th April* 1907.

Bist v. London and South-Western Railway Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1907 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (2) (c)—Serious and Wilful Misconduct.—A railway engine-driver was killed through breaking a rule of the company forbidding any driver or fireman leaving the footplate while the engine was in motion. He knew the rule, and no reason for the breach was proved. Held that he was guilty of serious and wilful misconduct.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Earl of Halsbury, Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, and Lord Atkinson).—25*th April* 1907.

Hooker v. Gray.

Criminal Law—Cruelty to Animals Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. cap. 92), sect. 2.—The respondent shot at his neighbour's cat with a saloon rifle, wounding it severely. The cat crawled into its owner's premises, where the respondent lost sight of it. The owner of the cat found it twenty minutes later in great pain, and had it destroyed. Held that the respondent was not guilty of a contravention of sect. 2 of this Act.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and Phillimore, J.J.).—25*th April* 1907.

Sherwell v. Combined Incandescent Mantles Syndicate Ltd.

Company—Allotment.—The directors of a company got copies of a prospectus headed "strictly private and confidential, not for publication." These were circulated privately by the directors among their friends. Held that this was not an offer of share capital to the public for subscription within the meaning of sect. 4 (1) of the Companies Act 1900.—Chan. Div. (Warrington, J.).—26*th April* 1907.

Hoare v. Robert Green Ltd.

Statute — Factory and Workshop Act 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 22), sect. 149.—In a room at the back of a florist's shop women were employed in making wreaths and crosses, etc., such articles being made with flowers and wooden frames. Held that the room was a workshop within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and Phillimore, JJ.).—26*th April* 1907.

Star Omnibus Co. Ltd., London, v. Tagg.

Motor Car—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. cap. 77), sect. 30—Locomotives on Highways Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. cap. 36), sect. 1.—Held that the offence created by sect. 30 of the Act of 1878 of using a locomotive on a highway which did not consume its own smoke did not refer to the case of smoke caused by the negligence of a driver in supplying an excessive quantity of lubricating oil to the working parts of the machinery. Held also that the section could not apply to a car, which came within the exemption given by sect. 1 of the 1896 Act.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and Phillimore, JJ.).—26*th* April 1907.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

Encyclopædia of the Laws of England, with Forms and Precedents, by the most eminent legal authorities. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Vol. IV. Corporation to Domicile. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 21*s. net.*

In October of last year we noticed the issue of the first volume of the new edition of this encyclopædia, and already the fourth volume—which completes a quarter of the whole publication—has made its appearance. The promptitude with which the work is being issued has in no way interfered with the thoroughness of the revision. Among the more important subjects dealt with in this volume are "Costs," "County Courts," "Criminal Law," "Demurrage," "Defamation," and "Domicile." Mr Odgers, K.C.; His Honour Judge Smyly, K.C.; Mr Justice Phillimore, Mr Manson, Mr Cyprian Williams, and Mr Fitzgerald, K.C., are among the contributors to the volume. Mr Justice Wood Renton, one of the editors, is himself responsible for the revision of many of the articles.

The Law of Meetings. By James Muirhead, Member of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow. Glasgow and Edinburgh: William Hodge & Co., 1907. Price 3*s. net.*

The subject of this handbook, if a small and special one, is by no means free from difficulty. The conduct of a meeting is looked at from all aspects—that of the Chairman, the Clerk, and the ordinary members present. The author discusses the notice requisite for a meeting, the quorum, the standing orders, the resolutions, the debate and the taking of votes, and many other subjects. The text is adapted and amplified from the author's well-known work on the "Law of Municipal and Police Government in Burghs," and contains much information in a convenient form.

The Juridical Review, Vol. XIX. Part I. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907.

This part of the Juridical Review contains a variety of excellent matter—literary, antiquarian, and historical, as well as of practical legal interest. The work of Frederic William Maitland is discussed by Mr D. P. Heatley, and the history of the Earldom of Norfolk (the subject of a recent judgment in the House of Lords) by Mr R. Geoffrey Ellis, Barrister-at-Law. A very readable article is contributed by Mr Inglis, advocate, on "Eighteenth Century Pleading." He has examined a number of volumes of old Session papers, and he quotes from them many passages illustrating the style of pleadings written by Robert Dundas of Arniston (the first Lord President of the name), and many other distinguished advocates and judges. Mr Campbell Lorimer, K.C., deals with "Insurance as Affecting the Measure of Damages," and suggests an uncontentious bill on the subject which, he thinks, might pass through Parliament even in this crowded session. Mr W. C. Smith, K.C., discusses the "Appropriation of Trust Funds to Legacies," and a number of recent books are reviewed.

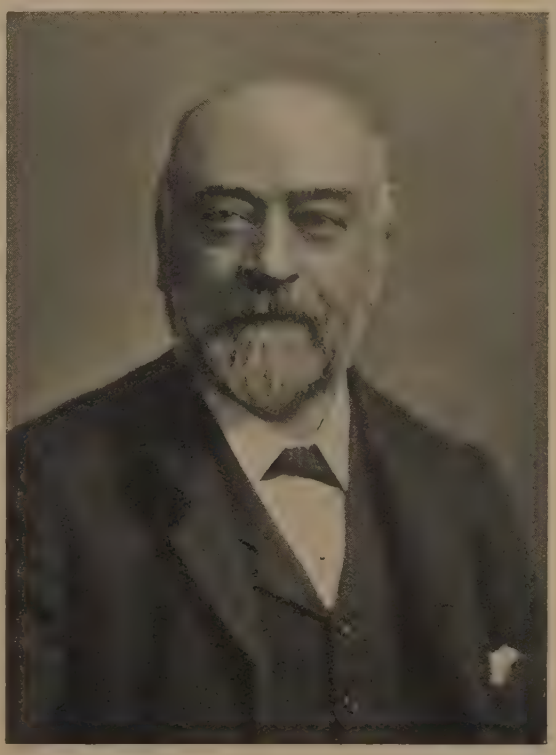
Lawyers' Reference Book. Published by Sweet & Maxwell, London, 1907. Price 2*s.* 6*d.*

This book contains (1) complete chronological lists of English, Scotch, Irish, and Canadian Law Reports, showing the period covered by each series; (2) lists of English Law Reports from 1810 to 1907, showing the year covered by each volume; (3) a list of abbreviated citations of Law Reports; (4) a table of Regnal Years from 1 William I. to 6 Ed. VII., showing the dates of commencement and end of each year; (5) a table shewing the corresponding volumes of the old reporters and the revised reports. These items are all useful; but No. 5 would be more generally acceptable if the corresponding volume of the complete reprint of the old reports, "The English Reports," were given as well as the volume of the "Revised Reports." Also, the list of Scotch reports requires some revision.

The Late ALEXANDER FORBES, Esq.,

Formerly Principal Keeper of the Register of Deeds.

We regret to record the death of Mr Alexander Forbes, which took place on the 11th inst. Mr Forbes came in contact with many members of the legal profession in the course of his duties at the Register House, where there was no more obliging, courteous, or painstaking official. He enjoyed a well-deserved popularity both among his colleagues and in a wide circle of friends.



Born at Stonehaven in 1834, he attended school there, and at the early age of fourteen proceeded to the University of Aberdeen. After attending classes there he returned to Stonehaven and served an apprenticeship with the late Mr John Falconer, writer, in that town. In 1852 he came to Edinburgh and obtained from Mr George Kinloch, then Principal Keeper of the Register of Deeds, a place in that department. In 1856 he entered the Law Faculty in Edinburgh University, and in 1858 he qualified as a Solicitor. In 1866 he was promoted to be an Assistant Keeper of the Register of Deeds, and nineteen years later he succeeded the late Mr Murdoch as Principal Keeper. That office he held till his resignation, under the age limit rule, in 1899.

Since then, till about a year ago, when his health began to fail, he employed his leisure in gardening and walking. He also rode on a tricycle—an art which he acquired after he had reached his sixty-fifth year. He was a staunch Conservative, but did no active political work; he, however, took a keen interest in the affairs of the parish of Liberton, where he resided for more than twenty years.

Mr Forbes was predeceased by his wife, who died in 1889. She was a sister of the late Mr James Henderson, publisher in London, to whom Stevenson submitted "Treasure Island," and who accepted and published it in "Young Folks." Mr Forbes is survived by five sons, one of whom, Mr J. Wright Forbes, is a well-known member of the Junior Bar.

THE COST OF EXTRADITION.

The question of the extradition of criminals has recently been brought prominently before the public by the trial of a case in which it was held that an escaped French convict from Devil's Island could not be extradited to France because he was found to be a British subject. But the matter of extradition is one which has a more practical interest in Scotland. Every few months it happens that a person who has embezzled a considerable sum of money escapes from Scotland to some foreign country. Seldom, if ever, is any attempt made to bring him back to be tried for his crime. This is due to the fact that the Treasury will not pay the expenses of bringing back a fugitive offender whose crime was against property. Only on condition that the private party who has been aggrieved will guarantee all the expenses of extradition and bringing back will sanction be given for steps towards arrest and extradition. Unless the injured party, who may have been robbed of every penny he possesses, is able and willing to find the money and thereby to feed his revenge, the offender goes scot free.

This rule is, it is thought, quite inconsistent with our criminal system, whereby, as the law is now administered, the public prosecutor is recognised as the proper person, and the only proper person, to investigate and prosecute crime, and private prosecution is discountenanced and virtually obsolete. Unfortunately embezzlement, and that often on a large scale, is a growing offence in this country, and its prevalence is inimical to financial confidence to a degree disproportionate to the actual number of offences. It ought, therefore, to be most sternly and rigorously dealt with. But the embezzler is just the kind of criminal who finds it easiest to start for a foreign shore before his crime is found out. Hence the necessity for extradition if the law is to have real terror for this class of offender. Why should a wholesome administration of the law be left to be dependent upon the resources and the personal lust for vengeance on the part of the person whose money has been appropriated? Why should this unfortunate, who is a taxpayer and who is entitled to the protection of the law, be required to spend some of such means as the defaulter has left to him in paying for the vindication of the public law of the land, or else be content to see that law set at defiance and the thief snapping his fingers both at his creditor and the law from some foreign retreat?

C. N. J.

Faculty of Advocates.—Mr Patrick Johnston Ford, B.A. Oxford, LL.B. Edinburgh, was on the 14th inst. admitted to the Faculty of Advocates.

Mr C. T. Couper, advocate, one of the Principal Clerks of Session, who has not been in his place in the First Division since the commencement of the Summer Session, has obtained leave of absence on account of the state of his health.

Mr Laing, K.C., has been elected a Bencher of the Middle Temple, in succession to the late Lord Young. Mr Laing, who is a leading practitioner in the Admiralty Court, was called to the Bar in 1883, and took silk in 1899. The youngest son of Mr Robert Laing, at one time town clerk of Jedburgh, he was born in 1856.

The annual meeting of the American Bar Association will be held at Portland, Maine, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, 26th, 27th, and 28th August 1907. The International Law Association is considering holding its meeting in America this year, and the suggestion has been made to that body to hold its meeting in Portland on the last three days of the same week.

Mr David Taylor, solicitor, lately managing clerk to Messrs J. & A. F. Adam, W.S., Edinburgh, and Mr Charles Powrie Campbell, solicitor, from the office of Messrs Macandrew, Wright & Murray, W.S., Edinburgh, have commenced practice at 61 George Street, Perth, under the firm name of Taylor & Campbell.

The Late J. M. Lely, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.—Mr John Mountney Lely died at 23 Summer Place, Onslow Square, London, on 12th June. Mr Lely, who was born in 1839, was educated at Cheltenham College and Magdalen College, Oxford. Called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1869, he joined the Oxford Circuit, but he early devoted himself to legal literature rather than to the practice of the law. No name appeared more frequently than his on the title-pages of law books. He was joint-author of "Lely and Agg's Agricultural Holdings," "Lely and Foulkes's Licensing Acts," and "Lely and Foulkes's Judicature Acts"; he was author of a work on the law of municipal corporations, and of another on the legal position of the Church of England; he was editor of "Wharton's Law Lexicon," "Chitty's Statutes of Practical Utility," "The Annual Statutes," "Woodfall's Law of Landlord and Tenant," "Hodges' Law of Railways," and "Chitty on Contracts." He supplied "The Times" with its annual survey of legislation. Few men had a better knowledge of the Statute-book, and none was more persistent in condemning the inconvenient and mischievous system of legislation by reference. His death, which will be widely regretted, has brought to a close a career of much industry and worth.

THE BENIGNANT CONSTRUCTION OF CHARITABLE BEQUESTS AS ILLUSTRATED IN THE DICK WILL CASE.

As the latest exposition of the law as to the validity of charitable bequests the judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session in the case of Dick's Trustees v. Dick and Others, reported in the current volume of the "Scots Law Times," at p. 43, affords a fresh illustration of the length to which the doctrine of the benignant construction of charitable bequests has been carried. By this judgment the right of the late Mr James Dick's trustees has been established to divide the residue of his estate, amounting to £600,000 or thereby, among such "local or charitable institutions and schemes already constituted, or which may hereafter be constituted," as they may select, and that at such time and in such proportions all as they in their absolute discretion may deem proper. Apart from the designation of the purposes of the bequest, the specialty in the case, which afforded to the next of kin their principal ground of challenge, arose from the very wide powers conferred upon the trustees in regard to the administration of the trust. By the trust disposition and settlement it was provided that the trustees should have "the fullest powers of and in regard to realisation, investment, administration, management, and division as if they were beneficial owners"; and it was further declared that the trustees might, should they in their discretion see fit, retain the investments of which the trust estate consisted at the truster's death, "for such time or times as they might think fit, or indefinitely." For the next of kin it was contended that the bequest was void, having regard both to the scope of the purposes declared, and to the wide discretionary powers conferred upon the trustees—a view which has been negatived by the Division.

Special interest attaches to the judgment of Lord M'Laren in the expression of his opinion as to the unfortunate results which may arise from the extension of the doctrine of the benignant construction of charitable bequests. While concurring in the judgment of the Court, his Lordship stated: "I may, however, be allowed to say that I think it is a subject of regret that our law has given such a very wide extension to the doctrine of the benignant construction of charitable bequests. In the earlier cases on the subject we know that the decisions related to estates of moderate amount, and in these cases we have indications either of the parties or of the localities that were to be benefited, with directions that clearly pointed to the immediate realisation of the testator's wishes. But in the progress of the law these restrictions have been gradually and insensibly removed. Now, as I think, it results from all the authorities that the expression 'charitable purposes,' in a bequest of residue, coupled with the appointment of persons who are to administer that bequest, suffices to exclude the next of kin, even where the will contains no evidence that the testator had ever applied his mind to the consideration of what was to be done with his estate, or that he had any other motive than that of disappointing the expectations of his next of kin. . . . In the present state of the case law on the subject, I think it must be left to the House of Lords, either in its judicial or legislative capacity, to determine within what limits the right of charitable disposition is to be allowed." The opinion of Lord M'Laren raises an important issue which is worthy of careful consideration, for there can be little doubt that if the decision in the Dick will case is to stand as the last word on the subject, it will afford encouragement to testators who desire to defeat the legitimate expectations of their next of kin, and may lead to an abuse of the powers of testamentary disposition.

The attitude of the House of Lords in its consideration of bequests in general terms has hitherto been well defined. The criterion which has in each case been applied, is, whether the testator's intentions in regard to the disposal of his estate are expressed with sufficient clearness and certainty as to amount to a proper exercise of the power of testamentary disposition, or whether he has in effect delegated to his trustees or executors, by conferring upon them a wide discretion, the power to make a will for him. In the latest House of Lords case, that of Grimond or Macintyre v. Grimond's Trs., reported in 7 Fraser (H.L.) 90, the Lord Chancellor, in the leading opinion, stated the ground of judgment in the following words:—"In my opinion the testator here has not given a class from which he allowed his trustees to select individually, but he has left his directions so vague that it is in effect giving some one else power to make a will for him instead of making a will for himself, which I conceive to be the objection always entertained where the directions are so extremely vague that you cannot say what it is that the testator meant." In that case the direction to the trustees was to divide a portion of the residue of the testator's estate "to and among such charitable or religious institutions and societies as my trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, may select." The decision, no doubt, turned upon the use of the word "religious" in defining the class, but the Lord Chancellor's judgment in effect proceeded upon the wider ground that the trustees' discretion in selecting the objects from such an indefinite class was so enlarged as to enable them to make a will for the testator. Although the purposes in the Dick case are probably such as the House of Lords would give effect to, standing alone, the addition of the wide discretionary powers conferred upon the trustees in the realisation, distribution, and administration of the estate introduces into the case the same element which lay at the root of the judgment in the Grimond case, viz., an absolute discretion on the part of the trustees in dealing with the bequest. While the restriction of the limits within which the application of the rule as to the benignant construction of charitable bequests has already been recognised and approved by the House of Lords is now a matter which can only be dealt with by the Legislature, the specialties referred to in the Dick case which distinguish it from all the previous cases under review, might afford to the House of Lords in its judicial capacity, and without violation of precedents, the opportunity indicated by Lord M'Laren of strictly determining the limits within which the right of charitable disposition is to be exercised.

Kettlewell v. Refuge Assurance Co. Ltd.

Principal and Agent—Fraud of Agent—Liability of Principal.—The plaintiff K took out a policy of insurance with the defendants on the life of a third person. After one year she told the defendants' agent that she would pay no more premiums, and she was induced to go on paying by the agent, who told her that after five years she would be entitled to the policy free of future premiums. After the five years the defendants claimed further premiums, and the plaintiff sued for the return of the four years' premiums.—Held that she was entitled to recover.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore and Bray, JJ.).—3*rd May* 1907.

Levene v. Tichener.

Statute—Moneylenders Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. cap. 51), sect. 1.—In consideration of an advance of £50 the defendant gave the plaintiff a promissory note for £70, to be paid by twenty-three weekly instalments, and in the event of default in the payment of any instalment or part thereof, the whole was to become payable.—Held that the bargain was unconscionable and should be re-opened.—K.B. Div. (Channell, J.).—4*th May* 1907.

Holdsworth v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Insurance Co.

Principal and Agent—Liability of Principal—Knowledge of Agent.—A policy of insurance under the Workmen's Compensation Act was issued to the plaintiff by the defendants. The policy proceeded on a proposal in which the plaintiff was described as a joiner, which had been drawn up by E, an agent of the defendants, and signed by the plaintiff without reading it. The plaintiff was a joiner and builder, and this was known to E. When the plaintiff saw the policy he refused to accept it until the words "and builder" were added to his designation. These words were added by E, after communicating with a branch office, but the alteration was not brought to the notice of the head office, and the policy was accepted and premiums paid on it. Held that the defendants were bound to relieve the plaintiff of a claim under the Act on account of an injury to a builder's labourer in his employment.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.).—7*th May* 1907.

Wilkinson v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.

Criminal Law—High Treason.—A foreigner living in British territory, whose own country was at war with Britain, rendered services to his own country, as he was compelled to do by the laws of his country, while the troops of his country were in occupation of that part of British territory where he resided and the British troops were temporarily withdrawn. Held that he was rightly convicted of high treason.—Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord Atkinson, and Sir Arthur Wilson).—9*th* May 1907.

THE LORD PRESIDENTS.

XIII.—SIR HEW DALRYMPLE OF NORTH BERWICK, Bart.

Sir Hew Dalrymple occupied the Presidential Chair for almost forty years, holding the office for a very much longer period than any of his predecessors or successors.

The third son of the first Viscount Stair, Lord President of the Court of Session, Hew Dalrymple was born in 1652 and admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1677. When his elder brother held, at the same time, the offices of Scottish Secretary and Lord Advocate, Hew Dalrymple appeared on several occasions to represent the Crown in the Court of Justiciary as "substitute to their Majesties' Advocat." This arrangement seems to have lasted for nearly a year, but afterwards the Solicitor-General, Sir William Lockhart, appeared to prosecute. Sir James Stewart succeeded the Master of Stair as Lord Advocate in 1692. He was also Dean of Faculty, but he resigned that office in 1695, and Hew Dalrymple was chosen in his place. The first Lord Stair died in 1695, and the office of Lord President remained vacant for three years, but on 17th March 1698 Hew Dalrymple was nominated to the post. In April of the same year he was created a Baronet. He did not take his seat till the meeting of the Court in June, and in connection with his elevation considerable discussion took place as to whether he should pass his trials like any other Lord of Session. It was suggested that as the Lord President never sat in the Outer House it was unnecessary that he should undergo his Outer House trials, which then lasted three days, but a majority of the Judges decided that he should undergo the same trials as any other Lord Probationer.

Sir Hew Dalrymple sat in the Scottish Parliament from 1698 to 1702 as Member for New Galloway, and from 1703 till the Union as Member for North Berwick, from which latter place he took his judicial title of Lord North Berwick. In 1706 he was appointed one of the Commissioners for accomplishing the Union, a measure which he had all along supported. He was one of the Trustees for the Improvement of the Fisheries and Manufactures of Scotland.

Though he had not the distinguished talents of his father, his contemporaries regarded him as one of the best Presidents ever known, and he was described as "one of the compleatest lawyers in Scotland." Strained relationships existed for a time between him and Lord Chancellor Seafield. The Chancellor claimed the right to preside in the Court and subscribe the decisions. The President so much resented this that for a considerable time he absented himself. He appears to have allowed the business of the Court to get into great arrears, which his successor Duncan Forbes took pride in clearing off in little more than a year. In 1726 he desired to relinquish his duties, and went to London to try to arrange for his resignation with a pension equal to his salary. Sir Robert Walpole, however, considered that the granting of the pension would be a bad precedent, and told him that the King so valued his services as President that he could not do without them. He returned to Edinburgh, and remained head of the Court till his death in 1837, in his 85th year. His collection of decisions of the Court of Session from 1698 to 1720 was published in 1758. One of his sons, also Hew Dalrymple, was appointed a Senator of the College of Justice in 1726. He took the title of Lord Drummore, and for eleven years sat on the Bench along with his father.

The portrait which we reproduce is by Aikman, and was presented by the Lord President to the Faculty in 1722.

The Lord Justice-Clerk left Edinburgh on Friday of last week to attend His Majesty's garden party at Windsor. His Lordship was prevented by slight indisposition from returning to Edinburgh on Monday, and was absent from the Second Division on Tuesday. He resumed his seat in Court on Wednesday. The Lord Justice-General, who has derived much benefit from his stay at Royat, expects to be in Court on Tuesday. On that day Lord M'Laren will be absent, as he is to preside along with Lord Salvesen at the Glasgow Circuit. On Wednesday the first sitting of the Third Division will take place. Lord Dundas will leave the Outer House to make one of the quorum in the First Division, and the three Divisions of the Inner House will be constituted as follows: First Division, The Lord President, Lords Kinnear and Dundas. Second Division, The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling and Low. Third Division, Lords M'Laren, Pearson and Ardwall.

Court of Session Notices.—The sittings of the First and Second Divisions of the Court for the trial of civil causes by jury in the ensuing vacation will commence on Monday, 22nd July next; and notice of trial must be given on or before Thursday, 4th July. Agents giving notice for trial, and those who have already given notice, must hand forthwith to the Keeper of the Rolls of the Division in which the cause is to be tried, a copy of the closed record and adjusted issue or issues. The Lords appoint Thursday the 15th day of August and Thursday the 26th day of September to be box-days in the ensuing vacation. The Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills will sit in Court on Wednesday, 21st August, and Wednesday, 2nd October, each day at 11 o'clock forenoon, for the disposal of motions and other business falling under the 93rd section of The Court of Session Act 1868 and the 10th section of the Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907; and rolls will be taken up on Monday, 19th August, and Monday, 30th September, between 11 and 12 o'clock.

GAME.

By Henry H. Brown, Procurator-Fiscal at Cupar.

The eccentricities of Parliamentary drafting are familiar to all lawyers. They are the cause of frequent difficulty and doubt, and have led to the expenditure of much money which might have been more profitably employed. There is something very peculiar, however, about that eccentricity to which I am going to refer. One would have expected that the county gentlemen who shot it, and the cabinet ministers who ate it, would have had their minds definitely made up as to what they meant by "game," and what animals they wished to protect under that term. Ridiculous blunders in conveyancing or procedure statutes may be excused on the plea that the subjects of these measures are technical and not "understanded of the people." But game—the daily subject of conversation of half the members who then constituted both Houses of Parliament, the constant theme of discussion at county meetings and at sessions—might have been thought to be a thing so clearly defined that no possible doubt could exist as to what was comprehended by the term. We shall see that there is hardly any subject of legislation that has been subjected to so much manipulation as this word of four letters. It is safe to say that barely two Game Acts extend their protection to the same group of living creatures.

The most comprehensive definition of the term is contained in the third section of the Game Laws Amendment (Scotland) Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. cap. 28): "The word 'game' shall include all the animals enumerated in the Game Acts or any of them." The first schedule furnishes a list of the Game Acts, and, if we run over the principal ones, we shall soon perceive what a heterogeneous mixture of beasts and birds they enumerate.

(1) The Scots Act 1587, cap. 43, mentions harts, hinds, does, roe, hares, rabbits and "other beasts."

(2) The Game (Scotland) Act 1772 (13 Geo. III. cap. 54) mentions the hare, partridge, pheasant, muirfowl, ptarmigan, heathfowl, snipe, and quail.

(3) The Night Poaching Act 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 69) defines game as including hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath or moor game, black game and bustards, but extends its protection to rabbits.

(4) The Game Act 1831 (1 & 2 Will. IV. cap. 32), an English Act partly extended to Scotland, defines game in the same way as the Night Poaching Act, but adds, for England, other species.

(5) The Game (Scotland) Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. IV. cap. 68) speaks of "game" without defining the word, and adds to the term deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, and rabbits.

(6) The Game Licences Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. cap. 90) refers to "game" without definition, but as it partly incorporates the Act of 1831 (No. 4 above), the definition in the latter Act probably applies to this one. It adds woodcock, snipes, quails, landrails, rabbits, and deer.

(7) The Poaching Prevention Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 114) defines "game" as hares, pheasants, partridges, woodcocks, snipes, rabbits, grouse, and black or moor game. The eggs of the game birds, excluding woodcock and snipe, are also protected by this Act.

Out of all this catalogue the most authoritative definition is undoubtedly that given in the Night Poaching Act, and repeated, directly, in the English Game Act of 1831, and by implication in the Scottish Act of 1832. It is a faulty one. It includes the bustard, a bird practically extinct in Britain at the passing of the Act, and which is now never seen except as an occasional migrant. One might as well charge a man with being in pursuit of the great auk, as of a bustard! Then it omits woodcock, snipe, and quail, which are among the finest of edible wild birds, and which are especially in need of protection. To make amends for this, it includes the same birds twice. It names grouse, heath game, moor game, and black game, apparently oblivious of the fact that the red grouse is the moor fowl, and the blackcock is the heath fowl. Game, therefore, for practical purposes merely includes hares, pheasant, partridges, grouse, and blackcock. At least this is so, if we are to accept the definition of 1828 as conclusive.

But supposing we hold this definition as sufficient, with the addition of rabbits, for the protection of game by night, what is to be the rule by day? This leads us to a fresh eccentricity of draughtsmanship. The Game (Scotland) Act 1832, while it forbids illegal trespass on land by day "in search or pursuit of game," nowhere explains what is understood by the word "game." The blunder seems incredible, but is readily accounted for. Sect. 1 of the Scottish Act of 1832 is copied from sect. 30 of the English Act of 1831, and the copyist omitted to observe that the word "game," standing by itself, is intelligible in the English statute, which has an interpretation clause, but not in the Scottish statute, which has none. It has been the practice of our Courts to supply the lack of a definition by reading into the Act the English one, which is the same as that in the Night Poaching Act.

The varied and often doubtful interpretation of the essential term is not the only peculiarity of the Game Acts. Others might be mentioned; for example, the anomaly that the Court can forfeit and destroy a net if a police constable has found it in the possession of a poacher on the highway, when he is not using it, but cannot do so if the poacher has been caught on land red-handed, making use of the net for poaching; or the absurdity that the Procurator-Fiscal, who can on his own application obtain a warrant to arrest a man upon a charge of murder, cannot procure a warrant to cite a poacher under the Poaching Prevention Act unless his application is fortified with an oath of verity. But what would it avail? Those slipshod statutes have for three-quarters of a century regulated a matter in which tens of thousands of persons are deeply interested, and in which hundreds of thousands of pounds are annually expended, and they will continue to do so, for it is not likely that, in the spirit of the present day, any Government will bring in a Bill to facilitate the working of the Game Laws.

GARRISON v. BAR CRICKET MATCH.

This annual game was played on Monday at the Grange ground, Raeburn Place. The weather, unfortunately, was unfavourable, rain falling steadily until almost one o'clock, and it was consequently after two before a start was made. Although the sun shone brightly in the afternoon there was a much poorer attendance than usual. During the afternoon the band and pipers of the Seaforths played selections.

Winning the toss, the Garrison went first to the wickets and totalled 94 runs, of which Capt. Lumsden was top scorer with 31. The Bar batsmen made a disastrous start, G. A. Smith being clean bowled by the first delivery. C. J. L. Boyd played a splendid innings for his side, but none of the others managed to stay with him, and the innings closed for 76, of which Boyd took 55 not out; the Garrison thus repeating their victory of last year. Bowling for the Garrison, Lumsden had 7 wickets for 28, and for the Bar, Orr took 7 wickets for 56 and Chapel 3 for 32.

THE LATE JOHN FRASER, ESQ., SOLICITOR, KEITH.—The death is announced of Mr John Fraser, solicitor, Keith, a gentleman well known in legal circles in the North of Scotland. Enrolled a law agent in the year 1865, Mr Fraser had built up a considerable business, and had the reputation of being a sound and cautious adviser. For a period of over forty years he had taken an active part in public matters, not only in Keith, but also throughout Banffshire. For many years he was a member of the old Parochial Board, and later was Chairman of the Parish Council of Keith. He had also been Chairman of the Keith School Board, of which he had been a member for over twenty years. More lately he was a magistrate of Keith. He had also been for many years Assessor in the J.P. Court. Mr Fraser's death has caused great regret in the community in which he lived, where his qualities of head and heart were very highly esteemed.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Craxton v. Craxton.

Husband and Wife—Desertion.—Held that a husband could not be held to be in desertion while he was suing his wife for divorce.—P. D. and A. Div. (Bucknill and Bargrave Deane, JJ.).—8*th May* 1907.

Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Cardiff Gas Light and Coke Co.

Statute — Gasworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. cap. 15), sect. 6.—Held that a gas company was entitled, under sect. 6 of the above Act, to dig a trench in the surface of the road over a bridge belonging to the plaintiffs and lay a gas main resting on the structure of the bridge.—Chan. Div. (Swinfen Eady, J.).—10*th May* 1907.

Andersen v. Marten.

Insurance—Marine.—A marine policy containing the clause "warranted free from capture" was effected on a vessel which was captured while on a voyage during the Russo-Japanese war. She was being taken to port when she became a total loss. She was afterwards condemned by a prize court. Held that the condemnation related back to the time of capture, and that the vessel had been lost to the policyholders by capture.—K.B. Div. (Channell, J.).—10*th May* 1907.

Pickfords Ltd. v. London and North-Western Railway Co.

Railway—Rates.—In cases where a railway company gives a rebate to a trader on the ground that the trader does his own carting, held that the correct basis for the calculation of the rebate is to be found, not in disintegrating a collected and delivered rate in order to discover what sum was really charged for cartage, but in the cost of the service rendered and the saving to the railway company when the trader does his own carting, but without allowing anything for profit, which, along with cost, would make up the charge.—Rail. and Can. Com. (Bigham, J., Hon. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy and Sir James Woodhouse).—11*th May* 1907.

Fine Cotton Spinners' and Doublers' Association Ltd. and John Cash & Sons Ltd. v. Harwood Cash & Co. Ltd.

Company—Name—Trade Name.—J. Harwood Cash was one of the managers of a mill belonging to the plaintiffs. He left their employment, and, in company with others, formed the defendant company to carry on a similar business to that of the plaintiffs in the same town under the name of Harwood Cash & Co. Ltd. Held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction against the defendants carrying on business under a name of which the word "Cash" formed a part without clearly distinguishing their goods and business from those of the plaintiff.—Chan. Div. (Joyce, J.)—13*th February* 1907.

In re Pontardawe Rural District Council Election. Hodgson v. Evans.

Election Law—Voting.—At an election in which there were nine candidates and five vacancies, an elector voted correctly for five candidates, and in the voting space opposite the name of a sixth he put a cross and enclosed it with a circle which touched the ends of the lines of the cross. Held that he had recorded six votes. Another voter had put a cross opposite the name of one candidate, and on the margin of the paper opposite the name of another candidate but outside the space for voting, he put a stroke like the figure 1. Held that the stroke was a vote.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Phillimore, JJ.).—13*th May* 1907.

Von Eckhardstein v. Von Eckhardstein.

International Law—Husband and Wife—Separation.—A wife raised an action of separation against her husband in England, the domicile of the spouses being in Germany, but their matrimonial home in England. Her husband applied to have the action of separation stayed on the ground that he had raised an action of divorce against her in Germany for disobedience. Held that the Court in England had jurisdiction to entertain the action of separation, and application refused.—P. D. and A. Div. (Bargrave Deane, J.).—13*th May* 1907.

Arbitration — Jurisdiction — Railway—Demurrage.—Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 32) affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.)—13*th May* 1907.

Sir DAVID BRAND,

ADVOCATE.

In the list of birthday honours published on the 28th of last month is the name of Mr David Brand, upon whom the King has conferred a knighthood. Among the younger generation of the members of Faculty Mr Brand is not a familiar figure, as his duties as Chairman of the Crofters Commission have necessitated his being absent from the Parliament House. But by those who recollect him when he was yet practising he will be remembered as a vigorous and striking personality.

Mr Brand was educated at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Heidelberg Universities, and at the last of these he took the degree of Doctor Utriusque Juris. He was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates in 1864. His sound knowledge of law, and his forcible and energetic style of pleading, speedily secured for him a large junior practice. The Courts could always rely on Mr Brand presenting his argument in terse and vigorous terms, and his pleading was marked by strong common sense.

Mr Brand threw himself with his characteristic enthusiasm into the arena of politics, and along with the late Mr J. J. Reid (a brother of the present Lord Chancellor), was at the head of a band of zealous young Liberal workers who organised the first Midlothian campaign.

Under the Liberal Government of 1880 Mr Brand was appointed an Advocate-Depute. In any prosecution committed to his charge Mr Brand thoroughly mastered the whole facts, and while keen in prosecuting where he thought justice demanded it, he was always dominated by a desire to do what was fair and just towards the prisoner at the bar. In 1885 he was appointed Sheriff of the important county of Ayr. In that capacity he has earned the respect and confidence of the local practitioners by his courtesy and the soundness of his judgments.

On the passing of the Crofters Act Mr Brand was appointed the first Chairman of the Crofters Commission. Few people can understand the difficulties of such a position. The Act had been passed in the teeth of strenuous opposition, and every act of the Commission was watched with the most jealous eye by its opponents. Forms of various kinds of writs had to be drawn up, rules of procedure had to be laid down, and the services of various officials organised. While this was being done there was the constant pressure of multitudes of applications from every part of the districts to which the Act applied. Moreover, there were no precedents to guide those who had charge of the Commission. The Act was a novel remedy for a long-standing grievance, and there was little in the previous law which could in the matter of procedure be usefully employed in its working. The main brunt of these difficulties fell on the Chairman, who was the legal member of the Commission. Upon all questions involving forms of procedure and legal disputes they naturally looked to him for guidance. Mr Brand's sympathy with the crofters, and his anxious desire to be fair and just to the rights of the landlord, stood him in good stead. Moreover, his exact knowledge of legal procedure, and his sound grasp of the principles of law, enabled him to cope with the difficulties of the position in a manner which would have been impossible to anyone without his training. Comparing the working of the Crofters Act with that of similar Acts elsewhere there can be no doubt that it has been attended with marked success. No small amount of this has been due to the patience, the energy, and the ability of the Chairman.

In the course of the discussions on the land question in the Highlands, disputes arose as to the land available for the formation and extension of the crofters' holdings. A Commission was appointed in 1892 to enquire into the whole question. Mr Brand was appointed Chairman of this Commission, which sat for three years, and its labours resulted in a most interesting and valuable report on the present condition of the Highland crofters, the occupation of the land, and the feasibility of the extension of crofters' holdings.

Since 1897 Mr Brand has also been a member of the Congested Districts Board. As Sheriff of a maritime county he is a Commissioner of Northern Lighthouses.

In private life Sir David Brand is one of the kindliest of men, with a strong vein of humour. He is an accomplished reciter, and has been known to declaim some of the great passages of Shakespeare, his favourite author, with great skill and animation.

All those who know and value the Sheriff's work, and they are many, will warmly congratulate him on the honour which the King has conferred on him.

The Lord President resumed his seat in the First Division on Tuesday morning. His Lordship has derived considerable benefit from his sojourn at Royat.

The first sitting of the Third Division—or, as it is officially called in the Rolls of the Court of Session, "The Extra Division"—took place on Wednesday. Lord M'Laren returned from the Glasgow Circuit in order to preside in the new Court, leaving Lord Salvesen to finish the criminal business in Glasgow. The Extra Division is sitting in the Justiciary Court Room. There is no formal transfer of cases to it, but a roll is to be put out each week composed of cases standing in the rolls of the First Division. The Extra Division will sit next week, and afterwards for some time in the Winter Session. A sitting of the Justiciary Appeal Court is expected to take place in the last week of the Session.

Faculty of Advocates.—A meeting of the Faculty of Advocates was held on Tuesday afternoon—Mr James A. Fleming, Vice-Dean, presiding. A Committee was appointed to receive and dispose of applications for the Chrystie bursary, which is in the patronage of the Faculty. It was announced that Mr Charles E. Green had offered to present to the Faculty an original portrait of Sir Walter Scott, by Andrew Geddes, A.R.A. The Faculty agreed to accept the gift, which will be hung in the hall, and thanks were conveyed to Mr Green for his interesting and valuable donation.

The Chair of Law in Aberdeen University.—The following is a complete list of the candidates for the Chair of Law in Aberdeen University:—Alexander Morris Brown, M.A., LL.B. (Edinburgh), J.M.D. (Heidelberg), 5 Merchiston Crescent, Edinburgh; Henry H. Brown, solicitor, Procurator-Fiscal of Fifeshire, County Buildings, Cupar-Fife; Duncan M. Burden, M.A. LL.B. (Edinburgh), solicitor, 20 Whitehall Street, Dundee; Charles R. A. Howden, M.A. (Edinburgh), advocate, assistant to the Professor of Scots Law, University of Edinburgh; James Mercer Irvine, M.A. (St Andrews), B.Sc., LL.B. (Edinburgh), advocate, Edinburgh, Lecturer in Civil Law, University of Glasgow; William Charles Smith, K.C., M.A., LL.B. (Edinburgh), advocate, Edinburgh; Robert Moir Williamson, M.A. (Aberdeen), LL.B. (Edinburgh), advocate, Aberdeen. The appointment is to be made on Tuesday.

The Legal Profession in the King's Birthday Honours List.—The legal profession does not bulk very largely in the list of honours announced on Friday of last week, but it is not unrepresented, and on this occasion Scotland has not been entirely forgotten. The knighthood conferred upon Sheriff Brand, of whom we publish a portrait this week, is welcomed in the Parliament House, although the learned Sheriff is personally unknown to the younger generation of pleaders there. Mr Eugene Wason, the member for Clackmannan and Kinross, who has been created a Privy Councillor, is nominally a member of the profession. He was called to the English Bar in 1870. Six years later he became a solicitor, but in 1885 he resigned that position and rejoined the Bar. For some years he acted as assistant examiner to the Incorporated Law Society. He succeeded the late Lord Kinross as member for Clackmannan and Kinross in 1899, and previously he represented South Ayrshire. He has recently come into prominence as Chairman of the Scottish Committee of the House of Commons. Mr John Emmott Barlow, who is one of the new baronets, was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1884, but does not practise. Among the new knights is Sir Alfred Billson, M.P., who is a solicitor. He was admitted in 1860, and is a member of the firm of Oliver, Jones, Billson & Co., Liverpool. Mr Francis Oppenheimer, His Majesty's Consul-General at Frankfurt, who is a member of the Bar at the Middle Temple, has also received a knighthood. The honour of K.C.M.G. has been conferred upon the Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick, K.C., Minister of Justice in the Dominion of Canada since 1901. He was admitted to the Canadian Bar in 1876, and has held several legal offices in Canada. The honour of knighthood has been conferred upon the Hon. W. Mortimer Clark, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. Mr Clark, who was born in Aberdeen in 1836, was admitted a member of the W.S. Society in 1859. He emigrated to Toronto, and was called to the Bar there in 1869. In 1890 he was appointed a Queen's Counsel, and has since held many important offices. In the Colonial Office list of new knights are also the names of Francois Charles S. Lengelier, Assistant Chief Justice, Superior Court, Quebec, and William Henry Soloman, Senior Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of the Transvaal. Sir H. A. White, solicitor to His Majesty the King, who was admitted a solicitor in 1873, and received a knighthood in 1897, has been appointed a Commander of the Royal Victorian Order.

The subject of the portrait in our next issue will be:—

The Late Charles M'Kie, Esq.,
Sheriff-Clerk of Dumfriesshire.

THE TAXATION OF FEU-DUTIES.

DEPUTATION TO THE PRIME MINISTER FROM LEGAL SOCIETIES AND OTHER PUBLIC BODIES.

On Friday the 28th ult. the Prime Minister received in his private room in the House of Commons several deputations on the subject of the taxation of feu-duties fixed under existing contracts. These were (1) from the leading Societies of Solicitors in Scotland; (2) from owners of feu-duties in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and elsewhere; and (3) from the Associated Life Assurance Offices of Scotland. With the Prime Minister were the Secretary for Scotland and the Lord Advocate.

The following were the representatives of the Legal Societies: Mr George M. Paul, Deputy-Keeper, Mr John Cowan, Treasurer, Professor Mounsey, Mr William Garson, and Mr H. E. Richardson, representing the Society of Writers to the Signet; Mr John Campbell, President, and Mr Charles Ritchie, Treasurer, of the S.S.C. Society; Mr James A. Reid, LL.D., Dean, and Mr J. T. T. Brown, of the Faculty of Procurators, Glasgow; Mr James Ross, President, and Mr William Smith, of the Society of Advocates, Aberdeen; Mr J. P. Kyd, the Faculty of Procurators, Dundee; and Mr G. D. Ballingall, the President of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents.

Among other legal gentlemen present were Mr Christopher N. Johnston, K.C., Sheriff of Perth; Sir Henry Cook, W.S.; Mr Nevill Dundas, W. S.; Mr G. J. Wood, W.S.; Mr David Campbell, S.S.C.; Dr David Murray, Writer, Glasgow; Mr W. J. Alexander, Writer; Mr Ledingham, S.S.C., Aberdeen; Mr Macindoe, Kirkcaldy; and Mr Peter Macnaughton, S.S.C., Secretary of the Deputation. Among the non-legal gentlemen present were Lord Overtoun, Sir Andrew Macdonald, Mr James Chatham, Manager of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael, Bart., and many others. The deputation from the legal societies was introduced by Mr Caldwell, M.P., who informed the Prime Minister that Mr George M. Paul, Deputy-Keeper of the Signet, would address him on behalf of the Societies.

Mr Paul said—The Societies which this deputation represents, and which are the largest and most influential societies of solicitors in Scotland, are (1) the Society of Writers to the Signet; (2) the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts of Scotland; (3) the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow; (4) the Faculty of Advocates in Aberdeen; (5) the Faculty of Procurators and Solicitors in Dundee; and (6) the Incorporated Society of Law Agents in Scotland. By the accident of my being president of the senior Society of those represented by this deputation, the duty has devolved upon me of making the Societies' statements to you.

The Societies feel deeply grateful to you for the honour you have done them in so kindly agreeing to spare them a portion of your precious time in order that they might state to you the grounds of the strong feelings which they entertain as to the injustice which would result if effect should be given to the recommendation of the Select Committee, passed by a bare majority, that liability should now and for the first time be laid upon the owners of feu-duties fixed under existing contracts of relieving the owner of the ground in respect of which they are payable of a proportionate share of local burdens. The injustice would be more marked, and the hardship would be rendered more acute, if this recommendation of the Committee should become law as part of their further proposal that local rates should be levied upon the value of sites alone apart from the value of the buildings thereon. For the result of such a combination of the rating of such feu-duties and the restriction of rates to site values, would be that—assuming the total amount required by any town from owners' rates not to be increased beyond what it is at present—feu-duties would have to bear as their share of burdens as much as from 8s. per £ of feu-duty (estimated for Edinburgh) to 15s. per £ of feu-duty (estimated for Glasgow). And not only would that be so, but the capital value, i.e. the selling price, of what was left of the feu-duty must be depreciated, because purchasers would go upon the universal experience of modern days that local rates never fall, but invariably increase, and of course any increase must mean a further encroachment on the balance left. And when one considers that feu-duties are now in great part held as investments of funds in trust for the poor and provident classes, and that the amounts so held are enormous, one can see that great hardships must be the result. Indeed, had the Societies not been deeply impressed with the importance of the question raised by the Select Committee they would not have united as they have now, for the first time in their history, done to take the unusual course of approaching the Prime Minister on the subject. They have no personal interest of their own to serve. They have solicited this interview solely in the interests of the numerous clients of their members in all parts of Scotland. Their action is entirely non-political. The Societies have all of them among their members men of all shades of political opinion, and, whatever the views of individual members may be, it is outside the province of the Societies as such to deal with matters of general policy or which might give rise to party differences. The present case is not one of these. The matter is one of general interest.

The Societies are aware that no step has been taken with a view to legislation on the lines of that part of the Select Committee's report as to which we are here; and having regard to the very distinct and very satisfactory assurance which the Lord Advocate gave last year on behalf of the Government, they are confident that nothing of the kind will be proposed. But the Select Committee's report has had such a disquieting effect in Scotland that the Societies feel that something should be done without delay to reassure the vast numbers of people who are interested in feu-duties as investments.

In the use of the word "injustice" I am fortified by the report of the Royal Commission on local taxation, and in particular by the separate minority report, which deals with urban rating and site values in Scotland. It was a minority report, because, differing from the majority of the Commissioners, the minority were not unfavourable to the idea of the rating of site values to a certain limited extent, and for certain limited purposes, to which I need not refer, as they have no application to the matter now before us. But they were in full agreement with the majority as to the impossibility of allowing existing contracts to be broken. The late Lord Justice-General, Mr Balfour—afterwards Lord Kinross—was one of that minority. I venture to think, sir, you must have known him well, and therefore I need scarcely say of him that he was one of the ablest and most learned lawyers that Scotland has known. As this part of the report deals with matters of which he had exceptional knowledge, I feel entitled to assume that it at least must have been drafted by him, or at any rate had the impress of his full approval and unquestioned authority as a great lawyer. It says — "The rating of feu-duties fixed under existing contracts would be a peculiarly objectionable and indefensible breach of contract."

Words of condemnation could not well be stronger. They were fully accepted by the Lord Advocate on behalf of the Government last year. And yet this, which has been characterised by the highest authority as "a peculiarly objectionable and indefensible breach of contract," is what the Select Committee recommend. Of course I do not for one moment mean to suggest that the gentlemen who composed the bare majority of the Select Committee made a recommendation which they believed would lead to injustice. I mean no more than this, that, if the Committee's proposals, based mainly on technicalities and on what the Societies believe to be a misapprehension, to some extent, of the law of Scotland, should be carried out, serious injustice would be the result. In the observations which seem necessary in order that I may make the Societies' position clear to you, I shall avoid as much as possible making any reference to legal technicalities, although it is really upon these and upon what the Societies are satisfied are mistaken views of the law that the Committee base their conclusions. The Societies have said what they have to say upon this subject in the closely reasoned and exhaustive representation of which I had the honour to send you a copy, and to which I respectfully take leave to refer you.

The first observation I have to make is this — that urban feuing, which has attained to such gigantic proportions, was all but unknown in its modern form before the latter part of the eighteenth century, when towns first began to expand beyond the ancient burgh limits to which they had previously been confined. From that time to the present—upwards of a hundred years—the law has been held as clearly settled, that owners' burdens must be borne by the owner of the soil without recourse to any extent against the person to whom he pays his feu-duty. No question has ever during that long period been raised as to this. That the law is so has hitherto been accepted on all hands. As I shall be able to show you presently, this has been assumed on more than one occasion by the Legislature, and the constant practice of the judges of the Supreme Court has been conducted on that assumption. Nevertheless, the Committee say that it may be true, or it may not be true, that, by the common law, the superior is bound to relieve the feuar of a share of burdens; on that they say they offer no opinion. Why should the Committee cast any doubt upon the common law, which is quite clear? If there had ever been any doubt the point must have been raised long ago at the instance of some intelligent feuar or some ingenious or learned lawyer, but it has never been done. The constant, unvarying, undisputed practice of both payers and receivers of feu-duties must have been within the knowledge of the Committee, and supplementary and corroborative of that, the Committee had the decisions of the Court of Session and the House of Lords, which they pointedly refer to and strongly found upon, for a different purpose no doubt, in the immediately succeeding sentences of their report.

Nothing could establish more clearly what the common law is than these decisions. The question in each of them arose out of a special contract in the feu grant that the superior should relieve the feuar of all public burdens payable in respect of the feu. And what were the judgments of the Court of Session and the House of Lords? They held that an undertaking which inferred an inversion of legal liability must have some limitation, that it must have been intended that the relief should be limited to such burdens as might have been fairly within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was entered into. To that extent the superior was, by virtue, and by virtue only, of the express contract, held to be liable in relief, but no further. And why? Obviously because the common law imposed upon him no liability whatever, and therefore, consequently, the whole common law liability rested on the feuar. Surely the Committee cannot have considered the true bearing of these decisions. So much for the common law; but then, to make assurance doubly sure, feu grants contain a special contract whereby the superior undertakes to relieve the feuar of all burdens payable in respect of the ground at and prior to the feuar entering into possession; the feuar, on the other hand, undertaking to relieve the superior of all such burdens from and after the date of his taking possession of the feu. This clause will be found in every book of Styles or Precedents.

The Societies have no hesitation in saying that it is clear beyond dispute that the owner of feu-duties has been considered on all hands to be free from any obligation to relieve the owner of the soil to any extent of local burdens, and it has been on the faith of that being so that all feu-duties have been created and purchased since urban feuing began, and, as I shall point out later, the amounts which have been purchased and are now held as investments for trust and charitable funds on that faith are enormous. A purchaser of a feu-duty buys it on the faith that the law will be respected, and that the owner of the ground will continue to be legally bound to pay him the feu-duty in full. Now, seeing that the enormous sums I have referred to have been invested on the faith that the purchasers of feu-duties are legally entitled to receive them without deduction, and also, seeing that the owners of the feus acquired them on the footing and in the knowledge that they are legally bound to pay the whole burdens in respect of their feus without relief, surely, unless some very strong reason be assigned, effect should not be given to what, in the absence of any such reason, seems the very unfair and unreasonable proposal of the Committee, that the owner of the ground should be authorised without compensation to do what, by the common law and by express contract, he is bound not to do. But they give no such reason, unless we can consider as a reason their single observation that as a feu-duty is payable out of the annual return from the ground upon which rates are levied, it should bear a share of such rates. But it was on the footing and on the faith that it should not be so that all parties transacted—that the feuar bought his land and the feu-duty owner his feu-duty; and, moreover, the same reasoning would apply to ground annuals and other charges on land which it is not suggested should be taxed.

As regards these other charges, I should like to explain that, while the Bill upon which the Committee reported provided that a share of the special local rate proposed to be levied should be laid upon all ground burdens, including not only feu-duties but also ground annuals (rent charges) and the like, the Committee's recommendation is silent on the subject of all ground burdens except feu-duties. And they rightly dropped out rent charges and the like, because, although these are manifestly payments out of the annual return from the land, there the relation is too obviously that of debtor and creditor, mortgagor and mortgagee. The Committee have, however, excluded feu-duties from that category, because of the peculiar nature of the title under which they are held. I am not going to trouble you with any disquisition upon this subject, as it is a technical one, and has been fully dealt with in the representations. I would gladly avoid saying a single word about it, but the Committee's whole case is based upon it. They say the superior, the owner of the feu-duties, is the true owner of the ground: the feu-duty is simply a rent which the person who, we say, supposes himself, and whom every other body supposes, to be the owner of the ground, pays as tenant to the owner of the feu-duty. That very learned lawyer, Lord Kinross, and the other eminent members of the Royal Commission, held no such theories. The separate report puts the matter in the true common-sense way when it says in one place that "it is particularly clear in the case of feu-duties that the transaction is equivalent to a sale, except that the purchase money is paid in the form of a perpetual annuity," and in another, where it defines a feu-duty as a perpetual annuity payable to its owner out of the feuar's property. With all respect to the Committee, I take leave to say that they have been pursuing the shadow, entirely neglecting the substance. Legislation does not proceed upon technicalities, but upon the substance of the thing. The technical title is nothing; it is the thing itself that is important, for truly feu-duties of urban subjects have long been treated as being economically and substantially in the same category with perpetual rent charges, or as perpetual annuities issuing out of land—only with more simple and effective remedies for their recovery than the more troublesome method for attaining the same end in the case of rent charges and annuities.

There is another important matter which I must refer to — the purchase of feu-duties is a mode of investing trust funds specially authorised by statute, while the purchase of land is not, and the reason is evident. Trust funds must be placed in investments good to hold and easily realisable, which land is not. But feu-duties have been eminently so. When well secured they have been much sought after, and have always been readily saleable when trustees required to realise their investments. But the experience of members of the Societies has been very different since the Committee's report was issued. Feu-duties are either quite unsaleable, or only saleable at a totally inadequate price. Then what has been the practice of the judges of the Supreme Court during these last sixty years? When Parliament in 1843 authorised quoad sacra parishes to be created, it delegated the power to create them to the judges of the Supreme Court, provided they were satisfied that a permanent minimum stipend of £120 a year had been secured in all time coming for the ministers of such parishes. Well, how have these learned judges for the last sixty years considered that this could be most safely and securely effected? Why, it was by the investment of the funds, raised by voluntary subscriptions for the endowment, in the purchase of well-secured feu-duties to an amount equal to the required minimum statutory stipend. Upwards of £55,000 a year is receivable from feu-duties for these small stipends.

The contention that feu-duties fixed under existing contracts should bear a share of local rates was not raised for the first time before this Select Committee. A Select Committee of the House of Commons on town holdings, which reported in 1892, had the matter fully before them, and reported against any portion of local rates being laid upon the owners of such feu-duties. Then some years later the subject was again considered by the Royal Commission on Local Taxation, to which I have more than once referred. With your permission I will read a sentence from the final minority report: "Legislation enabling occupiers to violate the contracts which they have deliberately made, and to escape the obligations which they have solemnly undertaken, would be, in our opinion, indefensible. We could admit no compromise on this matter of principle." These words speak loudly in support of the views of the Societies. Then we have the weighty opinion which the Lord Advocate expressed on behalf of the Government on the second reading of the Bill of last year. Applying these opinions of the very highest authority to present circumstances, could any form of words be suggested which would more emphatically condemn the Select Committee's recommendations? The Committee, however, in their report have entirely ignored the very grave and weighty condemnation by Lord Kinross and the other members of the Royal Commission of such a course as they have proposed, just as they have paid no regard to the Lord Advocate's opinion. They came to an opposite conclusion for reasons which are technical and unsubstantial—reasons, however, the conclusions from which, if they should receive effect, would inflict much injury upon many poor and provident persons. The matter is really one of great moment for hosts of people with small incomes derived, either directly from such investments made by themselves, or indirectly through trust investments or allowances from charitable and similar funds. I think the Committee can scarcely have been aware of the many people of slender means who are interested in feu-duties—not merely private individuals with whom, particularly in Glasgow, I am informed, this is a common mode of investing savings, but also trustees on comparatively small private trust estates, who have taken advantage of the statutory powers to purchase feu-duties to which I have referred.

Besides these small investors, there are the great trusts for the advancement of religion, for charitable purposes, educational institutions, insurance and friendly societies, and other associations of a similar nature. It must be borne in mind that the proposal of the Committee is, not to lay a special supplementary rate of 10 per cent. on the estimated annual value of the site, as was intended by the Bill of last year, but to lay all local rates, without exception, on land value.

Now, an alteration of the incidence of taxation from the present system of rating on site and buildings to that upon site alone would not of itself take anything more out of the pockets of owners in the aggregate than they are at present paying. The only difference would be that in order to get from them, after the alterations, the same annual sum as they are at present paying, they would have to be assessed at a much higher rate per pound on the necessarily much lower site value than would have been the case as regards the much higher value of site and buildings. Thus it has been estimated that in Edinburgh the value of site and buildings is, taking an average over the whole city, five times that of site alone, so that the present assessment of 1s. 7d. per £ on site and buildings for all owners' burdens would be represented as nearly as may be by 8s. per £ on site alone. If the Committee's recommendation should receive effect, then, in the proportion that the feu-duty bears to the total value of the site, the owner of the feu-duty would have to relieve the owner of the site of a corresponding proportion of burdens at 8s. per £ of his feu-duty. The effect of the Committee's recommendation would simply be this—not to impose any additional burden on owners of property who, in the aggregate, would be assessed for no larger a sum than before, but simply to allow feuars to retain two-fifths of the feu-duties which, at common law and by express contract, they were bound to pay without deduction; that is to say, on the above hypothesis, every £20 of feu-duty would, in future, be only £12. And who would derive the benefit? Not the community. The community would not benefit to the extent of a brass farthing. Not all the successive owners of the ground. Not a soul would derive any benefit from it but the person who might happen to be the owner of the ground when the Act passed, and his heirs. While the ground remained unsold this man and his heirs would alone get the benefit of the reduced feu-duty they would have to pay, and when they sold their property they would sell it subject to the reduced feu-duty. In respect of that reduction they would, of course, get an enhanced price which they would carry off, and with it the whole benefit conferred by the Act. Then, as regards the feu-duty owners, the precise converse would happen to them. So long as they held their feu-duties, they would (to continue the illustration) get £12 a year instead of £20, with the risk of that reduced feu-duty being still further reduced; and when they came to sell their feu-duty, the purchaser would only pay a reduced price for the depreciated article. Thus the person who was owner of the feu when the Act passed would be the only gainer; the person who was owner of the feu-duty when the Act passed would be the only loser. To take money away from one person to whom it belongs absolutely in order to give it to another who has no right to it, legal or moral, would be an outrage. Not only have persons who have invested their own money in feu-duties and beneficiaries under trusts, large and small, been made anxious, I may say become alarmed, at the prospect held out to them by the Select Committee, but the same uncertainty affects persons who would otherwise have readily purchased feu-duties, so that persons wishing to realise investments—in particular trustees requiring to close their trusts and divide their funds among the beneficiaries—find these feu-duties, which used to be considered investments of the highest class, either unsaleable or only realisable at a serious sacrifice.

The Societies therefore trust, sir, that you may see your way to remove these grounds of anxiety, and to restore the confidence in feu-duties fixed under existing contracts as an investment, which has existed in the past and which the Government's perfectly satisfactory declaration of last year did so much to continue, but which has been so much shaken by the Select Committee's report. We trust you may see your way now to do this by confirming that declaration, which was not only entirely in agreement with the very carefully considered reports of the Town Holdings Committee and the Royal Commission on Local Taxation, but, if I may be allowed with the utmost respect to say so, is so obviously right in itself.

Mr Christopher N. Johnston, K.C., said that he represented trusts and institutions for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, and benefit societies having capital invested in feu-duties to the amount of some five and a half millions, besides a large number of private investors. Superiors or owners of feu-duties are of two classes: (1) Ground landlords in the popular sense, who have feued out parts or the whole of their estate; and (2) investors who never had any relation to the land other than as purchasers of a feu-duty as an investment secured upon the land. The former class, no doubt, bulk largely in the eye of those who advocate this rating proposal, but it is believed that by far the larger part in value of the feu-duties of the country are held by the latter class, i.e. the investors. The case for the investors is, that under the law and practice of the feuing system, as that has been understood for a century, the owner of a feu-duty is not a proprietor of land, but has right merely to a fixed annual payment secured over the land. He takes no benefit if the property increases in value; he has no share in its administration, no parliamentary or municipal vote or heritors' rights in respect of it; in many cases he never saw it, and may have only a vague idea where it is situated. One sometimes hears of an absentee landlord, but to talk of an absentee superior would be as ridiculous as to talk of an absentee bondholder. The superior, as Lord Braxfield long ago pointed out, might be interdicted if he sought to set foot upon the feu. On the other hand, the settled understanding, on the faith of which investments have been made, has been that the superior is free from rates and burdens of ownership which must be borne by the true proprietor. A builder in Edinburgh creates a feu-duty, and to purchase it trust money is invested on which, say, a clergyman in Shetland or a widow in Dollar is dependent. Edinburgh gets the use of that trust money at a low rate of interest; but on what theory, either of benefit conferred or of ability to bear the burden, should the minister in Shetland or the widow in Dollar be required to bear a share of the expenses of Edinburgh municipal administration?

An attempt has been made to assimilate feu-duty to rent and to represent that the superior as a joint owner with the feuar should be made liable in part of the proposed rate. But this attempt rests upon old theories of feudal conveyancing, and the argument has no relevancy to the practical conditions and the understandings which have governed the creation and the purchase of feu-duties for upwards of a century. By far the greater part in value of existing feu-duties have been created since 1840, and the subtleties of eighteenth-century lawyers can throw no light upon the question as to what was the understanding in regard to rights and obligations under which these modern feudal relationships have been entered into.

If, as has been proposed, the whole burden of the rates should be imposed upon site value, and the owner of the feu-duty should be called upon to contribute in proportion to the amount of his feu-duty, the rate upon owners, even if occupiers bore one-half the burden, would not, it has been estimated, be less than 10s. in the pound, a truly confiscatory proposal. But even if a much smaller rate were imposed, the disturbance of the immunity from rating would depreciate the capital value of the security to a degree out of all proportion to the amount of the rate. Feu-duties would cease to be what Parliament in respect of their stability and their immunity from rates has made them, a proper trust investment.

The use of a very large sum invested in feu-duties is enjoyed by householders at a low rate of interest. The withdrawal or curtailment of this capital would be most prejudicial to all interested in building property, whether builders, owners, or occupiers. But this will be the inevitable result of any system which destroys the gilt-edged character of this form of investment, deprives it of its privilege as a trustee investment, and renders it subject to fluctuation and periodical diminution. Already the influence of these proposals is being felt in the greatly increased difficulty of financing building operations in large towns.

The declarations of the Lord Advocate when the recent Bill was before Parliament were quite satisfactory upon this matter. They were not dictated by any preconceptions in favour of superiors, but were the result of a careful examination of the considerations which brought his distinguished predecessors Lord Moncreiff and Lord Kinross to a like conclusion. All that the deputation now asked was such an endorsement of the declaration of the Lord Advocate as would restore public confidence in this class of investment.

Certain other members of the deputation having spoken, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, in replying, said:—

I am obliged to you for coming here to-day and putting your case so strongly and completely before me. Mr Paul, Sheriff Johnston, Lord Overtoun, and the other two gentlemen who have spoken, have all told the same story, and sung the same tune. It is a very simple matter; I mean simple from my point of view, and from the point of view of my answer. It is a most complicated subject. Everything connected with these burdens upon land and the valuation and assessment of land is complicated. But we can put aside altogether to-day all questions regarding it, ancient and modern. We have nothing to do with the question whether there should be a discrimination between the value of the site and the value of the buildings. We have nothing to do with the policy that may be going to be pursued, upon which there is abundant room for difference of opinion. What we have to do, and your sole object, as I understand, in coming here, is to know whether the Government contemplate going back upon existing contracts. In one sentence that is the whole question, and to that question I can answer, I think, in the most condensed form in which we are accustomed to answer questions in the House of Commons, by the words, "No, Sir." My friend the Lord Advocate, who knows a vast deal more on this subject than I do in its details, made a speech last year, the greater part of which I have before me here, and it has been quoted by Mr Paul, but there is one sentence which seems to me to be the crucial sentence: "He desired to associate this great and salutary reform with no violence whatever to existing contracts, and with no invasion of rights sanctioned by the State." That is our attitude in the matter, and I really think that having said that—solvuntur tabulae, not risu, I hope—I do not think I need detain you by attempting any elaboration of the subject with which those who have spoken are much better entitled to deal than I am; but I can assure you that we have no idea of going back upon existing contracts, and therefore, all the alarms, so far as they have existed in Scotland and elsewhere, may be allowed safely and healthily to subside. The Lord Advocate is here and you might like to hear him, but I have no doubt that what I have said would be the gist of what he would say, and if you will allow me, I will leave it there, thanking you for having put the whole case before me so fully as has been done, especially by Mr Paul, and not occupying more of your time, but dismissing you, I hope, with a relieved heart and in a friendly spirit.

Contract—Illegal—Public Policy.—Held that an agreement by a married man to marry a woman on the death of his wife, the woman knowing that he was a married man, was not illegal as contrary to public policy.—K. B. Div. (Channell, J.)—3*rd June* 1907.

The late CHARLES M'KIE, Esq.,

Sheriff-Clerk of Dumfriesshire.

We much regret to record the death of Mr Charles M'Kie, Sheriff-Clerk of the county of Dumfries, which took place at his residence in the county town on the 27th ult., after a very short illness, in his sixty-first year. Only two days before his death he was attending to his accustomed duties in the Sheriff Court-house, and the news of his death came as a shock to the community of Dumfries, where he was held in the highest esteem alike by the profession and the public.

Mr M'Kie was born at the farm of New Hall, in the parish of Keir, on the 5th of March 1847, just three weeks before the death of his father, after whom he was named. He came to Dumfries at the age of seventeen, and entered upon his apprenticeship in the office of the Sheriff-Clerk, in which his whole working life has been passed, and of which he rose to be the head. The Sheriff-Clerk at that date was the late Mr Henry Gordon. In 1871 Mr M'Kie was appointed Sheriff-Clerk Depute, and for many years while occupying that position he virtually discharged the whole duties of the Sheriff-Clerk. He did so in a manner which commanded the full confidence of the Bench and the Bar, and of the Crown departments with which his work brought him into touch. He had a most intimate knowledge of procedure, and a comprehensive and accurate acquaintance with the numerous statutes which are administered in the Sheriff Court; and he discharged his executive duties with great precision and regularity. He sought to maintain a high ideal of the prestige of the court and of the legal profession, and he brought to the discharge of his duties a stately courtesy and a desire to be helpful, which set him quite apart from the ranks of the mere official. The members of the Bar took occasion to show in tangible form their appreciation of his professional abilities and personal qualities on the occasion of his majority as Sheriff-Clerk Depute in 1892, when they entertained him to dinner and presented him with a silver salver and a purse of sovereigns. On Mr Gordon's resignation of office, the Faculty unanimously petitioned the Government of the day to appoint Mr M'Kie, and in March 1897 he received his commission as Sheriff-Clerk.

The high reputation which he had made as Sheriff-Clerk Depute he more than maintained during the ten years in which he held the more important office. His standing among his professional brethren was attested by the fact that for ten years he acted as Honorary Secretary of the Society of Sheriff-Clerks. He enjoyed great personal popularity with all classes. Genial, amiable, and with many interests, he was always an agreeable and entertaining companion. His kindliness of heart shewed itself in ready and generous help to many benevolent institutions, and in many acts of charity which were known only to the recipient and himself. He was a member of St Michael's Parish Church, and took much interest in its work. He was unmarried.

At the usual Friday sitting of the Sheriff Court at Dumfries on 28th June there was a large attendance of members of the local Bar. Referring to the death of Mr M'Kie, Sheriff Campion said:—

"We are met to-day, gentlemen, in the shade of a great and unexpected sorrow. It seems hardly possible that we can realise the fact that we shall never see present in the Court again one who for so many years has been a moving spirit in it. It is needless for me—speaking to the Faculty—to enlarge upon the many qualifications which Mr M'Kie possessed for his important office. His long training, his interest in the work, his pride in the Sheriff Court, and his endeavour to maintain the best traditions of the Sheriff Court and to make the Dumfries one a model of Sheriff Courts in Scotland, are all well known to you. He was a man who was fortunate in occupying a position he took both pride and pleasure in. His place will be difficult to fill. We all know that we have lost an official most valuable to the county and the country, but his loss as an official is dwarfed for the time to all of us, I am sure, by thinking of his loss to us as a friend. I don't suppose there are any connected with the Sheriff Court but have applied to Mr M'Kie for advice on some subject or other in the course of his career; and what is more, they never applied to him without getting sage, sensible advice, courteously and most tactfully given. It was a privilege to enjoy the friendship of such a man as Mr Charles M'Kie. I, during the seventeen years I have been connected with this Court, owe much of the pleasure I have experienced in administering the work to his thoughtful and kind attention. And I have received this morning a telegram from Sheriff Fleming desiring that he should be associated with any remarks that were made about Mr M'Kie. He mourns his loss as a tactful and courteous assistant, and as an ever kind and thoughtful friend. We have often spoken together of how fortunate we were in possessing such an assistant. I fear that in the rapid run of time nowadays faces often disappear and places are filled up and the memories pass away; but I am quite sure that the memory of Charles M'Kie will not lightly pass away. He stamped his personality upon the tone of the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, and will be long and affectionately remembered by everyone who was privileged to enjoy his friendship. I believe it is your wish that the Court should be adjourned in the circumstances."

Mr John Grierson, Dean of Faculty, on behalf of the members of the Bar, paid a tribute to Mr M'Kie, and concurred in what had been said by Sheriff Campion. The Court then adjourned.

The Chair of Law in Aberdeen University.—On Tuesday the Aberdeen University Court (Principal Lang presiding) met to appoint a successor to Mr N. J. D. Kennedy, K.C., formerly Professor of Law in the University, now Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute. In our last issue a list of the candidates for the vacancy was published. The Court, after full discussion, unanimously chose Mr J. Mercer Irvine, M.A., LL.B., B.Sc., Advocate, Lecturer in Civil Law in Glasgow University, to be professor. Mr Irvine is to be congratulated on having been selected from so full a list of able and eminently qualified candidates. No less is the University to be congratulated in having secured a professor so admirably fitted to do credit to the Chair and to further the interests of legal learning in the venerable University. The new professor, who is forty-four years of age, studied in the University of St Andrews, where he graduated in Arts. Subsequently he studied classics and mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, and took the degree of B.Sc. in pure mathematics in that University. In 1886 he entered the Law Faculty of Edinburgh University, where he had a distinguished career, and took the degree of LL.B., "with distinction." In December 1889 he was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates, and since that date has been in regular practice at the Scottish Bar. In December 1905 he was appointed additional Advocate-Depute on the Western Circuit. As Vans Dunlop law scholar, he delivered courses of lectures in the University of Edinburgh in two successive sessions, 1890–1 and 1891–2. In 1894 he was appointed University assistant in Civil Law in the University of Edinburgh. In 1895 he was elected by the University Court to the Lectureship in Civil Law in the University of Glasgow. He is the joint-author, along with Professor Gloag, of a treatise on the law of rights in security, which was published in 1897. Professor Irvine has contributed many articles to law journals. Mr Irvine will enter on his duties in October next. [A portrait and biographical notice of Mr Irvine was published in the "Scots Law Times" of 11th December 1897, Vol. V. 145.]

The Extra Division of the Court continued its sittings this week. Lord Low was unfortunately, owing to indisposition, unable to sit in the Second Division on Tuesday and Wednesday. As Lord Ardwall was in the Extra Division, Lord Johnston attended on Tuesday to make up a quorum along with the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Stormonth-Darling. On Wednesday no Outer House Judge was available, and the Second Division did not sit.

The directors of the Commercial Bank of Scotland Ltd. have appointed Mr William Babington, W.S., to a seat at the Board rendered vacant by the resignation of Professor Mounsey, who has been appointed Law Agent of the Bank.

The Advocates' Library (with the exception of the Law Room) will be closed as usual during the month of August. In consequence of the alterations on the buildings, now in progress, it will be necessary that it should remain closed to the public until further notice.

Autumn Vacation Jury Trials.—The sittings of the First and Second Divisions of the Court for the trial of civil causes by jury during the ensuing vacation commence on Monday, 22nd inst. There were eighteen cases on the First Division list and seven on the list of the Second Division. Three of these cases have since been transferred from the First to the Second Division.

"PERSONAL INJURY BY ACCIDENT."

By James D. Wyllie, Solicitor, Kilmarnock.

When a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act is contemplated, one of the first questions for consideration is, "Has the workman sustained personal injury by accident?" The phraseology of sect. 1 of the Act of 1906, so far as this phrase is concerned, is exactly the same as the 1897 Act, and decisions under the repealed statute will still be regarded as precedents and authorities.

The interpretations of the terms "personal injury" and "accident" have been discussed in several cases, and in Fenton v. Thorley [1903], A.C. 443, Lords Macnaghten and Lindley gave remarkably clear and authoritative opinions on the question. In that case a workman while turning a wheel connected with a machine ruptured himself, and in holding that the injury was caused by an accident, Lord Macnaghten said: "Now the expression 'injury by accident' seems to me to be a compound expression. The words 'by accident' are, I think, introduced parenthetically, as it were, to qualify the word 'injury,' confining it to a certain class of injuries and excluding other classes, as, for instance, injuries by disease or injuries self inflicted. Then comes the question, Do the words 'arising out of and in the course of the employment' qualify the word 'accident' or the word 'injury,' or the compound expression 'injury by accident'? I rather think the latter view is the correct one. If it were the question whether the qualifying words apply to 'injury' or to 'accident,' there would, I think, be some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion. The truth is, that in the Act, which does not seem to have had the benefit of careful revision, 'accident' and 'injury,' that is, injury by accident, appear to be used as convertible terms. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the expression 'accident' is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an unlooked-for mishap, or an untoward event which is not expected or designed." In the same case Lord Lindley said: "The word 'accident' is not a technical legal term with a clearly defined meaning. Speaking generally, but with reference to legal liabilities, an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss. But it is often used to denote any unintended or unexpected loss, or hurt, apart from its cause; and if the cause is not known, the loss or hurt itself would certainly be called an accident. The word 'accident' is also often used to denote both the cause and effect, no attempt being made to discriminate between them." In Fenton v. Thorley the decision in Stewart v. Wilson's & Clyde Coal Company, 1902, 5 F. 120, 10 S.L.T. 204, was expressly approved of. In that case Lord Adam stated he was not going to attempt to define the term "accident," but Lord M'Laren gave it as his opinion that if a workman in the reasonable performance of his duties sustains a physiological injury as the result of the work he is engaged in, that is an accidental injury in the sense of the statute.

Not only the word "accident," but the whole statute must be interpreted in its ordinary and popular meaning (Lord Chancellor in Brintons v. Turvey [1905], A.C. 230). At first some doubts existed as to whether diseases brought on by accidents sustained by workmen while in the course of their employment fell under the category of accidental injuries, but it is now clear where the date of the accident which caused the disease or accelerated it can be fixed (Steel v. Gammell, Laird & Co. [1905], 2 K.B. 232), and it is proved that, but for the accident, the disease would not have started or been accelerated, the workman is entitled to compensation (Golder v. Caledonian Railway Co. [1902], 5 F. 123, 10 S.L.T. 373; Lloyd v. Sugg & Co. [1900], 1 Q.B. 481; Walker v. Lillieshall Coal Co. [1900], 1 Q.B. 481; Timmins v. Leeds Forge Co. (1900), 16 T.L.R. 521; Thomson v. Ashington Coal Co. (1901), 17 T.L.R. 345; Boardman v. Scott & Whitworth, C.A. (1901), W.N. 222; Dunham v. Clare [1902], 2 K.B. 292; Higgins v. Campbell & Harrison (1903), 20 T.L.R. 129). In Brintons v. Turvey, supra, the Lord Chancellor, in the course of his opinion, said: "It does not appear to me that by calling the consequence of an accidental injury a disease, one alters the nature of the consequential results of the injury that had been inflicted. Many illustrations of what I am insisting on might be given. A workman, in the course of his employment, spills some corrosive acid on his hands; the injury caused thereby sets up erysipelas, a definite disease; some trifling injury by a needle sets up tetanus. Are these not within the Act, because the immediate injury is not perceptible until it shews itself in some morbid change in the structure of the human body, and which, when shewn, we call a disease? I cannot think so." A disease, however, which may be caused by the work in which the workman is engaged, and which cannot be attributed to a special occurrence on a given date, but is gradual, is not an accident (Steel v. Gammell, Laird & Co., supra; Marshall v. East Holywell Coal Co. (1905), 21 T.L.R. 494; Gorley v. Owners of Backworth Collieries (1905), 21 T.L.R. 494; see also Wilkes v. Dowell & Co. [1905], 2 K.B. 325). In Higgins v. Campbell & Harrison [1904],

1 K.B. 328, the Master of the Rolls, in referring to Lord Macnaghten's exclusion of diseases (see his opinion in Fenton v. Thorley, supra) from the category of accidents, said the word disease "meant disease which was already in the workman, and which the workman brought with him to his work. The expression does not seem to me to cover the accidental catching of infection arising out of the work, or receiving accidentally a blow which is a physical blow, though infinitesimal in force and given by a bacillus invisible to the naked eye."

This Act (sect. 8, third schedule) specifies certain diseases which are to entitle workmen to compensation as if they were personal injuries by accident, but it does not follow that a disease which is not included in that section will not fall under sect. 1 (1) under the category of an accident.

If the arbitrator holds that the injury does not result from the accident, that is a question of fact not subject to review by appeal (Warnock v. Glasgow Iron and Steel Co. (1904), 6 F. 474, 11 S.L.T. 697).

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

In re Wedmore.

Wedmore v. Wedmore.

Will — Legacy — Abatement. — A testator left a legacy of £3000 to his daughter's marriage-contract trustees in implement of an obligation to pay to them a sum of £1000. Held that the legacy must abate along with other legacies, the testator's estate not being sufficient to pay all in full.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—14*th May* 1907.

Hudwell v. Rightson.

Reparation—Negligence.—The defendant was the owner of some fowls which strayed on the highway adjoining his premises. One of them, being frightened by a dog belonging to a third party, flew into the wheel of the plaintiff's bicycle, upsetting him and injuring him and his bicycle. Held that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant rendering him liable in damages to the plaintiff.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore and Bray, JJ.).—14*th May* 1907.

Cribb v. Kynoch Ltd.

Master and Servant—Master's Liability—Fellow Workman.—A girl of fifteen years of age was set to work in an explosives factory with loaded cartridges without being warned of the danger. A cartridge exploded and she was severely injured. Held that the accident was due to the fault of the forewoman, whose duty it was to warn the girl, and that, the forewoman being a fellow-workman, the employers were not liable.—K.B. Div. (Ridley and Bray, JJ.).—15*th May* 1907.

The "Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse."

Ship—Collision.—Held that an entrance to a harbour which was an opening in a breakwater half a mile in width was a "narrow channel" within the meaning of Article 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897.

Where one vessel was entering and another going out of a harbour, and it was the duty of both to go at the time on a port helm, the incoming vessel ported her helm and signalled to the other that she had done so. The outgoing vessel starboarded, and signalled that she had done so. The incoming vessel then continued on a port helm, and signalled that she was doing so. The outgoing vessel then signalled that she was continuing on a starboard helm, whereupon the incoming vessel reversed. Held that it was not the duty of the incoming vessel in the circumstances to reverse when she got the first signal that the outgoing vessel was starboarding her helm.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—15*th May* 1907.

Poole v. National Bank of China Ltd.

Company — Reduction of Capital.—Observed by Lord Macnaghten that there was a tendency to narrow and restrict the power to reduce capital conferred by the Companies Act 1867; that that power was perfectly general; that the condition that gave jurisdiction was not proof of loss of capital, or proof that capital was unrepresented by available assets, or that capital was in excess of the wants of the company; that the jurisdiction arose whenever the company seeking reduction had passed a special resolution to that effect; and that the only questions to be considered were (1) Ought the Court to refuse its sanction to the reduction out of regard to the interests of those members of the public who might be induced to take shares in the company? and (2) Was the reduction fair and equitable as between the different classes of shareholders?—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord Robertson and Lord Atkinson).—28*th May* 1907.

In re A Solicitor. Ex parte Hales.

Contract — Guarantee. — The plaintiff, a solicitor, had a bill of costs against F, who made application to have the bill taxed. Hales, another solicitor, who was at the time acting for F, wrote a letter to the plaintiff in which he said that F, who was at the time an undischarged bankrupt, had handed to him the full amount of the bill "so that on the completion of the taxation we shall be in a position to pay the amount certified by the Master due to you." When the bill of costs was taxed F had died, and Hales refused to pay the amount certified to be due to the plaintiff, on the ground that he had a bill of costs against F and was entitled to retain the money against that debt. Held that Hales had guaranteed payment of the plaintiff's bill out of the sum in his hands for the purpose, and was liable to make it forthcoming.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—29*th May* 1907.

Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Owners of the Steamship "Marpessa."

The "Marpessa."

Ship—Collision—Measure of Damages.—Decision of Gorell Barnes, P. (ante, Vol. XIII. p. 120), and of the Court of Appeal, affirmed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Ashbourne, Lord Macnaghten and Lord Robertson).—29*th May* 1907.

Apthorp v. Neville & Co.

Contract — Illegal — Publication of Slander. — The plaintiff wrote a manuscript and made a contract with the defendants through their agent to print 5000 copies. The manuscript contained libellous matter, and this was known to the defendants' agent as well as to the plaintiff, but not to the defendants. When the defendants became aware of it they refused to go on with the contract, on which they had done some work, and for which the plaintiff had advanced to them £50. The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of contract, or return of the £50. The defendants claimed payment for the work done by them on the contract. Held that, the contract being an illegal one, the plaintiff was not entitled either to damages or the return of his £50, and that the knowledge of the defendants' agent being the knowledge of the defendants, they were not entitled to claim payment for the work done by them on the contract.—K.B. Div. (Pickford, J.)—30*th May* 1907.

Casswell v. Cheshire Lines Committee.

Carriage — Railway — Passenger's Luggage.—Passenger's luggage was carried free under a contract contained in the railway company's time-table. Held that this was not inconsistent with a limitation on the railway company's liability if a sum for safe carriage was not paid in accordance with the provisions of the Carriers Act 1830.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.)—3*rd June* 1907.

Principal and Agent—Fraud of Agent.—The defendant signed and handed to his agent in South Africa an unstamped form of promissory note with the date and amount blank, and gave instructions that it was to be filled up with such particulars as he should direct if the agent received instructions to that effect, otherwise it was to remain in the custody of the agent. The agent fraudulently filled it up and negotiated it, no instructions to deal with it having been received. Held, in an action on the note, that the defendant was not barred from denying authority to the agent to fill it up.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—5*th June* 1907.

Williams v. Ocean Coal Co. Ltd.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 7 (2), Sched. I. sect 1 (a) —Dependant.—A workman had not contributed anything to his wife's maintenance for over a year preceding his death, and she had maintained herself as a domestic servant. Held that she was nevertheless a dependant. Held also that a child born after the workman's death was a dependant.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Kennedy, L.J.).—5*th June* 1907.

Wheatley v. Smithers.

Bill of Exchange—Liability—Partnership.—Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 55) reversed, on the ground that the partnership agreement contemplated the acceptance of bills by one partner for partnership debts. Opinions on the question decided by the Divisional Court reserved.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan - Williams, Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—6*th June* 1907.

British Vacuum Cleaner Co. Ltd. v. New Vacuum Cleaner Co. Ltd.

Company—Name—Trade Name.—Held that the name of the defendant company was not so nearly resembling that of the plaintiff company as to be calculated to deceive in the sense of sect. 20 of the Companies Act 1862; also that the words "vacuum cleaner" were descriptive, and that the plaintiff company had failed to prove that they had acquired the secondary meaning of being appropriated to their process.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.).—6*th June* 1907.

Mitchell v. Glamorgan Coal Co. Ltd.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (1)—Arising Out of and in the Course of Employment.—A miner died from blood-poisoning due to an injury to his hand. He left home for his work in the evening, and reached his work without injury. He returned home early next morning with his hand injured. Some days later blood-poisoning supervened. Held that the County Court judge was entitled to draw the inference that the injury arose out of and in course of his employment.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Kennedy, L.J.).—7th June 1907.

London and India Docks Co. v. Thames Steam Tug and Lighterage Co. Ltd.

Harbour — Dock Dues. — A harbour company had power to charge dues on all lighters entering the docks, but they were exempted from payment "so long as such lighter . . . . shall be bona fide engaged in discharging . . . . goods." A lighter entered the docks for the purpose of discharging into a vessel lying there, but was prevented owing to the vessel being full. Held that it came within the exemption clause.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—7th June 1907.

Williams v. Vauxhall Colliery Co. Ltd.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. I. (a) (1).—A workman was injured, and was paid by agreement a proportion of his wages while he was incapacitated, which was for about a year. He returned to work and remained at work for about ten months, during which time he was earning rather more than before the accident. There was no express agreement as to the right to compensation having terminated. About two years after the accident he died from the effects of the injuries received. Held that there was no evidence from which the County Court judge was entitled to hold that there was an agreement that the right to compensation should be considered as terminated, and that the workman's dependants were entitled to claim in respect of his death. Opinions that the dependants had under the Act a claim which the workman could not discharge nor defeat, and which they were entitled to enforce so long as the employer was not thereby required to pay more than the maximum amount.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Kennedy, L.J.).—7th June 1907.

Harvey v. The Tivoli, Manchester, Ltd.

Contract — Termination — Death. — Three brothers who performed in music halls under the name of the Harvey Boys entered into a contract with the defendants to perform in their theatre. Before the time for performance came, one of them died and another man was engaged by the survivors to take his place. The defendants refused to accept their performance, and these three persons, who now composed the troupe, raised this action of damages for breach of contract. Held that they had no title to sue on the contract.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—7th June 1907.

BOOK NOTICES.

Burge's Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Law Generally and in their Conflict with each other and with the Law of England. New Edition, under the general Editorship of Alexander Wood Renton of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, Puisne Justice of the Supreme Court of Ceylon, and George Grenville Phillimore, B.C.L., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. In Five Volumes. Vol. I. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd.; Stevens & Sons Ltd., 1907. Price for the Five Volumes £8, 8*s.*

In 1838 William Burge, one of Her Majesty's counsel, then an ex-Attorney-General for Jamacia, published his "Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Law" in four volumes. The work was immediately recognised in England as one of outstanding merit, and the author took rank as a high authority on questions of International Law. Mr Justice Story, referring to the book in 1841, said that it exhibited great learning and research, and that he had frequently quoted from it with the view of enabling the profession in America to obtain more illustrations of the doctrines than his own brief work could suggest, and also fully to appreciate Mr Burge's learned labours. Bar in his treatise on "Private International Law" thus commends Mr Burge's book: "This most comprehensive work, consisting for the most part of a comparison of the different systems of law that are recognised throughout the British Empire, is remarkable for the astounding knowledge of the most various systems of law and of legislation displayed by the author, for the wealth of legal cases and decisions that are cited and criticised with acuteness and great independence, and for many excellent discussions of different questions." Such recommendations indicate how widespread was the reputation which Mr Burge's work acquired, and the issue of a new edition, published after a lapse of nearly seventy years, is an important event in the annals of legal literature. The new edition is in excellent hands. Both of the general editors, Mr Justice Wood Renton and Mr G. G. Phillimore, are well-known writers. Mr Renton has varied experience of colonial judicial work, and Mr Phillimore has always devoted much attention to the subject of International Law. There are also a number of assistant editors—mostly members of the English Bar who have settled in the Colonies or abroad—who are responsible for the articles on the law relating to various parts of the British dominions and foreign states. French Law is in the hands of Dr Sewell, legal adviser to the British Embassy in Paris. The articles on Roman-Dutch Law are revised by Dr Bisschop, legal adviser to the Dutch Legation, London; those on the Law of the Empire of India by the late Dr Birdwood, formerly one of the Judges of the High Court of Bombay; and those on the Law of Quebec by Professor Walton of Montreal, a member of the Faculty of Advocates. In addition to the editors and assistant editors, the services of a large number of well-known colonial and foreign judges and others have been secured to revise portions of the work, dealing with the systems of law on which they are specially qualified to write. The present volume contains a general introduction to the whole work, and consists practically entirely of new matter. Codification of law has taken place in a majority of countries and states since the first edition was issued, and a general sketch of the sources of law, legal codes, and courts of law all over the world will be found in this volume. It also contains in tabular form the conditions of appeal to the Privy Council from British Courts of Justice outside the United Kingdom.

"The Prisoner at the Bar." By Arthur Train, Assistant District Attorney, New York County. London: T. Werner Laurie, 1907. Price 8*s.* 6*d.*

The object of this book is to correct certain erroneous but general impressions as to the administration of justice in large cities of the United States of America in ordinary criminal cases. It is therefore written primarily for the instruction of lay readers. The author writes with a confidence arising from large practical experience of his subject, but the philosophical aspect of the questions discussed has not been lost sight of, and his book will undoubtedly be instructive to lawyers as well as laymen. The arrangement of the chapters is excellent, and the amount of clear, but condensed, statistical information given is surprising. Starting with a searching analysis of what constitutes crime and where the true responsibility for crime rests, Mr Train goes on to trace the course of a criminal prosecution from the arrest of a suspect to the sentence on a convicted prisoner. He has always present to his mind the object of vindicating the administrative machinery of his own country from unjust misconception, but this detracts little, if at all, from the value of the book as a thoughtful contribution to the literature of the criminal courts. Mr Train has an excellent and clear style, well adapted to his subject, but in our opinion he interrupts his exposition too frequently with descriptions of "scenes" either in or out of Court, generally between prisoners and constables, and always giving verbatim with appropriate Hibernian spelling the exact language used by the characters. The learned author on these occasions indulges a propensity to slang, much of it purely Transatlantic, and all of it unworthy of his book. A police officer, described as "a copper who is not popular in the neighbourhood," demurs to arresting one Maria Holohan in these words: "You can't expec' me t' arrest a person unless I know who I'm doin' it fer. How do I know yer ain't throwing some game into me?" We wish the author had omitted these passages; but his book is an excellent one in spite of them.

Principles of English Law, founded on Blackstone's Commentaries. By Robert Campbell, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, Advocate of the Scotch Bar, Editor of "Ruling Cases." London: Stevens & Sons Ltd., 1907. Price 20*s.*

Mr Campbell's work will be received in Scotland with special interest on account of his being one of the senior members of the Scottish Bar. He was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1856, in the same year as Lord Kinnear and Lord M'Laren. In 1862 he published a work on the "Law of Citation and Diligence in Scotland." He practised for some years in the Parliament House, but in 1867 he joined the English Bar and removed to London. In the short compass of little more than 600 pages the learned author presents an excellent treatise on the principles of English Law. He follows generally the arrangement of Blackstone's Commentaries, and discusses (1) Status; (2) Ownership of Property; (3) Obligations; (4) Civil Procedure; and (5) Crimes and Criminal Procedure. As the title indicates, the work deals not with details, but with the general or main principles of the law. It is well written, and the principles are clearly and succinctly explained. It will admirably suit the purpose of Scots lawyers who desire to have a general knowledge of the salient points of the legal system of the sister country.

A Complete System of Conveyancing, adapted to the Present Practice of Scotland and the Recent Statutes, comprehending the Constitution, Transmission and Extinction of Heritable and Moveable Rights. By the Juridical Society of Edinburgh. In Two Vols. Vol. I. Sixth Edition. William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 30*s. net.*

Very considerable changes have been made on the original work in the new edition of this "System of Conveyancing"—more familiarly known as "The Juridical Styles." The various editions of the Style Book published by the Juridical Society have always been regarded as of high authority by the profession in Scotland, and we feel sure that the sixth edition, under the editorship of Mr Henry Aitken, K.C., supported by the committee and contributors whose names appear on the title-page, will maintain the reputation of the work of the Society. The arrangement in previous editions of dividing the work under "Heritable Rights" and "Moveable Rights" has been abandoned, and in the present volume the collection of writs is grouped under ten headings irrespective of whether they refer to heritage or moveables. The placing of the ten titles dealt with on the back of the volume will greatly facilitate reference. Not only is the arrangement of the new edition novel, but many of the titles have been practically entirely rewritten, new forms having in many cases been substituted for the old-fashioned ones contained in former editions. In the present volume the changes are perhaps best exemplified in the titles dealing with Feus and with Leases. The printing and general get-up of the volume leave nothing to be desired.

Trade Union Law. By Herman Cohen, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd. Price 6s.

Since the day when Mr Cohen first collaborated with Mr George Howell, the veteran trade union leader, their names have been inseparably connected as guides and counsellors to the trade union world. When the last edition of this book, then their united work, was published, that world was staggering under the double shock of the decisions in Quinn v. Leathem [1901], A.C. 495, and the Taff Vale case [1901], A.C. 426. Much litigation has flowed through the Courts since then, and the perplexities of trade union officers were not thereby diminished. But the Trade Disputes Act of last year has added a new, and, as they believe, a brighter chapter to their history, and the present volume explains with the author's well-known caution and completeness of information how the ground of action has been cleared and definite principles at last enunciated. The form which has served so useful a purpose in the former edition has been retained—a commentary on the statutes; but the bulk has been kept within the familiar limits by the omission of Mr Howell's historical introduction. Mr Cohen is to be congratulated on the production of a volume so much required, and which asks no recommendation beyond the author's name on its title-page.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, with Explanatory Notes and Decided Cases. Popular Edition. By Henry Lynn, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Jordan & Sons Ltd. Price 1s. net.

Of the making of books on the new Workmen's Compensation Act there is no end. Mr Lynn's contribution to this literature, although described as a popular edition, is by no means the least useful from the point of view of the practitioner. It is in form a compilation of the cases under the old Acts, so far as applicable to the new, collected under the relative sections. The facts and decision in each case are shortly stated, and dicta of any importance are also given. The creditable desire for succinctness is perhaps exaggerated, so that the statement of facts frequently gives little, if any, clue to the ratio of decision; and an appeal dismissed because it was held to raise no question of law is treated in the same manner as one in which a question of law was decided and the decision affirmed. It is a little surprising also (although one would not expect to find an exhaustive collection of cases in a popular manual) to have to note the omission of any reference to so important a decision as Dobson v. United Collieries Ltd., 1905, 8 F. 241. But the book has much to recommend it; and not least, that first of all requisites in a book of daily reference, an excellent index.

The Revised Table A, being the Regulations of Companies Limited by Shares as Sanctioned by the Board of Trade in 1906. With Notes and Comments by Paul F. Simonson, M.A., Oxon; of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Effingham Wilson; Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1907. Price 3s 6d. net.

The set of articles contained in the Revised Table A will in future apply to all Companies which have not special articles of their own. And, moreover, many of their provisions will be much used by draftsmen preparing special sets of articles. This book contains the text of the Revised Table A, with very full notes citing numerous authorities, prepared by Mr Simonson, an author whose other works on Company Law are well known.

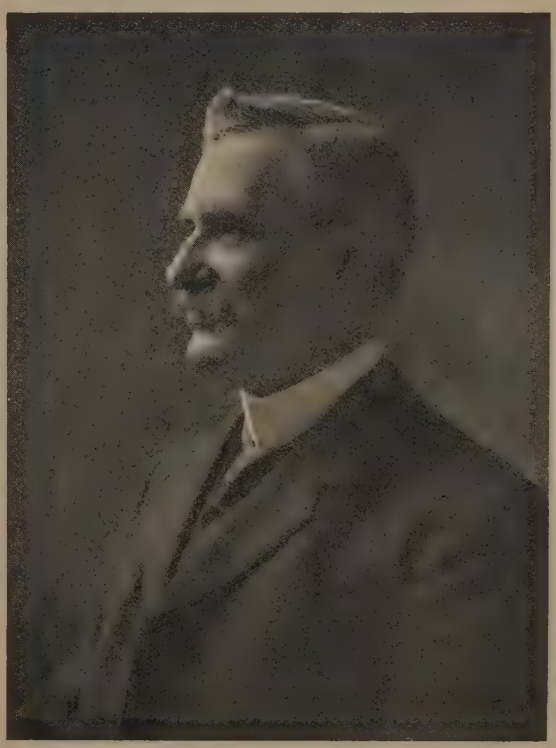
Prescription and Custom. By Thomas H. Carson, of Lincoln's Inn, One of His Majesty's Counsel. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1907. Price 6s.

The author of this book, who is one of the joint editors of Tudor's Leading Cases on Conveyancing, delivered a course of six lectures in the Old Hall of Lincoln's Inn in 1907 at the request of the Council of Legal Education. These lectures are reproduced in the present little volume. No better guide to the subject could be found for students. It is treated in an admirable, clear, and lucid way, and in brief compass gives an accurate general survey of the branch of law with which it deals.

JOHN PROSSER, Esq., W.S.

Mr John Prosser is one of the partners of the well-known firm of Messrs Morton, Smart, Macdonald & Prosser, W.S., and both he and his firm stand deservedly high in the estimation both of the legal profession and of the public.

A son of the late Mr David Prosser, an officer of Excise, the subject of our portrait was born in 1857 at Bridge of Cally, where his father was for the time resident. His early education he received at the local schools, and later at Alyth Parish School; but at the age of fifteen he went to Dundee, and for four years, from 1872 to 1876, he occupied a desk in the office of Messrs Patullo & Thornton, solicitors there. He did not fail to take full advantage of the facilities which that office afforded him for active work and practical legal training. In 1876 he came to Edinburgh and entered as junior clerk the office of which he is now a partner. The senior partner of the firm at that time was the late Mr Charles Morton, W.S., who under three successive Liberal Administrations held the office of Crown Agent for Scotland. In 1877 Mr Prosser entered the Law Faculty of the University of Edinburgh, and in that and the succeeding year he was first prizeman in the classes of Scots Law and Conveyancing. He acted as assistant both to Mr Macpherson, Professor of Scots Law, and to Mr Fraser-Tytler, Professor of Conveyancing. Having passed through various departments in his office, he was on 1st January 1883 assumed as a partner of the firm. In the following year he was admitted to the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts, and in 1898 he joined the Society of Writers to the Signet. A shrewd and able man of business, ever zealous in the interests of his clients, Mr Prosser has in the thirty years of his professional life in Edinburgh made a record rarely equalled of strenuous and unremitting hard work. Though he always avoids litigation when that is possible, he is very frequently to be seen in the Parliament House, and if his clients are forced to litigate he misses no points and spares no exertions on their behalf. He has a high reputation as a commercial lawyer, and his standing as a conveyancer has recently been recognised in his appointment as a member of the Commission on Registration of Title in Scotland, which is being presided over by the Lord Justice-General. Mr Prosser is the trusted adviser of many private clients and bodies of trustees as well as of a number of public Companies and Corporations. He is a Justice of the Peace for the County of the City of Dundee.



We publish this week in the Appendix to "The Scots Law Times" Edition of the Statutes, three sets of Statutory Rules and Orders which have been issued under powers conferred upon the Secretary of State under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1907. We direct special attention to these Rules, which are of great importance in the working of the new Act. The Act of Sederunt on the subject we published some weeks ago.

The Court of Session rises to-day for the autumn vacation. Several of the Jury Trials put out for the sittings have been settled, but there are still a number of trials which will take place next week. The Lord Justice-General left Edinburgh on Thursday evening to attend a State Ball at Buckingham Palace. His Lordship returns for the Jury sittings next week.

The Inner House cases published this week practically complete the reports of Inner House decisions in all three Divisions down to the end of last week. During the present week there have been a large number of advisings in the Inner House, and several cases have been decided in the Justiciary Appeal Court. Double numbers of the "Scots Law Times" will be issued in vacation, and it is expected that the cases which still remain to be reported will be published early in August.

It is announced that a special sitting of the High Court of Justiciary will be held at Elgin on the 30th inst. This is the first occasion on which the Circuit Court has ever sat in Elgin, and also the first occasion on which the provision in sect. 47 of the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887, to the effect that the High Court of Justiciary may sit at places other than the regular circuit towns, has been used. The case which is to be tried in Elgin is a very extraordinary one, the charge against the accused being that he ravished a woman of the age of eighty-three. The reason of the special sitting is that the principal witness is unable to be removed to Inverness.

Mr J. M. Haining, who has for the last two years acted as Procurator in the Perth Courts for Messrs M'Cash & Hunter, solicitors there, has now commenced practice on his own account at 30 St David Street, Dumfries.

The Late WILLIAM SHAW, Esq., Writer, Glasgow.

The announcement of the death of Mr William Shaw, at Skelmorlie, on 13th July, caused a shock of surprise and pain in legal circles in Glasgow, and far beyond the limits of Glasgow.

Mr Shaw was a native of Paisley. He was educated in the University of Glasgow, and there, among other distinctions, gained the first prize in the class of Scots Law in the session 1876–77.

He received his professional training in the office of Messrs Wright, Johnston & Mackenzie, where he acquired valuable experience in court work, and also laid the foundation of a thorough knowledge of mercantile and shipping law. Subsequently he entered the office of Messrs Roberton & Ross, and, as procurator to the firm, conducted the extensive court and arbitration work of that firm for several years.

In 1881 he became a partner with Messrs Borland and King, the firm taking the style of Messrs Borland, King & Shaw.

In 1887 he was admitted to the Faculty of Procurators, and was a member of the Council of the Faculty for three years.

In 1890 he was appointed Procurator-Fiscal of Police for the city of Glasgow, but three years later he found it necessary to resign that appointment on account of the growth of the business of his firm.

In March 1900 he was elected to the Lectureship on Mercantile Law in the University of Glasgow. He threw himself into the duties of this office with his customary zeal and assiduity; and the spontaneous growth in the number of the students attending the class furnished striking testimony both to his success as a teacher of law and to the appreciation in which he was held by his students.

For many years Mr Shaw has been deeply immersed in legal business. His qualities as a lawyer were of a high order. Few men had a greater faculty for marshalling facts and presenting them effectively. He was a man of untiring energy, sound in judgment, sagacious in counsel, and prompt in action—qualities which gained him, in no ordinary measure, the confidence of clients and the esteem of his professional brethren.

There are, however, others whose thoughts now dwell rather on more intimate things—his winsome personality, his unselfish kindness, his loyal friendship—qualities rarer and more priceless than professional attainments.

The Late Alexander Watt, Esq., Solicitor, Banff.—Mr Alexander Watt, solicitor, Banff, died on Tuesday evening, after an illness extending over several months. Mr Watt, who was a native of Macduff, and a brother of Mr George Watt, K.C., was one of the best known and most prominent legal practitioners in Banffshire. He held many important appointments, such as Clerk of Lieutenancy of the county, local law agent for the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, and for the Countess of Seafield, and he was for many years Conservative agent for the county. He was a prominent member of Banffshire County Council, taking a leading part in its discussions, and was some time ago a useful member of Banff Town Council and School Board. Mr Watt was a man of great force of character, and in the county exercised great influence. He was an elder in the Banff High United Free Church.

LONDON LETTER.

Temple, 17*th July* 1907.

Mr Justice Channell had occasion in Andersen v. Marten [1907], 2 K.B. 248, to give a decision on a point that has been the subject of much learned debate. Belligerent capture does not vest the ownership of the vessel in the captors unless it has been regularised by a decree of the prize court; but is the effect of the decree, when made, to make their title relate back to the time of capture? The German ss. "Romulus," insured with an exception of war risks, was captured on 26th February 1905, as a contrabandist, by the Japanese. She subsequently stranded (27th February), and became a total wreck. Proceedings which resulted in condemnation on 17th May were taken in the prize court at Yokosuka; and on these facts the English court found that there had been a total loss by capture prior to the wreck, and that the insured could not recover. It is not at first apparent on what ground the Japanese decision proceeded. Contraband trading is not a cause of confiscation except in particular circumstances. But in this case the shipowner was the merchant as well. He engaged to supply the goods to the Russian importer, and sent them out in his own vessel. Condemnation therefore proceeded on correct principles. The only question was as to its effect. Had the ship, when lost by wreck, been previously lost by capture? Or was she not so lost until 17th May? As already observed, the former view prevailed. Generally these questions arise with regard to captures from the enemy and not from neutrals. The two cases are not quite on all fours; because there is a general license to seize the enemy's property, whilst a neutral's is only taken from him when particular complex conditions are fulfilled ("The Statira," Wheaton's Int. Law, sect. 365), to determine which some judicial investigation is not only desirable but necessary.

Without entering on the region of politics, and speaking simply from the juridical standpoint, such statutes as the recent Workmen's Compensation Act seem much to be deprecated, as divorcing responsibility from control. Their economic pressure on persons with the slightest physical defect, such as hardness of hearing, advanced age, poverty of blood and the like, is a very real and genuine thing, and by no means a figment of the alarmist. Lodging-house proprietors, to whom seven-and-sixpence is a serious matter, are inclined to dismiss their domestics when they find a fourfold premium charged on account of a slight defect. It is easy to wave disquietude aside by a glib reference to insurance. Is it so certain that insurance is a complete protection against the crushing liabilities of the recent Act? The companies in many cases attach a tissue of conditions to their policies, which afford an indefinite number of loopholes by which they may escape from liability. And for any case not precisely on ordinary lines, the ordinary policy cannot be made to work. The companies, naturally, will not modify it; and the result is that inaccurate recitals are made, impossible conditions accepted, and a false position set up, which may easily result in the insurance being invalid. Take, for instance, the glaring matter of employment of one servant by several masters. The insurance company requires to know the total amount of the servant's earnings. One master may not know who the others are; and very certainly may not care to enquire how much they pay. Earnings may be in casual ways which one employer may know of, whilst the others have no idea of it. The case becomes very acute where the contracts of service are not simple, definite engagements, like those usual in factories (for which the Act was first framed), but rest on understandings and custom. Under such engagements it may be very difficult, and very inadvisable, to say exactly who is the master, and to what extent. Say, for instance, that a daughter of the family has the benefit of the services of a lady's maid, and contributes to the household expenses. Or, as a very conspicuous instance, with which you are probably not troubled in Scotland, take the case of a man who is clerk in a set of chambers which are occupied by several barristers. Probably only one barrister pays him his weekly wage: perhaps two or three do so. Probably only one engages him; but is that one the agent of the rest? Probably their rent (which itself may be subject to all kinds of mutual arrangements) contains a virtual return for the clerk's services: possibly the clerk's fees on their briefs are considered sufficient. No apportionment is generally made, showing what portion of rent is attributable to "use of clerk." Under these circumstances, how can a barrister contract, as the insurance requires, "to keep a proper wages-book," and the like? But he must do so, or go uninsured, in a fond reliance on the common-sense of the Courts. Again, is uberrima fides a condition of these contracts? Numberless persons must have insured their servants without imagining that they are bound to give the insurers notice of slight defects of physique. It would be a great responsibility to say that such persons are not protected.

The Law Society has been much exercised of late as to the financial dealings of solicitors. The cases—not perhaps very frequent, but very conspicuous—in which laxity in the treatment of clients' money has led to deplorable consequences, led to the appointment some months since of a committee of eleven members, charged with recommending some system which should restore public confidence in the profession. They recently reported in favour of a system by which all clients' moneys should be paid into a separate banking account or accounts, and only used under the authority of the client:—whilst any increment on moneys of the client should be the sole property of the latter, as long as the solicitor retained it; which he should not do for any prolonged period. This is not to go much beyond what is usually accepted as strictly proper. But the crux of the proposals was one for an independent annual audit by an accountant in cases where no separate bank accounts are kept—and a detailed statutory declaration of proper dealing even in cases where they are. No scheme of mutual guarantee could be agreed upon. The audit provisions were dissented from by a minority, and have been rejected by a large majority at the adjourned annual meeting of the society. The feeling was expressed by Sir J. G. Hill and Mr Cobbett (Manchester) that, "if they admitted that the honour of the profession was at such a low ebb that it needed stimulating once a year," the public would cease to have any confidence in them at all. A poll was however demanded, and the result is still in suspense.

The Hague Conference continues its slow debates. Its course is somewhat perplexing to those who do not analyse it closely. Four committees, with sub-committees, are sitting simultaneously, yet not generally on the same days, as so many delegates belong to two or more. One committee deals with Arbitration, another with Land War, a third with Naval War, and a fourth with Prize Law (i.e. Naval War as it affects neutrals). The outstanding feature is the British offer to abolish contraband. This would put a sudden and desirable end to a great number of difficult problems, and one may be inclined, with great lawyers like Von Bar, to think it the best solution of them.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Curtice v. London City and Midland Bank.

Bank—Cheque—Countermand—Bill of Exchange—Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61), sect. 75.—The plaintiff gave a cheque on the defendants' bank, and on the same day he sent a telegram to the bank countermanding payment. The telegram arrived after bank hours, and was put into the letter-box. Next morning when the box was cleared the telegram was overlooked, and it was not found until the box was again cleared on the following day. Meantime the cheque was presented for payment and was paid. Held that payment had been duly countermanded, and that the defendants were liable to the plaintiff for the amount of the cheque.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—8*th June* 1907.

Glenie v. Tucker and Bruce Smith.

Bill of Exchange—Indorsement.—A sold goods to B, payment for which was to be guaranteed by C. B signed a blank bill form which was endorsed by C. The form was then filled up by A for the amount due. It was then in the form of a bill accepted by B, of which A was the drawer, and which was endorsed by C. Held that C was liable on the bill.—K.B. Div. (A. T. Lawrence, J.).—11*th June* 1907.

Johnston v. Mew, Langton & Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. II., sects. 8, 10.—Where a memorandum of agreement for compensation was disputed and the County Court judge, preparatory to making an order, heard evidence, held that he was acting in a judicial and not in a ministerial capacity, and that his decision was subject to appeal to the Divisional Court in ordinary form.—K.B. Div. (Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—11*th June* 1907.

Clifford v. Phillips.

Partnership — Dissolution — "Professional Misconduct."—Decision of Warrington, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 172), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Buckley, L.J.).—12*th June* 1907.

Riley v. Mayor, etc. of Halifax.

Property—Infringement—Remedy. — The defendants by inadvertence carried an erection which they were making on their own land on to that of the plaintiff for a distance of forty-two feet underground, but without affecting the surface. Held that, as the cost of removing it would be great, the Court should make an order to pay damages and refuse to order the removal of the works.—Chan. Div. (Joyce, J.).—13*th June* 1907.

Lancaster Rural Dis rict v. Fisher and Le Fanu.

Statute—Locomotives Act 1898 (61 and 62 Vict. cap. 29), sect. 12 (1) (b).—A contract for the laying of water-pipes in connection with an aqueduct provided for their maintenance by the contractors for twelve months after completion. Held that the time limit for bringing an action in reference to damage done to roads did not count from the end of the twelve months but from the time when the damage was done, or from the completion of the works.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—15*th June* 1907.

Hase v. London General Omnibus Co. Ltd.

Reparation—Negligence.—A passenger on an omnibus was struck on the chest by an iron arm projecting from a lamp-post at the corner of a street. This was due to the omnibus being driven round a corner close to the curb and the top of the omnibus projecting over the pavement, owing to the camber of the road. The driver of the omnibus did not notice the projecting arm of the lamp-post. Held that the County Court judge was entitled to find that there was no negligence on the part of the driver.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and A. T. Lawrence, JJ.).—17*th June* 1907.

The Late CHARLES RAMPINI, Esq., Advocate.

Mr Charles Rampini, D.L., LL.D., advocate, of Burnside, Paignton, South Devon, and late Sheriff of Dumfries, died in Edinburgh on 25th July. About a week previously Mr Rampini was seized with apoplexy, and he never rallied. Born in Edinburgh in 1840, Mr Rampini was educated at the Academy, and afterwards at the Edinburgh University, where in 1865 he was first prizeman in Roman Law. In June of the same year he was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates. A year later he was appointed a Stipendiary Magistrate of Jamaica; in 1867 he became District Court Judge at Port Antonio, in 1868 at Maudville, and in 1876 at Kingston. A few years prior to the last-mentioned appointment Mr Rampini was made a Commissioner to prepare rules for the District Courts. In 1873 he was chosen to be puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of British Guiana, but on account of ill-health he was unable to take up the appointment. In 1877 he prepared a volume of Law Reports for the Government of Jamaica, and in the following year he retired from the Colonial service with a pension. He had been medically certified at that time as unable to reside longer in a tropical climate. On his return to this country he was appointed in 1878 a Sheriff-Substitute of Caithness, Orkney and Shetland, with residence at Lerwick, and during his term there of seven years he took the greatest interest in the social welfare of the islanders. He took an active part in the scheme for the erection of a public hall at Lerwick, and for public services rendered to the islands he was in 1882 made a Deputy-Lieutenant of Shetland, and his portrait, which now hangs in Lerwick, was presented to him. Three years afterwards he was transferred to Elgin, and he remained there until 1899, when he was appointed Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway in succession to Sheriff Wallace. Unfortunately his health broke down, and after holding only one Court in the south he was compelled to resign. Since then he has lived in retirement. In 1891, in acknowledgment of his worth, the Aberdeen University conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. Of a fine literary taste, Mr Rampini made not a few contributions to literature. He was the author of a history of Moray and Nairn, in Messrs Blackwood's "County Series," "Tales of Old Scotland," "Shetland and the Shetlanders"—the last being a reprint of two lectures delivered before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution in 1884; "Letters from Jamaica," and other works of general interest. In private life Mr Rampini was much esteemed. His brother—Mr Robert Rampini—is a Judge in the Supreme Court of Calcutta.

The Late MARCUS J. BROWN, Esq., S.S.C.

The death took place in Edinburgh on 24th July of Mr Marcus J. Brown, S.S.C., of Messrs M. J. Brown, Son & Co. Born at Musselburgh in 1858, Mr Brown was educated at the Edinburgh Institution, and after being trained for the legal profession and attending the law classes at Edinburgh University, he was admitted a law agent in 1885, in which year he also joined the S.S.C. Society. From the outset of his professional career Mr Brown was singularly successful. A shrewd man of business, quick to grasp the strong or the weak points of a case, he soon acquired a large practice in the Sheriff Courts, and it was not unusual to find him successfully arguing cases before the Sheriff, with prominent counsel opposed to him. In the Court of Session, also, he had an extensive practice, and in the other branches of legal work he was regarded as a man of wide knowledge and experience. Though a keen business man, Mr Brown found it possible to give some time to golf and other forms of sport. A Musselburgh man, he made the most of his opportunities of acquiring early in life a knowledge of the royal and ancient game, and twenty years ago he had possibly no superior amongst the amateurs of his native town. As a member of the Royal Musselburgh Club he was one of the most consistent winners of their cherished old silver cup. His name was first inscribed on it in 1875, and he was winner again in 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1886, 1888, 1889, and 1891. Indeed, such was his success on the links that from 1875 to 1901 he won no fewer than thirty-eight gold scratch medals in various clubs. He was one of the players in the first amateur golf championship held at St Andrews in 1886, when he was beaten by Mr H. S. C. Everard in the second round. Latterly, Mr Brown played principally in the competitions of the New Club, Musselburgh, and in those of the Kilspindie Club at Craigielaw. Mr Brown was also a good shot, and was skilful with the rod.

ACT OF SEDERUNT.

Edinburgh, 18*th July* 1907.—The Lords of Council and Session, in pursuance of powers vested in them by the Court of Session Act 1868, sect. 8, as amended by Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907, sect. 1, hereby appoint Lord M'Laren, Lord Pearson, and Lord Ardwall to sit from Tuesday, 15th October 1907, until Saturday, 2nd November 1907, as a Court for the hearing and disposal of causes standing on the Rolls of the First Division; and further, appoint Mr John Cairns, Depute Clerk in the Outer House, to act as Clerk of said Court.—Dunedin, I.P.D.

The appointment of Mr J. M. Irvine to the Chair of Law in the University of Aberdeen created a vacancy in the staff of "The Session Cases." Mr J. Hossell Henderson, B.A., LL.B., has been selected as Professor Irvine's successor. The vacancy on Mr Rettie's staff was the first which has occurred since the Faculty of Advocates took over the Session Cases, and the appointment was made by the Faculty Committee. Mr Hossell Henderson, though comparatively junior at the Bar (he was called in 1900), has had considerable experience as a reporter. He has represented "The Scots Law Times" in the Second Division since May 1903.

Faculty of Advocates.—Mr James Campbell Henderson-Hamilton and Mr John Macgregor, M.A., LL.B., were on 19th July admitted to the Faculty of Advocates.

The following gentlemen have been admitted members of the Society of Writers to His Majesty's Signet, viz.:—William Leslie Christie, LL.B., 3 Whitehouse Terrace; John Cook, 22 Eglinton Crescent; Robert Stormonth Darling, 1 Atholl Crescent; Maurice Rhynd Dickson, 1 Atholl Crescent; Robert Gibb, 31 East Claremont Street; Charles Fellowes Moncrieffe Maclachlan, 5 Strathearn Place, Edinburgh.

THE FACULTY OF ADVOCATES AND BILLS IN PARLIAMENT.

At a meeting of the Faculty of Advocates held on 19th July, reports of Committees on the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Bill, the Companies Bill and Companies (Debentures and Debenture Stock) Bill, and the Intestate Husband's Estate (Scotland) Bill, were presented and adopted by the Faculty.

THE SHERIFF COURTS BILL.

The report of the Committee on the Sheriff Courts Bill stated that the Bill, in addition to consolidating the present law, proposed to introduce numerous innovations. The principal of these are (1) the abolition of the Debts Recovery Court as a separate court; (2) an extension of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court, both in regard to the class of persons subject to its jurisdiction and in regard to the class of actions which may competently be tried therein; and (3) an extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction in the Small Debt Court up to £20. The Bill proposes to repeal the Debts Recovery Act (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 96), and thus to abolish this court as a separate court. The court, in the opinion of the Committee, has never been a satisfactory one, and the Committee unanimously approved of its abolition. The Bill proposes to introduce into the ordinary court a form of procedure intermediate between the informal procedure of the Small Debt Court and the formal procedure of the ordinary court, and to make this intermediate procedure applicable to all claims for payment of money exceeding £20 and not exceeding £50. This, in their opinion, perpetuates the unsatisfactory procedure of that court, and makes it applicable to a larger number of cases. The Committee disapproved of this proposal. The Committee suggested that there should be only two forms of procedure, viz.—(1) the informal procedure of the Small Debt Court, and (2) the formal procedure of the ordinary court. On the assumption that an intermediate procedure is to be retained, the Committee suggested it should be made applicable to all cases under £50 in value which are not raised in the Small Debt Court. On the question of jurisdiction, the Committee saw no objection to Sheriffs being empowered to consider actions concerning heritable property, whatever their value, when the action is undefended, or when both parties are willing; but they considered that in the event of the action being defended either party should have the right of transferring the action to the Court of Session within six days of closing the record. The Committee made a number of suggestions limiting the jurisdiction over foreigners conferred by the Bill. The Committee approved of the proposal that all actions under £50 in value should be raised in the Sheriff Court. They, however, suggested that when the value of the case is over £20, power should be given to the Sheriff to grant leave to appeal upon questions of fact as well as of law. With regard to Sheriffs, Clause 12 provides—"Every person appointed to the office of Sheriff shall be an advocate of five years' standing at least, or, if not an advocate, a Sheriff-Substitute of five years' standing at least." The present requirements are that a person appointed to the office of Sheriff shall be an advocate of at least three years' standing, who at the date of his appointment is either in regular attendance upon the Court of Session, or acting as a Sheriff-Substitute. The Committee approved of the clause in so far as it requires an advocate to be of at least five years' standing before becoming eligible for a Sheriffship. They thought, however, that the present qualification regarding attendance on the Court of Session, or acting as a Sheriff-Substitute, should be retained in a modified form. The Committee suggested that Sheriff-Substitutes removed from office on account of inability should be eligible for an annuity in the same manner as Sheriffs. The Committee disapproved of the clause vesting the right of appointing the Procurator-Fiscal in the Lord Advocate, instead of in the Sheriff, with the approval of the Secretary for Scotland. The Committee disapproved of the proposal to introduce jury trials into the Sheriff Courts. They, however, approved of the raising of the Small Debt Court limit from £12 to £20.

INTESTATE HUSBAND'S ESTATE BILL.

The Committee on the Intestate Husband's Estate (Scotland) Bill reported that the Bill proposed to make an amendment on the law of Scotland such as was effected in England by the Intestates Estates Act 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 29). The present Bill follows the lines of the English Act, only differing from it where it is necessary to make the phraseology apply to Scotland. The effect of the Bill in Scotland will be to give to widows of such intestates, within the limits prescribed in the Bill, the one-half of the moveables which the next of kin would otherwise have taken, and the fee of the heritage which would otherwise have gone to the heir at law. The Committee approved generally of the Bill, which appears to remove a hardship which especially affects widows who are left in poor circumstances, but pointed out that the phraseology of sect. 3, in referring to a charge on the estate, required verbal alteration to adapt it to Scots law.

THE COMPANIES BILLS.

The report of the Committee on the Companies Bill and Companies (Debentures and Debenture Stock) Bill, stated that the two Bills remitted to the Committee are the Companies Bill, as amended in Committee of the House of Lords, and now in the House of Commons, and the Companies (Debentures and Debenture Stock) Bill, introduced in the House of Lords by Lord Avebury, the provisions of which were now substantially embodied in the first, which is a Government Bill. The Bill is mainly based on recommendations of a report of a Departmental Committee appointed by the Board of Trade on 8th February 1905, which reported on 18th June 1906. The Committee considered the several parts in their order, and made a number of recommendations. They approved of Clause 1 of the Bill, which proposes that a company which does not issue a prospectus on its formation shall not allot any of its shares or debentures unless before the first allotment there has been filed with the Registrar a "statement in lieu of prospectus," verified by a director and the Company's solicitor, containing the required particulars, but excludes "private companies" from its operation. With reference to Clause 6, the Committee thought that the allotment of shares for a consideration other than cash was an important and often delicate matter, and ought to be reduced to writing and not left to the uncertainty of a verbal bargain. The Committee also approved of Clause 10, which authorises, in the case of the expenditure of share capital in constructing works or erecting plant which cannot earn profit for a long period, the payment of interest out of capital during construction. Suggestions are made with regard to the provisions relating to mortgages and charge. On that subject the Committee reported :—

"The main question is whether the methods recognised by the law of Scotland of completing securities over property, heritable or moveable, viz., recording in the Register of Sasines, delivery, possession, intimation, etc., according to the nature of the subject transferred, are to be adhered to, or a valid security allowed to be constituted without these essentials, and, inter alia, by what is called in England a 'floating charge' over the undertaking and property of the Company, including corporeal moveables. On two former occasions (in 1896 and 1899) the Faculty, on considering Reports on the Bill which ultimately became the Act of 1900, resolved against the change, being satisfied that the present Scotch system is much preferable, and in any view that so sweeping a change in our law should not be dealt with merely by clauses in a Companies Bill. To this view the Committee adhere, and are of opinion that a declaration to that effect, similar to that contained in the Act of 1900, should be inserted in the Bill. They are, however, of opinion that where uncalled capital of a company is made a security for debt, filing the deed of charge or assignment with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies should be sufficient intimation, and should be substituted for the present cumbrous method of intimation to the shareholders individually, with notice on the share certificates. This suggestion is in conformity with the principle of the law of Scotland, but improves the mode of its application, and was formerly approved by the Faculty."

The Committee were also of opinion that the requirements with regard to foreign companies carrying on business in the United Kingdom are reasonable and not too onerous.

LAW AGENTS' EXAMINATIONS.

The results of the half-yearly examinations in general knowledge, which were held lately in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Dundee, have been published. For the first examination in general knowledge 110 candidates entered, 42 have passed or been found qualified in all the subjects, and 30 have satisfied the examiners or been found qualified by Leaving or other accepted Certificates in two subjects. For the second examination in general knowledge 195 candidates presented themselves. Of these 89 passed in one subject, 31 in two, 12 in three, and 2 in four subjects. The papers of the candidates of this examination were as follows:—Mathematics 24, passed 10; Logic 55, passed 45; Latin 98, passed 50; Greek 5, passed 3; French 69, passed 32; German 6, passed 3; Italian 2, passed 1; book-keeping 89, passed 51. The quarterly examination in Law was held in Edinburgh on 15th inst., when 58 candidates presented themselves for examination. Fifty-six of these were examined in all the subjects, and 28 passed. Two graduates in law (LL.B. and B.L.) were examined in Court Procedure, and both passed.

The following is a list of those who were successful in the examination in law, viz.: William Angus, Robert Fergusson Brown, Robert Smith Candlish, John Henderson Davie, Oliver Dow, James Ogilvie Duncan, M.A., B.L.; Alexander Fyfe, Anthony Murray John Graham; Weir Grieve, M.A.; Joseph Blacklock Halliday, Samuel Smiles Jerdan, George Robert Marshall Jockel, Alexander Robert Henry Johnston, Alexander Laurie, Thomas Lyell; James M'Intosh, M.A., LL.B.; Ian Mackay, Tom Perceval Mackenzie, Samuel Dow Macmillan, Lawrence Marshall, John Crichton Masterton, Alexander Innes Millar, William Thomson Mitchell, Allan Grant Pirie, William Pirie, William Pitcairn, junior; James Hunter Scott, James Primrose Stark, Alexander Macdonald Whyte, James Hampton Brown Will.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

Vital Registration. A Manual of the Law and Practice concerning the Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages. Second Edition. By G. T. Bisset-Smith, F.S.S. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 10s.

The aim of this book is to collect in a handy form the gist of the law and practice of vital registration as carried out in Scotland, and that aim is fully accomplished. It gives in comparatively small bulk a collection of the Acts regarding the registration of births, deaths and marriages in Scotland, a commentary on those Acts, an explanation of the technicalities in the administration of those Acts, and a variety of matter calculated to be of use to registrars and others concerned in the preparation of our national registers. In these respects the work is fairly complete, and may with confidence be recommended as a work of reference to those concerned with registration, and a work from which reliable guidance can be obtained in most difficulties likely to arise in the work of registrars. In the preface it is stated that the previous issue was disposed of in a short period, and that fact is an indication of how this book supplies a want. The principal difference between this edition of Mr Bisset-Smith's book and the first edition is the inclusion in it of a chapter on vital statistics. This chapter, however, hardly attains to the standard of the rest of the work, for not only is it too short to be comprehensive, but the short space there is at the author's disposal, instead of being devoted to the essentials of vital statistics, is to a great extent utilised for the discussion of such subjects as Malthusianism, Neo-malthusianism, and Illegitimacy, subjects which may be of interest to theorists, but are of only passing interest to the practical registrars for whom the work is primarily intended.

The Law of Mines, Quarries, and Minerals. By Robert Foster MacSwinney, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Third Edition. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1907. Price £2, 2s.

The treatise of which this is the third edition occupies a deservedly high place in legal literature. It is the principal book on its subject. The late Mr Ross Stewart, advocate, wrote on "Mines and Minerals," and "Bainbridge on Mines" was in its day a well-known English law book, but it is nearly thirty years since the last edition was published, and neither of these books can now compete with Mr MacSwinney's work. The learned author is evidently a man of strong opinions and not afraid to state them. Referring to recent statutes he says: "It would be hard to find in modern times anything more shameful than the Trade Disputes Act 1906, except perhaps the circumstances under which it became law. Against the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (although due to similar picketing on the one side and imbecility on the other) little by comparison can be urged." Happily the bulk of the author's work deals with subjects less exciting than modern legislation, and they receive judicial and impartial discussion free from any political bias. Even on the controversial question of what is included under the term "mineral" in the legal sense, the learned author deals without impatience with the somewhat confusing diversity of legal opinion. The book is very complete. It includes a large variety of subjects within its scope, and it deals exhaustively with them all. A number of the leading Scots cases are referred to, and, in addition to the statement of the law of England generally, there are chapters treating specially of the Rights and Customs recognised in Cornwall, Devonshire, Gloucestershire and Derbyshire.

Registration of Voters. By M. Moloney, of the South-Eastern Circuit, Barrister-at-law. Second Edition. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd. Price 7s. 6d.

This is a compendium of rules and forms for the guidance of overseers, vestry and town clerks, registration officers and rate collectors, whose duty it is to prepare lists of voters. It is a manual for the use of a business man in his business, not a treatise on a branch of law. Annotation of statutes and citation of case law are alike proscribed, and the lawyer in search of authority for a bad proposition will therefore peruse it in vain. It is perhaps due to the scheme of the book that it contains no little duplication of information when the same qualification suffices for county, parish, municipal or parliamentary borough. But this avoids a more or less unsatisfactory system of cross references; and the utility of the manual, evidenced in a second edition, is not thereby lessened.

The Late DUNCAN ROBERTSON, Esq.,

Sheriff-Substitute of Aberdeen, Kincardine and Banff.

The sudden death of Mr Duncan Robertson, the senior Sheriff-Substitute of Aberdeen, Kincardine and Banff at Aberdeen, came as a great shock to all who knew him. He had just returned to duty after his holiday, part of which he had spent in Norway and part in Mull, and appeared to be in excellent health; but, after an illness of a few hours, he expired on the morning of the 29th of September.

Mr Robertson was born in 1851, and was educated at the Edinburgh Academy, where he was a class-fellow of Sir Thomas Raleigh. His father was well known in legal circles in Edinburgh as the clerk (and the intimate personal friend) of Lord President M'Neill, and it was not unnatural that the son should turn to the Bar as his profession. After the usual arts and law curriculum at the University of Edinburgh, he passed Advocate in 1873.

Mr Robertson's practice was never very large, but he did what work he had to do with a care and an ability eminently satisfactory alike to the Court and to his clients. His mind was cast in an essentially judicial mould, and his instinctive fairness, coupled as it was with sound judgment and an exemplary moderation of tone, made him later on an ideal public prosecutor. His term in the Crown Office, however, was destined to be short. Appointed one of his deputes by Lord Advocate Macdonald in 1888, he accepted in 1892 the Sheriff-Substituteship at Aberdeen, then vacant through the appointment of Mr Grierson to the Solicitorship of Inland Revenue. Had Mr Robertson remained at the Bar, there can be little doub tthat his exceptional qualifications would ultimately have received ample recognition.

But what was Edinburgh's loss was Aberdeen's gain. It is no exaggeration to say that in the course of his fifteen years' service there Mr Robertson made for himself an unique position. The Sheriff Court of Aberdeen is fortunate in having a more than respectable tradition, and that tradition was if possible enhanced by Mr Robertson's example. For conscientiousness, for sagacity, for patience, for the constans et perpetua voluntas which ought to animate every judge, he had no superior in any tribunal in Scotland. This happy combination of the judicial temperament with unwearying industry and a keen point of honour, produced their natural result. No man was less disposed than he to court popularity. Save for his ever-welcome visits to the golf course his private life in Aberdeen was practically that of a recluse. He took no part in public affairs, finding that the work of his Court furnished more than sufficient occupation for his time. Yet he soon won in a remarkable degree, and having won, never lost, the confidence, the respect, and even the affection of the practitioners in his Court, of the legal profession generally, and indeed of the whole community in the North. More than once, it is believed, he was offered a Sheriffship, but he preferred to remain where he was.

Mr Robertson was a good shot, an excellent and enthusiastic fisherman, and a more than average golfer. He inherited from his father the estate of Penyghael in Mull, and there he spent a portion of his vacation every year. His unusually commanding figure will never again be seen in the Parliament House, where to the younger generation it was, of course, unknown.

But it will be long before his friends forget that sensitive and generous spirit, that strong and affectionate nature. He had a great sense of humour, and was delightful company in the society of intimate friends, though an overwhelming domestic calamity sustained within a year of his marriage threw a cast of melancholy over his spirits which was never perhaps wholly dissipated.

Mr Robertson married in 1889 Susan, daughter of the late William Scott-Kerr of Chatto and Sunlaws, who died in 1890. He is survived by one daughter.

The subject of the portrait in our next issue will be:—

The Late Lord Brampton.

The Court of Session resumed its sittings on Tuesday. All the Judges were present except Lord Stormonth Darling, who is indisposed. His Lordship—whose illness, we are glad to know, is not serious—expects to be able to be in Court next week. As a result of his absence the sittings of the Extra Division, which were appointed by Act of Sederunt to be held from Tuesday, 15th October, to Saturday, 2nd November, did not commence this week.

Considerable progress has been made during the vacation in the construction of the extension of the Court of Session accommodation. None of the Court-rooms have as yet been touched, but a great deal of work has been done in the Advocates' Library underneath the Outer House Bars. The foundations of the new building between the Library and the Cowgate have been laid, and the outside wall has been built to a height of about 20 feet. The new windows in the Advocates' Library facing towards the Sheriff Court have been made, and will provide light for the public reading-room in place of the old south windows, which will be blocked up by the accommodation for witnesses underneath the extension of the Courts. The series of rooms, including the enrolling-room, the Judges' retiring-room and the Principal Clerks' room, over which an extra flat is to be built, have been in the hands of the builders since 20th July. The old roof has been removed, and a new roof, which will form the floor of the new flat to be erected above, has been built on. A few weeks ago it looked as if the enrolling-room and the other rooms adjoining it could not possibly be ready for the meeting of the Court; but by working by night as well as by day the stage of the work aimed at has been completed, and the clerks have resumed possession of their quarters. A new drainage scheme and new heating arrangements have also been carried out during the vacation. The change which is most visible to the frequenter of the Courts is in the public entrance, part of which has been cut off to form a new staircase to the Crown Office in place of the old staircase, which has been taken down to make room for an extension of the advocates' robing room. Critics of the alterations to the public entrance to the Courts must keep in view that the work there is by no means completed. The enclosure where the public refreshment bar is now situated will be taken down, and the walls and ceiling of the vestibule will be redecorated in keeping with the style and design of the oak wood-work on the wall next the new Crown Office stair. Mr Oldrieve and his assistants in the Office of Works deserve great credit for the expedition with which the alterations have so far been carried out.

Business in the Court of Session. — The Rolls of the Court at the commencement of the Winter Session show that while the cases standing for hearing in the Inner House are somewhat less numerous than they were a year ago, there is a slight increase in the Outer House business. In the Frst Division there are 7 cases on the Summar Roll, 74 on the Short Roll, 6 on the Jury Cause Roll, and 12 on the Long Roll—total, 99. In the Second Division there are 6 cases on the Summar Roll, 90 on the Short Roll, 6 on the Jury Cause Roll, and 21 on the Long Roll—total, 123. Last October there were 125 cases before the First Division and 95 before the Second Division. In the Outer House Lord Dundas has at present 12 cases on his Procedure Roll, 2 hearings on evidence, 14 proofs, and 11 new cases. Lord Johnston has 18 cases on his Procedure Roll, 12 proofs, and 20 new cases. Lord Salvesen has 37 cases on his Procedure Roll, 20 proofs, and 63 new cases. Lord Mackenzie has 13 cases on his Procedure Roll, 8 proofs, 2 jury trials, and 24 new cases. Lord Guthrie has 25 cases on his Procedure Roll, 15 proofs, 1 hearing on evidence, 3 jury trials, and 49 new cases. There are thus 349 cases in the Outer House, as against 296 at the same period last year.

Resignation of Mr C. T. Couper, P.C.S.— The resignation of the Principal Clerk of Session in the First Division was not unexpected, as Mr Couper had not been in his place in Court since March, having received leave of absence for the Summer Session on account of the state of his health. Though he has not felt able to resume his duties, his many friends will be glad to know that he has much benefited by his period of rest. Born in 1831, Mr Charles Tennant Couper was educated in Glasgow and was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1858. For some years he acted as the Editor of the Official Reports of the High Court of Justiciary, and in addition he prepared special reports of the trial of the Directors of the City of Glasgow Bank, and the trial of the Glasgow dynamitards. In 1886 he was appointed a Principal Clerk of Session in succession to Mr Archibald Broun. In the twenty-one years in which he has sat in the First Division he has served under four Lord Presidents, and has read the Queen's and King's Commissions appointing no fewer than sixteen Judges of the Court of Session. Always courteous and willing in the discharge of the responsible duties of his office, he leaves the Court, where he has so long been a familiar figure, with the good wishes of his professional brethren. A portrait of Mr Couper appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. VII. p. 117.

In our last issue there was published the concluding portion of the Statutes for 1907. It included the new Sheriff Courts Act, which comes into force on 1st January of next year. The legal profession and the public will welcome the many reforms which the new Act contains, and it is a satisfaction to see it in the Statute Book, more especially as it looked for some time as if the Bill was to be crowded out owing to the pressure of other business in the House of Commons. The scope of the main provisions of the Act was explained in some detail in these columns when the Bill was introduced in Parliament, and it now need only be added that although a number of changes in the draughtsmanship both in the Act itself and in the rules for regulating procedure were made while the Bill was in Committee, the Act as finally adjusted does not differ materially from the Bill as introduced. The work of the Sheriff Court will doubtless be largely increased, and a certain amount of business will be taken away from the Court of Session. But the Judges of the Supreme Court, being relieved of many cases more suitable for the Sheriff Court, will be enabled to give to litigation in the Court of Session that more speedy determination the want of which often makes litigants settle their disputes rather than face the law's delays.

NEW ENGLISH JUDGE.

Lord Coleridge, K.C., has been appointed one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice. Lord Coleridge, whose appointment to the additional judgeship of the High Court, for which an address to the Crown was carried last session, was generally expected, was born in 1851, and was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford. He was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1877, was created a Q.C. in 1892, and elected a Bencher of his Inn in 1894. He represented the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield as a Liberal from 1885 to 1894, when he succeeded his father in the peerage. At that time he made an unsuccessful effort to remain a member of the House of Commons by refusing the writ of summons to the Upper House. Lord Coleridge is the son and the grandson of a judge, and a record has thus been created (in England though not in Scotland), of one family supplying the country with three judges in three succeeding generations. His grandfather, Sir John Taylor Coleridge, was forty-five years of age when he succeeded Mr Justice Taunton as a Judge of the King's Bench in 1835; his father, who was Lord Chief Justice for fourteen years, was fifty-three when he succeeded Sir William Bovill as Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in 1873. Lord Coleridge has therefore taken rather longer to reach the Bench than either his grandfather or his father. He is not without some experience of judicial work. He has twice acted as a Commissioner of Assize, and for several years past has been Chairman of the Devon Quarter Sessions.

Appointment of Hamilton Procurator-Fiscal.—The Lord Advocate has appointed Mr William Thomson, B.L., law agent, Airdrie, to be Procurator-Fiscal of the Sheriff Court of the Hamilton district of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, in succession to the late Mr Robert Wilson. Mr William Thomson is a partner of Forsyth & Thomson, solicitors, Airdrie. He is well known as an able lawyer and a careful and thorough adviser. He is a native of Airdrie, and has for upwards of twenty years been a keen and active worker in the Liberal cause. He is chairman of Airdrie School Board, and was recently made a Justice of the Peace of Lanarkshire.

Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire.—A commission as Sheriff-Clerk Depute, with charge of the Commissary Department, has been granted by the Sheriff-Clerk of Lanarkshire to Mr John Jarvie, chief clerk to the late Commissary Clerk, Mr Wright. Mr Jarvie has been identified with the work of the department for forty-two years, and, along with his late chief, was employed in the Commissary Clerk's office before it was incorporated in that of the Sheriff-Clerk.

At a special meeting of Wishaw Town Council on 7th October, a letter was read from Mr John Burgess, resigning the offices of Burgh Procurator-Fiscal, Prosecutor in the Dean of Guild Court, Prosecutor under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, and Prosecutor under the Public Health (Scotland) Act 1897. These several offices were filled up by the appointment of Mr Thos. Rae.

Hamilton Society of Solicitors.—A meeting of the members of this Society was held on the 15th inst. in the Procurator's Room, County Buildings, Hamilton, to consider a circular on the subject of bankruptcy law reform, with special reference to the terms of the Bill lately before Parliament, and which was accorded a first reading. The Dean (Mr William Stodart, Hamilton) presided over a large and representative meeting. In conformity with the recommendation contained in the circular, it was agreed to send two delegates to a conference of Scottish members of Parliament, representatives of the various Faculties of Law, and others, in favour of the principle of the Bill. The two delegates appointed were the Dean and Mr James Burns, Motherwell.

Ayr Faculty of Solicitors.—Mr Archibald Brakenridge, solicitor, Cumnock, has been unanimously elected Dean of Faculty for the current year.

Law Lectureships in Glasgow University.

The Court of the University of Glasgow on the 3rd inst. filled up the two vacancies in the Law Lectureships caused by the appointment of Mr Irvine as Professor of Law in Aberdeen and the death of Mr William Shaw.

For the lectureship in Civil Law the following were the candidates:—James Adamson, LL.B., 18 Dundas Street, Edinburgh; Douglas A. Bannatyne, LL.B., 145 West George Street, Glasgow; Hugh R. Buchanan, LL.B., 138 West Regent Street, Glasgow; A. D. Donald, B.L., 5 Pitt Street, Edinburgh; William Dunbar, LL.B., 18 Nelson Street, Edinburgh; J. R. Haldane, LL.B., 18 Nelson Street, Edinburgh; William Hutchison, LL.B., 208 West George Street, Glasgow; J. Dalrymple Johnston, LL.B., 48 West Regent Street, Glasgow; William G. Macalister, LL.B., 39 Ashton Terrace, Glasgow, W.; A. A. Mitchell, LL.B., 7 Huntly Gardens, Glasgow; Robert A. Moody, LL.B., Benvue, Bothwell; Roderick M. Nicol, LL.B., 47 Overdale Street, Langside; Alexander Taylor, LL.B., 1 Albyn Place, Edinburgh; George D. Valentine, LL.B., 13 Pitt Street, Edinburgh; James Waddell, LL.B., Municipal Buildings, Coatbridge.

The Court appointed Mr H. R. Buchanan. Mr Hugh Reid Buchanan is a graduate of Glasgow University in Arts and in Law. Among the distinctions he gained in Arts were the Edward Caird medal in the moral philosophy (honours) class, first-class honours in mental philosophy, and the George A. Clark Scholarship in that subject. While taking his law course Mr Buchanan served his apprenticeship to the firm of Messrs John Steuart & Gillies, Writers, Glasgow, and in the examination for the LL.B. degree he achieved distinction in civil law, Scots law, mercantile law, public international law, international private law, jurisprudence, and forensic medicine, and graduated with distinction. He also studied philosophy and law in Germany. As a George A. Clark scholar he delivered lectures to the Moral Philosophy classes in Glasgow University, and in 1904 was appointed interim lecturer in jurisprudence, while in that year he was also appointed an Examiner to the University for degrees in Arts and Law. Mr Buchanan is thirty years of age, and is a partner of the firm of Messrs D. & J. Hill, Writers, Glasgow.

For the lectureship in Mercantile Law the following were the candidates:—Richard Brown, 166 St Vincent Street, Glasgow; David Bruce, LL.B., 141 West George Street, Glasgow; William Brunton, LL.B., 48 West Regent Street, Glasgow; J. Roberton Christie, LL.B., 3 Gloucester Place, Edinburgh; A. D. Donald, B.L., 5 Pitt Street, Edinburgh; John Grant, B.L., 204 St Vincent Street, Glasgow; John Jubb, B.L., 124 St Vincent Street, Glasgow; Thomas G. Wright, LL.B., 150 St Vincent Street, Glasgow.

The Court appointed Mr T. G. Wright. Mr Thomas G. Wright is twenty-nine years of age, and is a graduate of Glasgow University in Arts and Law. During his law course he gained prizes in the classes of civil, constitutional, and Scots law, jurisprudence, forensic medicine, and conveyancing, and he graduated with distinction. He is a partner of the firm of Messrs Wright, Johnston & Mackenzie, and has dealt entirely with the mercantile side of their business since he became associated with them about four years ago.

Mr James Wilkie, solicitor, Kirriemuir, has assumed as partner Mr David Shiress Whitson, Writer to the Signet, who has assisted him in his business for the past nine years. The business will in future be carried on under the firm of Jas. Wilkie & Whitson, W.S.

Messrs Andrew Hendry & Sons, solicitors, British Linen Bank Buildings, 39 Murraygate, Dundee, have assumed Mr James Fenton, solicitor, as a partner of their firm.

Mr James J. Kelly, solicitor, Penicuik, has been appointed Treasurer and Collector of Rates for the burgh of Penicuik.

Mr John Roddick, writer and notary public, has been appointed joint agent of the Commercial Bank of Scotland (Limited), at Annan, along with his father, Mr William Roddick.

Mr John Bremner Davidson, East View, Dunfermline, has been admitted as a law agent by the Lords of Council and Session.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF LAW AGENTS IN SCOTLAND.

The annual meeting of this Society was held within the County Council Chambers, Inverness, on Friday, 27th September. There was a large attendance.

On the motion of Mr George D. Ballingall, W.S., Edinburgh, who presided at the commencement of the proceedings, seconded by Professor Richard Brown, Glasgow, Mr D. M. M. Milligan, advocate, Aberdeen, was unanimously elected President for the ensuing year. Mr Milligan, in taking the chair, assured the Society that he highly appreciated the honour they had conferred on him. He would enter upon the duties of President with an ardent desire and a firm resolution to discharge them to the best of his ability, succeeding, as he did, a gentleman who had discharged them with unvarying courtesy, great ability, and characteristic integrity and impartiality.

On the motion of Mr Robert Smith, Dundee, seconded by Mr William Cochran, Glasgow, Mr James W. Whitelaw, Dumfries, was unanimously re-elected Vice-President. For the vacancies in the Council the following were elected:—James Brown, Stirling; James Duff, S.S.C., Edinburgh; James Glen, Greenock; William Mackay, Inverness; Hugh Stewart, Elgin; and Robert S. Walker, Greenock. Dr J. W. Barty, Dunblane, was re-elected Secretary, and Mr F. B. Anderson, C.A., Edinburgh, was re-appointed Auditor.

Mr Milligan, in delivering the President's address, said the past history of the Society and the work it had accomplished formed a retrospect of which they might well feel proud, and which, he thought, justified their expecting even more support from the profession than had been accorded to them. They had to congratulate themselves on the passing of the Sheriff Court Bill. The subject had been under the consideration of the Society since 1886, and great though the debt of the profession was to Lord Balfour, Lord Advocate Shaw, and Sheriff Fyfe, he doubted if anyone had done more to bring about the much-needed reform than Mr Spens, Glasgow, one of their previous vice-presidents. In view of what the Society had done and of what remained to be done, he appealed to those who had not yet joined its ranks to do so, and enable it to do still better work in the future. The main object of the Society's existence was the unification of the profession, and that was a subject on which they must concentrate their forces. The Solicitors (Scotland) Bill ought to have the first place in their programme. Until such a Bill was passed they could never hope to see the many reforms that were admittedly called for, such as the reform and consolidation of their conveyancing statutes, carried into law. They were about 3500 enrolled law agents in Scotland, and there were 33 different legal societies, besides their own, containing about 2337 members, so that 1185 were members of no society at all. The interests of the profession, he believed, could best be furthered by united action, and in the matters of discipline it was of the highest importance that the profession should act through one central body. The sad cases of professional misconduct of the last few years, of trusts broken, of great names tarnished, and the shocks upon the public confidence which they had caused, would have done only little to modify men's adverse opinion about them as a body, or to make them trust in them more than formerly. It was just because they felt that they were bound to show publicly that they appreciated to the full the gravity of such cases, and their desire to do all in their power to prevent their recurrence, that they ought, as a profession, to take every means in their power to prevent the possibility of such sad failures. If the public could be assured that every solicitor was a member of a society directed in its principles and practice by a large representative council, whose position and standing were a guarantee of the highest standard of integrity, a larger measure of confidence would, he thought, be extended to the professsion than at present.

Dr Barty (Secretary) submitted the accounts of the Society, which showed that the free assets at the end of the year amounted to £334, 14s. The accounts were unanimously approved of.

The President said that they had every reason to congratulate themselves on the passing of the Sheriff Courts Act. The report of the Council referring to the passing of the Act was in the following terms:—

"The Council have to congratulate the Society on the passing into law of this Bill. They have to remind the Society that an extension of the jurisdiction of Sheriff Courts, improvements in the forms of process and procedure, and a consolidation of the many statutes affecting Sheriff Courts have been objects for which the Council have earnestly striven for many years. Mr Spens, of Glasgow, during his tenure of office as councillor, vice-president, and president, devoted much time and ability to advocating these reforms, and ultimately Lord Balfour of Burleigh appointed a Departmental Commission to inquire and report as to the following matters:—(1) The forms of writs and pleadings, and the rules of procedure in the civil Courts of the Sheriff; (2) the forms of writs and the rules of procedure in the criminal Courts of the Sheriff; (3) the procedure for review of and appeals from decrees, interlocutors, and orders in the civil Courts of the Sheriff, and sentences in the criminal Courts of the Sheriff; (4) the constitution of and rules of procedure in arbitrations either at common law or under the Lands Clauses Act and other statutes. The first chairman of the Commission was Lord Dunedin, and he was succeeded by Mr Scott Dickson, K.C., the then Lord Advocate. The Commission was entirely non-political, Mr Ure, M.P., and other gentlemen of Liberal politics being members. The Commission reported in October 1904, and although their recommendations did not include all the reforms which this Society advocated, the report was received with much acceptance. In consequence of the change of Government, delay took place in getting a Bill following on the report prepared and approved of. Three years ago Sheriff Fyfe, of Glasgow, whose experience of Sheriff Court procedure is unsurpassed, took the initiative in having a committee representative of the legal profession in Scotland appointed to frame a Bill. This Society was fully represented in this committee, and the draft Bill which was framed was generally approved of by the annual meeting of the Society held at Dumfries in the autumn of 1905. Thereafter the Bill was submitted to the present Lord Advocate, Mr Shaw, in the hope that it might form the basis of a Government Bill. His Lordship was good enough to take a personal interest in the subject, and the Bill, which is now an Act, was introduced into the House of Commons at the beginning of Session 1906, and was printed and circulated. Sheriff Fyfe's committee received from the Law Societies and many individual agents suggestions for the amendment of the Bill, which were fully considered by the committee, and many of these the Lord Advocate approved of and accepted. The Council are not prepared to affirm that the Bill is perfect and incapable of improvement. On the contrary, it is probable that many suggestions with regard to its provisions may still be made. This is only what must be anticipated in so long and complicated a Bill. But the Council are satisfied, notwithstanding any errors or omissions which may be pointed out, that the new Act will be received by the members of the Society with the utmost satisfaction. The members of this Society are deeply indebted to the Lord Advocate, and also to Lord Balfour of Burleigh, whose support of the Bill in the House of Lords was invaluable. The Council trust that it is satisfactory to his Lordship that the Commission which he himself nominated while Secretary for Scotland has now resulted in a very important Act being passed into law which gives effect to the main recommendations of the Commission. It is almost unnecessary to add that the whole profession in Scotland are under a very deep debt of gratitude to Sheriff Fyfe for his able and prolonged labours in furthering the promotion of the Bill."

Mr Stewart, Elgin, called attention to the great grievance that existed in Scotland in consequence of the paucity of sheriff-officers, and suggested that the Society should seek to get an Act passed to give powers to solicitors to serve charges of payment and to give powers to licensed auctioneers to carry out poindings. It was unanimously agreed to remit the matter back to the Council.

The President stated that the Royal Commission on Registration of Titles had not as yet made any arrangement for holding meetings for the hearing of evidence, but the witnesses nominated by the Society had prepared their evidence and were ready to give it at any time.

Mr Glen, Greenock, moved that the Society approve of the steps already taken by the Council in regard to the whole question of the unification of the profession and the cognate subjects referred to in the Report, and that it be remitted to the Council to take such steps in the matter as they think proper to further the objects in view, and to report. Mr Glen's motion, seconded by Mr Brown, was unanimously adopted.

A paper by Mr R. W. Renton, Procurator-Fiscal of Mid-Lothian, dealing with the Criminal Procedure Bill, was read. It was unanimously agreed to approve generally of the Bill, and to remit it to the Council for further consideration.

Votes of thanks were given to the President for his conduct in the chair, and also to the Dean and Faculty of Solicitors of Inverness-shire for the most hospitable welcome accorded to members.

The Late Alexander Innes Shand, Esq., Advocate.—By the death of Mr Alexander Innes Shand, which took place at Edenbridge, Kent, on 20th September, the Faculty of Advocates has lost a distinguished member. Mr Shand, who was the youngest son of Mr William Shand of Arnhall, was admitted to the Faculty in November 1864. Before his call he had served his time in a W.S. office, with a view to entering that branch of the legal profession, and had afterwards spent a dozen years in sport and Continental travel. After putting on his gown he only spent about a year in the Parliament House. His practice did not extend beyond a few formal motions and the like, and the life was not congenial. "I might have held out longer," he writes, "but for the sense of living under the microscope, and being constrained to be hypocritical in spite of yourself. Every one knew and talked about what everybody else did. If you put the foot in a stirrup it was a professional scandal; in common prudence you had to sneak out of the stable-yard and head for the beautiful country by back streets." So Shand went to London, and began his long and successful career of letters. As a young man he wrote for the "Saturday Review," the "Pall Mall Gazette," and "Blackwood"; to the last he was for many years a regular contributor. His literary output is remarkable not only for its amount and its quality, but for its extraordinary variety. Besides magazine articles, he produced some five-and-twenty printed volumes. These include many books on sport, among others the volume on "Shooting" in the Haddon Hall Library, and the beautiful volume "Mountain, Stream, and Covert," published in 1897; several biographies, the most notable being that of General Sir Edward Hamley; three three-volume novels, and numerous volumes of travel-pictures and personal reminiscences. His last book, "Soldiers of Fortune in Camp and Court," was issued by Messrs Archibald Constable & Co. only a few days before his death. Perhaps the book by which he will be best remembered is "Days of the Past" (1905), in which he has preserved a vivid picture of Edinburgh in the sixties, the Edinburgh of Lord Neaves and Dean Ramsay, Hill Burton and John Blackwood, Candlish and Cunningham and Guthrie. He was a notable contributor to that honourable tradition of letters which still endures in the Parliament House.

The Late David Duncan, Esq., Advocate.—A well-known figure in the legal circles of Edinburgh has been removed by the death, which took place on the 4th inst., of Mr David Duncan, senior partner of Messrs Maconochie, Duncan & Hare, W.S., 10 Hill Street. Mr Duncan was seventy-eight years of age. He qualified as an advocate after serving in the office of Mr Thomas Ranken, S.S.C., and subsequently in that of Messrs Menzies & Maconochie. He joined the Scottish Bar in 1855; but two years later became associated with the late Mr R. B. Maconochie in the firm of Maconochie, Duncan & Hare. He was a prizeman in the law classes, and assisted in editing one of the editions of Menzies' "Conveyancing." From 1883 he acted as Clerk of Lieutenancy for Midlothian.

The Late H. H. Inglis, Esq., W.S.—The death took place on the 6th inst. of Mr Harry Herbert Inglis, sole partner of the firm of Inglis & Allan, W.S. Mr Inglis was the younger surviving son of Lord President Inglis. He took little part in public life, but in his own circle of acquaintance he was recognised as an able and shrewd man of business. Born in Edinburgh some sixty years ago, Mr H. H. Inglis attended the law classes at Edinburgh University, and was admitted a member of the Society of Writers to Her Majesty's Signet in 1873. He was clerk to the Ministers' Widows' Fund of the Church of Scotland, in which office he succeeded his uncle, and at one time his partner, Mr Harry Maxwell Inglis, and between them the uncle and nephew must have held the appointment for about eighty years. Mr Inglis had been ailing for some time, being troubled with a heart affection, but he was able to attend to his business to within a few days of his death.

The Late J. Norval Murray, Esq., Town Clerk of Irvine.—On the 6th inst. Mr John Norval Murray, town clerk of Irvine, died at his residence, "Bonita," after a lengthened illness. After spending some years in the office of Messrs Morton, Neilson & Smart, W.S., Edinburgh, Mr Murray went to Irvine. There he was for many years deputy to his uncle, Mr James Dickie, the late town clerk. On his death, less than two years ago, Mr Murray was appointed to the vacancy, but owing to ill-health was only able to personally conduct the duties for a short time, and the week before his death the Town Council agreed to give him a further leave of absence for six months. Mr Murray was a partner in the firm of Murray, Gillies & Wilson, and amongst the positions he filled were Procurator-Fiscal in the Justice of Peace Court, secretary to the Harbour Trust, Irvine Savings Bank, the local branch of the Lifeboat Institution, Irvine Golf Club and Burns Club.

The Late Nenion Elliot, Esq., S.S.C.—The death took place at his residence in Edinburgh on the 7th September of Mr Nenion Elliot, S.S.C., at the age of 73. From 1878 to June 1905 he held the office of Clerk and Extractor to the Court of Teinds. A portrait and biographical sketch of Mr Elliot appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. XIII. p. 41.

The Late Robert Wilson, Esq., Procurator-Fiscal, Hamilton.—Mr Robert Wilson, Procurator-Fiscal, Hamilton Sheriff Court, died at his residence, Auchincairn, Hamilton, on 20th September. A native of Lanark, he began his career in the Sheriff-Clerk's office there, and afterwards held the appointment of Sheriff-Clerk Depute in Hamilton, and also in Glasgow. In 1889, on the death of Mr J. A. Dykes, P.F., Hamilton, Mr Wilson was appointed to the vacancy.

The Late Alexander Cowan, Esq., Solicitor, Annan.—Much regret was felt in Dumfriesshire on the announcement of the death on 21st September of Mr Alexander Cowan, partner of the firm of Murray, Little & Cowan, solicitors, Annan. Mr Cowan, who was a native of Maxwelltown, was admitted a solicitor in 1899. He was held in high esteem by his professional brethren and by the public.

The Late P. F. W. Edington, Esq., Writer, Glasgow.—Mr P. F. W. Edington, writer, Glasgow, died there on the 2nd September after an illness of some weeks' duration. He was admitted a solicitor in 1898. He was an enthusiastic Volunteer, took a keen interest in rifle shooting, and was frequently a competitor at the National Rifle Association Meetings at Bisley.

The Late William Wright, Esq., Sheriff-Clerk Depute of Lanarkshire.—The death took place on 28th August of Mr Wright, Sheriff-Clerk Depute of Lanarkshire. Mr Wright, who had been in failing health for some time, was over seventy years of age. He had more than forty years' experience in the work of the Commissary and Sheriff-Clerk offices, and was recognised as an able official well versed in the work of his department.

The Late Donald Fisher, Esq., Writer, Glasgow.—Mr Donald Fisher died in Glasgow on 31st August at the advanced age of eighty-five. A native of Inveraray, he went at the age of eighteen to Greenock, and after some years of legal training there entered the office of the late Mr Logie. In that office he very soon became a partner, the firm name being Logie & Fisher. He was a member of several public bodies in Glasgow, and was well known as an active supporter of the United Free Church. He continued to take a keen interest in the affairs of his native burgh, and last year its Town Council conferred on him the honour of the freedom of the burgh.

The Late Mr James Smith.—Among the habitués of the Parliament House who have passed away since the summer vacation began, none will be more missed than Mr James Smith, the well-known reporter in the Court for the "Dundee Advertiser." He had not been in his usual vigour since an illness about eighteen months ago, but his health had improved and his death was somewhat sudden. Mr James Smith was the oldest press reporter, with perhaps one exception, among those now in the Court of Session. He was a native of Montrose, and at an early age became connected with the "Dundee Advertiser." Later on he obtained a situation on the "Bombay Gazette," and it was in the Indian Courts of Justice that he obtained his first insight into the difficulties and responsibilities of law reporting. At the expiry of his three years' engagement he returned to this country, visiting on the way Egypt and Palestine. For a number of years he was shorthand writer in the office of Messrs Murray, Beith & Murray, W.S., and confidential clerk to Mr Donald Beith. About the year 1880 Mr Smith became once more attached to the "Dundee Advertiser," this time as the Court of Session reporter for the paper. That position fitted well in with the work in the Court with which he became so intimately identified. Agents who had known him in Messrs Murray, Beith & Murray's readily employed him to take advisings, evidence on commissions in arbitrations and jury trials, and the discussions in important actions in Court, and the extent to which he was thus employed for a long period of years was a criterion of the care and accuracy with which he performed his work. His business tact and easy manner readily commended him to agents, and when business cares were set aside his company was appreciated on account of his sociability and geniality, and his fund of anecdote and humour. Few men were better known in Edinburgh than Mr Smith, for not only in the Court and in his general work as a pressman was he prominent, but as a Freemason and as the official reporter for Grand Lodge, he was known for many years by members of the craft in all ranks of society.

Guardians, but did not receive an appointment for a period of time, nor were paid by salary, were not officers of the Board in the sense of the above section.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan-Williams, Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—21*st June* 1907.

In re an Arbitration between James Nelson & Sons Ltd. and Nelson Line (Liverpool) Ltd.

Ship — Charter-party. — A charter-party proceeded on the narrative that the owners were to supply a two-weekly service from the River Plate to Liverpool, and provided "seven weather working days (Sundays and holidays excepted) to be allowed by owners to charterers for loading. . . . For each clear day saved in loading the charterers shall be paid or allowed by the owners the sum of £20." Held that there did not require to be fourteen days between the commencement of the lay-days for loading one vessel and the commencement of the lay-days for loading the next vessel; that where Sundays or holidays were utilised for loading, these days were not excepted in reckoning the lay-days; and that where one or more clear days were saved by completing the loading on a Saturday, the following Sunday was not to be reckoned as one of the days saved, although the ship was thereby enabled to save that day in sailing.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan-Williams, Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—25*th June* 1907.

In re Midland Carriage and Wagon Co.

Company—Reduction of Capital—Where a company had been formed under the Act 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 110, and subsequently registered under the Companies Act 1862, the Court, on the petition of the company, the company being at the time in a flourishing condition, made an order confirming the reduction of capital as regards a liability on shares which could only be called up in the event of and for the purpose of winding up, and cancelled certain preference shares which had been redeemed.—Chan. Div. (Warrington, J.).—2*nd July* 1907.

Trade Mark — Registration — Trade Marks Act 1905 (5 Edw. VII. cap. 15), sects. 9, 11.—In an application for registration of the word "motricine" as a trade mark for a petrol spirit used for motor cars, the word "motorine" being already on the register as a trade mark for a lubricating oil used for motor cars, held that, the applicants having failed to prove that the word "motricine" was not calculated to deceive, the application should be refused. Held also that the word "motorine," not being a word having "direct reference to the character or quality of the goods" so denominated, was not bad as a trade mark and ought not to be excluded from the register.—Chan. Div. (Warrington, J.).—5*th July* 1907.

Oceanic Steamship Co. v. Faber.

Insurance—Marine.—Decision of Walton, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 38), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Fletcher Moulton and Buckley, L.JJ.).—5th July 1907.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

Employers' Liability to their Servants at Common Law and Under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 and the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906. By C. Y. C. Dawbarn, M.A., Barrister-at-Law, Inner Temple and Northern Circuit. Third Edition. With Notes on the Canadian Law by A. C. Forster Boulton, M.P., of the Inner Temple, South-Eastern Circuit, and Osgoode Hall, Toronto, Barrister-at-Law. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd. Price 21*s.*

Mr Dawbarn's "Employers' Liability" has grown from the most modest dimensions to be a volume of imposing dignity. The present edition contains a noteworthy feature in the Canadian Notes by Mr Forster Boulton; and although these may not be of great value in Scotland, it is just possible they might on occasion help to enlighten some mysterious problem.

The most important part of the work is the treatment of the new Workmen's Compensation Act. Mr Dawbarn collates the clauses under various heads, shewing what is necessary to establish a right to compensation, what defences are open to the respondent, on whom he can lay the whole or part of the burden, how the compensation is assessed, etc. His method is open to the objection that it involves much reprinting of sections as they may bear upon several heads, and the bulk of the volume is largely due to this and to the two hundred pages taken up with rules, forms and statutes. But the arrangement is certainly as useful as it is novel; and it is calculated to save much wandering to and fro throughout the Statute in an uncertain dread of missing some provision which has a bearing on the matter in hand.

For the rest, Mr Dawbarn does not comment with much amplitude on the sections; his citation of authority is somewhat meagre, and does not always shew equal care in the matter of accuracy. The case of Haworth v. Andrew Knowles & Sons (Limited) Accident Society (19 T.L.R. 658), for example, did not, as Mr Dawbarn has it, interpret the third section of the 1897 Act, but turned solely on the construction of the rules of the society. But the book is one of the most helpful which the Act has yet brought forth, and will secure an honoured place in the class of "literature" (if one may use that word in such a connection) to which it belongs.

A Digest of Leading Cases on the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, with an Appendix containing the Regulations of 1897, 1884, 1880, and 1863; Excerpt from the Report of Trinity House Committee in 1901, and Notes. By David Wright Smith, M.A., B.L., Solicitor, Glasgow, Member of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow. Edinburgh: T. & A. Constable, 1907. Price 5*s.*

This volume, while written primarily for shipowners and shipmasters, deserves a hearty welcome also from members of the legal profession interested in shipping law. The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, both those at present in force, and the earlier codes so far as these remain of practical utility, are printed in full in the Appendix. The bulk of the volume is devoted to a digest of the series of leading cases in which these regulations have been discussed and interpreted. A large number of cases are dealt with. The digesting has been very well done. The salient facts on which the decisions turned are sufficiently narrated, the judgment of the Court is concisely and clearly stated, and frequently the important paragraphs from the judges' opinions are quoted in full. The cases include many from the Supreme Court of the United States.

Practice of the Scottish Poor Law. By George A. Mackay, of the Local Government Board for Scotland. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 5*s.*

While other works, such as that of Mr Graham on Poor Law, deal with the more purely legal aspect of Poor Law administration, Mr Mackay's book will be found to contain a review of our system of Poor Law administration and practice which will form a very useful adjunct to the more elaborate treatise. After a short historical introduction Mr Mackay explains the constitution and functions of Parish Councils, the duties of their officials, including the inspectors of poor, collectors, clerks, auditors and medical officers. He deals with their revenue and powers of assessment, and with the functions of the Local Government Board. The Scottish Lunacy system, the Administration of Poor Relief and of Poorhouses, are all discussed, and there is a chapter on possible administrative reforms. The book bears on every page indications of a very thorough practical knowledge of the subject, and it is one which will be widely used by members and officials of Parish Councils and others employed in the administration of the Poor Law.

Encyclopædia of the Laws of England, with Forms and Precedents by the most eminent Legal Authorities. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Vol. V.: Dominican Republic to Factories and Workshops. Vol. VI.: Factors' Act to Hypotheque. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907.

What has been said in previous numbers as to the excellence of the earlier volumes of the second edition of this encyclopædia applies equally to the volumes now before us. The editors have been fortunate in securing in so many instances the original writer of the article to bring his contribution down to date, and where the work of revision is done by a new writer it is placed in most competent hands. The article by Mr Ruegg, K.C., on Employers' Liability contains a very carefully considered commentary on the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906; and another article which deserves special notice for its exhaustive, clear and well-arranged treatment of its subject is that on Excise by Sir Francis Gore, Solicitor to the Inland Revenue, and Mr G. H. Dennis, Assistant Solicitor of Customs. The editors and publishers are to be congratulated on the rapidity with which the volumes are being issued.

An Epitome of Constitutional Law and Cases. By W. H. Hastings Kelke, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd. Price 6*s.*

A Students' Manual of Constitutional Law may be a digest of one of the standard works on the subject, prepared for examination purposes, or it may have a place in a library as a book to be read for the pleasure of reading it. The present volume escapes falling under the first of these descriptions, but it hardly attains to the latter. It is offered as an introduction to Dicey and Anson. But it is up to date—the recent Norfolk Peerage case even being cited in the text—and it contains an interesting chapter on Colonial constitutions. The subject-matter of the manual is of course a very extensive one, and it is difficult in the circumstances to cover the ground and yet make a readable book; but it was surely unnecessary to mar the work by a constant omission of the definite article, not to speak of the use of initials when the words for which they stand (such as Privy Council) would occupy little space. The book, however, will be found worthy of a place on the shelves of a student of constitutional law.

A Practical Guide to the Death Duties and to the Preparation of Death-Duty Accounts. By Charles Beatty, Solicitor, of the Estate Duty Office, Somerset House. London: Effingham Wilson. Price 4*s.*

This is the latest addition to Mr Wilson's well-known series of legal "handy books." It deals with the most inhuman topic in the realm of legal literature, a subject properly abused by all right-thinking citizens. One therefore fears lest he should confuse the subject with the writer, and be wanting in justice to the author of a treatise on the death duties. Mr Beatty writes on his subject as though he loved it. He even ventures—so beautifully simple does the whole matter appear to his mind—to tabulate the Finance Acts in less than four pages. His method—a general outline of the system, followed by chapters on Estate Duty, Settlement Estate Duty, Legacy Duty, and Succession Duty—is suited to a presentation of the subject in its most instructive form, and the author has achieved his object in this respect. A citation of the leading cases on the subject assists to make the book admirably suitable for the purpose it is intended to serve.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, with Notes, and Rules and Regulations under the Act. By W. Addington Willis, LL.B., of the Inner Temple and the North-Eastern Circuit, Barrister-at-Law; being the Tenth Edition of Willis's Workmen's Compensation Acts. Butterworth & Co.; Shaw & Sons, 1907. Price 5*s. net.*

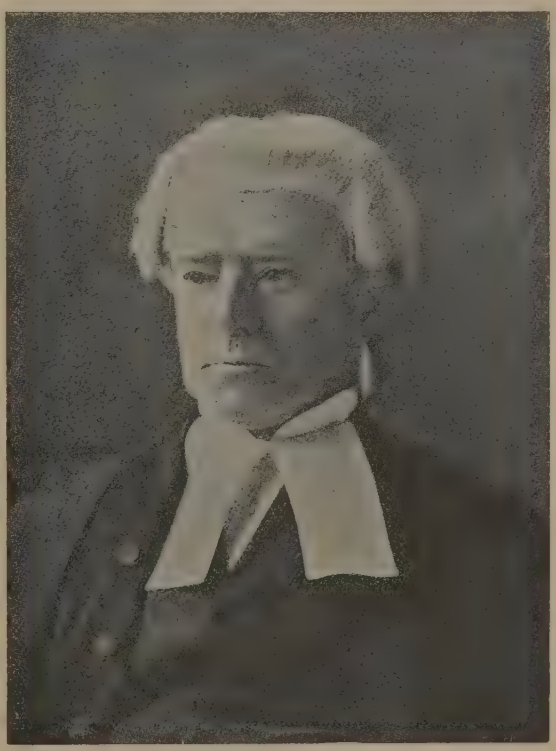
The appearance of another edition of this textbook—the ninth edition was published last February—shews that it has early established itself as one of the very best of the minor treatises on the subject. The principal difference is that the present volume contains in an appendix the Workmen's Compensation Rules, a number of statutory Orders and Regulations applicable to England which have been made by the Secretary of State and the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, and a Treasury order regulating fees in County Courts. But apart from that there have been added to the notes a number of recent decisions under the old Acts, such as Williams v. Vauxhall Coal Co., Nicholson v. Piper, and Darlington v. Roscoe & Sons, most of which are of the first importance. A book such as this does not profess to contain all that is to be said on the Act with which it deals, or even to deal fully with the cases under the previous Acts, which are still of value. But to the ordinary practitioner, who wishes a concise and clear statement with a reference to the principal cases, it is invaluable. For such purposes the scope and method of the work are admirable. The new edition maintains a well-deserved reputation, and it will be found, particularly in England, a readily accessible and trustworthy guide to the statute.

The Late LORD BRAMPTON.

This eminent English judge, "most reverend for his stretched-out life," died on 6th October in the ninety-first year of his age. Certainly the dates in his busy career carry us far back into the nineteenth century. It is thirty-one years since he ascended the Bench (1876); nine years since he retired from it (1898). Sixty-four years have gone by since he was called to the Bar (by the Society of the Middle Temple); and forty-nine since he "took silk." For more than half a century his name has been better known to the general public in England than that of any other lawyer. His personality—his idiosyncrasies and even his limitations—seized hold of the imagination of the man in the street in a way which one almost requires to be a Londoner, or at least an Englishman, to comprehend. Your cabman, your "coster," your railway porter, your racing man, your legion of daily travellers in suburban trains—all these had an interest in and an admiration for Sir Henry Hawkins which has not been accorded to judges more eminent and pleaders more able. His vigorous intellect and forceful character appealed to them—and these qualities were shown in many a cause célèbre in which they took the passionate interest of sensation-lovers.



Lord Brampton was not a great judge. He was not, for example, a Sir George Jessel. Nevertheless he had many judicial qualities which gained him the admiration of practitioners. He was a strong man in chambers, and always a strong man in throwing off the fetters of technicality when these seemed to be at variance with sound sense or to hamper justice. On facts he was quick and effective. As a judge in criminal cases Sir Henry had a high reputation. His knowledge of criminal law was exceptionally thorough; and while by many his punishments were considered too severe, by those best qualified to judge they were deemed to be only discriminating and just.

Lord Brampton was the son of a lawyer, Mr John Hawkins, solicitor at Hitchin in Hertfordshire. He was born in that town on 14th September 1817, and he was educated at Bedford School. For some years he practised "the now extinct science" of special pleading below the Bar. Called in 1843, he joined the Home Circuit. At first his success was slow and meagre; and there is no more interesting passage in his "Reminiscences" than that in which he describes the anxious waiting of these early days, his hope and his despair; and the joy with which he received his first fee. But though slowly, his success came surely, and he attained to a very large junior practice. It was in 1858 that he was promoted to be a Q.C., and his professional success as a silk was no less remarkable. He was raised to the Bench in November 1876, being first appointed to the Queen's Bench Division, and subsequently transferred to the Exchequer Division. In 1898 Sir Henry Hawkins retired at the end of the Michaelmas sittings, after twenty-two years' service. On his retiring he was raised to the peerage under the title of Baron Brampton of Brampton, in the county of Huntingdon. Thereafter, for over two years he took part in the judicial work of the House of Lords; but he did not sit on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. On the only occasion on which he stood as a parliamentary candidate (in the Liberal interest, and for Barnstaple, in 1865) he was at the bottom of the poll!

Lord Brampton was twice married. There were no children of either marriage, and the peerage becomes extinct.

Lord Stormonth-Darling, who was absent from Court last week, was able to take his seat in the Second Division on Tuesday, and the sittings of the Extra Division commenced on that day. That Court was occupied on Tuesday and part of Wednesday in the hearing of a reclaiming note against a judgment of Lord Salvesen in the case in which certain lady graduates of the Scotch universities claim the right to exercise the Parliamentary franchise in the university constituencies. The case was taken to avizandum.

SCOTTISH LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.

His Majesty has been pleased, upon the recommendation of the Secretary for Scotland, to approve the appointment of Mr Andrew John Young, advocate, as Sheriff-Substitute of the Sheriffdom of Aberdeen, Kincardine and Banff, in place of Mr Duncan Robertson, deceased; and of Mr Edwin Adam, LL.B., advocate, as Principal Clerk of Session in Edinburgh, in place of Mr Charles Tennant Couper, who has resigned.

The appointment of Mr Young to be Sheriff-Substitute at Aberdeen has been received with great satisfaction in the Parliament House. Mr Young's position at the Bar and his long service as Counsel for the Inland Revenue well justify the preferment which, had it not been for the chances of politics, would have come to him long ago, and he is in every way well qualified as a lawyer to maintain the high standard which the administration of justice in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen has long enjoyed. A portrait and biographical notice of Mr Young will appear in our next issue.

Mr Edwin Adam has been the recipient of hearty congratulations from his many friends in the Parliament House and in a wider circle on his appointment to the important position of Principal Clerk of Session in the First Division. Mr Adam, who is a son of the late Mr Stephen Adam, wool merchant, and a member of a family well known in Edinburgh and Leith, was born in 1862. He was educated at the Edinburgh Academy and at the Universities of Edinburgh and Leipzic. After graduating as M.A. and LL.B., and serving for a time as Parliament House Clerk with the firm of Morton, Neilson & Smart, W.S. (now Morton, Smart, Macdonald & Prosser), he was in 1885 admitted to the Faculty of Advocates. In the next year he published a very useful collection of Acts of Sederunt, bringing down to date the older collections issued by Mr Alexander. He acted as a reporter for the "Scots Law Times" for the first nine years of its existence, and, since 1893, as the editor and reporter of the official reports of the High Court of Justiciary. There are five volumes of "Adam's Reports." It is interesting to note that both his immediate predecessors in the Principal Clerkship, Mr Couper and Mr Archibald Broun, were also in their day editors of the Justiciary Reports. On the formation of Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman's government in the end of 1905 Mr Edwin Adam was appointed by the Lord Advocate one of the Advocates-Depute. His work in the Crown Office was characterised by care, ability and sound judgment. But Mr Adam is more widely known as a politician. A strong and convinced Liberal, he has made a careful study of politics, and has done much service to his party both as a speaker and a writer. He contested the Central Division of Glasgow in 1895 and the West Division of Edinburgh in 1900. He is the author of a volume entitled "Land Values and Taxation," and his evidence on the subject of the Taxation of Feu-Duties contained a very luminous exposition of the views of those who think with him on that controversy.

The Lord Advocate has filled several legal vacancies which have followed upon the appointment of Mr A. J. Young to be Sheriff-Substitute at Aberdeen, and Mr Edwin Adam to be Principal Clerk of Session. Mr William Thomson, M.A., LL.B., advocate, has been appointed to the office of Advocate-Depute vacated by the promotion of Mr Edwin Adam. Mr A. A. Grainger Stewart, M.A., LL.B., has been appointed Extra Advocate-Depute on the Western Circuit at Glasgow, his appointment to take place at the beginning of next month. Mr W. Lyon Mackenzie has been appointed to the office of Advocate-Depute in the Sheriff Court. Mr William Findlay, M.A., LL.B., has been appointed Counsel for the Crown as ultimus hæres. That position has been vacated by Mr Grainger Stewart. No announcement has yet been made as to the vacancy in the office of Standing Counsel for the Inland Revenue caused by the appointment of Mr A. J. Young to be Sheriff-Substitute at Aberdeen.

PRESENTATION TO SHERIFF SIR DAVID BRAND.

Sir David Brand, Sheriff of Ayrshire, was on Monday entertained by the Ayr Faculty of Solicitors at a cake and wine banquet in the Station Hotel, Ayr, and presented with a congratulatory address, enclosed in a silver casket, on the occasion of his having had the honour of knighthood conferred on him. Mr Archibald Brakenridge, solicitor, Cumnock, Dean of Faculty, presided.

The address, which was presented by Mr

Brakenridge, stated that Sheriff Brand throughout his long and honourable connection with the county of Ayr as Sheriff, an office he had filled for more than twenty years, had earned and enjoyed the confidence of the public, and during that time good feeling and cordial co-operation had distinguished in a prominent degree his relationship to the members of the Faculty. The members acknowledged with gratitude the kindly and beneficial interest he had uniformly manifested in all matters affecting their interests as a body of practising solicitors.

The Dean, in presenting the address, said their guest, after being educated at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Heidelberg, had been admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1864, and by his acknowledged abilities and perseverance attained an extensive practice at the Bar. In the year 1880 he was appointed an Advocate-Depute, a position which he held till 1885, when he was appointed Sheriff-Depute of the important county of Ayr. In 1886 he was appointed the first Chairman of the Crofters Commission. He was also appointed Chairman of the Royal Commission on Highlands and Islands, 1890, and a Commissioner under the Congested Districts (Scotland) Act 1897. Sir David Brand early earned, and after an experience of twenty-two years he still retained, the affection and esteem, the confidence and gratitude, of all the members of Faculty, which he secured by his professional learning and ability, by the soundness of his judgments, and by the kindly interest and attention which he had uniformly given to all matters brought under his notice affecting the status and interests of the local Bar.

Sir David Brand, in replying, said the address filled his mind with the most stirring emotions and feelings of gratitude. The numerous and pressing judicial and administrative duties which had been placed upon him had been fulfilled not only with the greatest friendship between the Sheriff-Substitutes and the Sheriff, but also between the Bar and the Bench. In the county of Ayr, and in the relations he had mentioned, this friendliness had prevailed and increased to the utmost, and each party had done their best to carry out their duties to the end of reaching harmonious feeling and impartial justice. No county in Scotland had done more to enrich the Scottish Bar from the days of Lord-President Blair and Lord Alloway onwards, and he doubted not that in the future the sons of the law would flourish and increase in number. So long as he could work at their side so long would he endeavour to reach the point at which they all aimed, and at least he would try to do his cripple best. If there was one city in the empire which profited more than another by the town of Ayr, it was the city of Glasgow. It had appropriated and reaped advantage from the talent of Ayrshire. There was hardly a department of human effort in Glasgow which did not owe much of its strength and force to the county of Ayr. Concluding, the Sheriff said long might the county of Ayr flourish and grow rich, long might the town of Ayr prosper, with its life renewed by the rebuilding of the Auld Brig, and long might the Faculty of Solicitors prosecute the learned profession to which they belonged.

THE COUNTY OF EAST LOTHIAN.*

To the traveller by rail or motor car intent on getting from Berwick to Edinburgh as quickly as possible, East Lothian appears to be merely one vast market garden. It is really one of the most interesting counties in Scotland, and though its only lake, beautiful as it is, is artificial, the charms of sea and moor and woodland, of the winding Tyne and of the glens and ravines on its eastern borders, give East Lothian a distinction unsuspected by those who know it only as the home of high farming. In nearly every parish old churches and ruined castles teach history. It is a land of ancient prosperity and of valiant deeds.

Mr Green tells us that his book is neither a history nor a guide-book. It has, however, a quality which many histories and most guide-books lack: it is eminently readable. If in the matter of history it is professedly incomplete, it is accurate, and though no special research has been undertaken, the recognised authorities have been consulted and summarised with lucidity and intelligence. It may not be a guide-book, but no traveller in East Lothian and no East Lothian man ought to be without it. Few Scotsmen indeed will fail to learn something from its pages. The Glasgow man, for instance, will learn that his patron saint came from the near neighbourhood of the home of Mr Balfour. St Mungo's mother was the daughter of the king who gave his name to Lothian, while the Princess Thenew's memory is perpetuated in the odd name of the central station of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, itself derived from the adjacent church. St Oswald, whose daughter founded the vanished church of "St Ann's upon Dunbar sands," has given his name to a ravine near which both the battles of Dunbar were fought. St Baldred of course is East Lothian's own peculiar saint, and from his days down to those of Dr Brown of Haddington, who knew thirteen languages, the county has a long succession of divines and prophets. John Knox, Principal Robertson, one of the greatest of historians, Robert Blair and John Hume, show how varied in their tastes and achievements the ecclesiastics of East Lothian were.

The carelessness of our ancestors and the depredations of English invaders (more especially Cromwell) have deprived East Lothian of many of its historic monuments—most notable, perhaps, was the vanished palace of the great house of Seton; but though there is no Melrose and no Dryburgh, as Roxburghshire and Berwickshire can boast, it has at least two ancient churches which have suffered at the hands neither of the invader nor of the restorer—Whitekirk and Dunglass; while Tantallon and a large number of smaller seats of strength shew how well and truly our forbears builded. This excellent book is made most attractive by plans, portraits, copies of old engravings and reproductions of modern photographs. R. F. B.

Mr Henry J. Ferguson, S.S.C., late of Edinburgh, has been admitted at Wellington by Sir Robert Stout, Chief Justice, as a Solicitor of the Supreme Court of New Zealand.

The firm of Maconochie, Duncan & Hare, W.S., in which the late Mr David Duncan, advocate, was a partner along with Mr J. H. Sang and Mr A. W. Hog, and the firm of Adam & Sang, W.S., in which Mr Sang was sole partner, will now be carried on by Mr Sang and Mr Hog under the firm name of Maconochie, Duncan & Hare, W.S., at 10 Hill Street, Edinburgh.

Faculty of Advocates.—A meeting of the Faculty of Advocates was held on Wednesday — the Dean of Faculty (Mr William Campbell, K.C.) in the chair. The Chrystie bursary of £18 a year, tenable for four years at the University of Edinburgh, which is in the gift of the Faculty, was awarded to Mr Alfred Ernest Warr, The Manse, Roseneath. A committee was appointed to consider and report on the Criminal Procedure and Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Bill.

Law Agents' Examinations.—The quarterly examination in law was held in Edinburgh last week. Fifty-one candidates presented themselves for examination. Forty-six of these were examined in all the subjects, and nineteen passed. Five graduates in law (LL.B. or B.L.) were examined in Court Procedure, and three passed. The following is the official list of the gentlemen who passed the examination in law:—Thomas James Addly, George Cairns, Nathaniel Henry Cosh, Arthur Joseph Cubberley, William Drysdale, George Dundas, William Fyfe, James Gill, William Grant, John Wishart Henderson, M.A., B.L., Robert Cumming Thomson Mair, M.A., B.L., James Campbell Morrice, William David Reid, Thomas Park Riddell, M.A., LL.B., William Melvin Ross, George James Sheriff, Herbert Shield, John Mollison Spink, Robert Forrest Steel, John Archibald Vicars, James Wells.

INTRODUCTORY LECTURE BY PROFESSOR IRVINE AT ABERDEEN.

Professor Irvine, the successor to Sheriff Kennedy in the occupancy of the Chair of Law at the University of Aberdeen, gave his inaugural lecture in the Portrait Gallery, Marischal College, on Monday. Principal Lang presided, and a large number of gentlemen connected with the legal profession were present.

Principal Lang, in introducing Professor Irvine, said it was only like yesterday—though it was in 1901—since he introduced Neill John Downie Kennedy to the Faculty and Chair of Law. They had parted with him with deep regret, congratulating him on his appointment to the Sheriffship of Renfrew and Bute, but feeling that a very able teacher, wise administrator, and genial friend, had been taken from them. Men went and came, but the law went on for ever. He now had the happiness of welcoming one who in all respects was a fit and proper successor to Sheriff Kennedy, and he might add to the venerable friend who still was spared to them, and long might he be spared—Emeritus Professor Dove Wilson. Of Professor Irvine in his presence it would be unbecoming of him (Principal Lang), as it was superfluous for him, to say much. Professor Irvine would protest—"Let me be tried by the future, let my students, my University, the legal profession, and the community of Aberdeen judge me by their experience of me in the chair, at the Senatus, and in the city—in the meantime no certificates." And yet, without overstepping the limits of good taste, it remained for him on behalf of the University Court and Senatus to express the assurance that Mr Irvine would amply justify the expectations that were based on his University record, on his professional practice at the Bar, on his work as law reporter, compiler, and author, and on the services that he had rendered as lecturer on civil law in the University of Glasgow. Professor Irvine did not speak to them that day as a complete stranger in a strange land. The lamented death of Sheriff Robertson had given him a foretaste of Aberdeen, at all events, of those aspects of it, not the most graceful or delightful, which were contemplated by the judge who presided in the Sheriff Court. No doubt what Professor Irvine had seen and heard would be useful to him in the work which he now undertook. He now passed into a serener atmosphere; "strive and thrive" was their word to him. He asked Professor Irvine to begin the labours of that honourable position to which he had been called.

Professor Irvine, who was cordially received, said:—It is with a deep sense of responsibility that I take up the work of Professor of Law in this University. The Chair of Law in Aberdeen has a long and illustrious history, and—not to go further back than my two immediate predecessors in the occupancy of the chair—I am well aware that it is no easy task to prove a worthy successor to men of the distinction of Dr Dove Wilson and Sheriff Kennedy. Dr Dove Wilson was called to the chair after a long experience in judicial work. He had also contributed to the literature of the law of Scotland a treatise which all Scots lawyers know from their professional experience to be one of the most practically useful Scottish law books published during the last century. During his tenure of the chair his researches in the historical development of our law have made his name familiar to many far beyond the limits of Scotland. No less conspicuous than his attainments as a scholar and a lawyer has been his untiring zeal in the advancement of every good cause—educational and professional, civic and public. Mr Kennedy came to this chair fresh from the dust and tumult of the forensic arena. He brought with him a wide experience in the practice of law, a rich and varied learning, lightly borne, a happy faculty of picturesque speech and winsome humour. These gifts he used freely in the service of the University. His appointment to the Sheriffship of Renfrew and Bute—an appointment ratified with singularly unanimous approval by the legal profession in Scotland—meant a great loss to this University. Our good wishes go forth to him in his new office, and we look forward with confidence to his having, in the judicial sphere, a long career of useful public service. To their successors in this chair these two distinguished men have handed down a standard of reputation and achievement inspiring but not easy to emulate.

It is usual, I believe, on an occasion of this sort for the neophyte professor to select a topic with a designation more or less sonorous, and connected more or less remotely with the subject of the chair. I prefer—for I think it may be more useful—to put aside more ambitious topics, and to say something of the special work of this chair and of the relation of that work to the University and to the legal profession in Scotland. A notable feature—perhaps the most notable feature—of this chair is that it includes both Roman law and Scots law. On its Roman law side, the work of the chair forms part of the curriculum both in the Faculty of Arts and in the Faculty of Law, for in the Scottish universities Roman law is a qualifying course for a degree in arts as well as for the degrees in law. This double aspect—this twofold function—of Roman law in the scheme of university studies is highly significant. It means that the study of Roman law is recognised not merely as forming part of a strictly professional training, but also as forming part of a liberal education, that is, as furnishing in itself an intellectual and moral discipline. The value of Roman law as a purely educative subject has been fully recognised in the universities of Western Europe from the time of the Renaissance—that great intellectual movement to which most of our older universities owe their existence. Its value for this purpose is to-day accepted with almost equal fulness by the more modern universities both in England and in the United States. For the same reason, too, the Civil Service Commissioners—a severely practical body—select it as one of the subjects wherewith to test the education equipment of candidates for the Indian Civil Service and the more responsible positions in the home service. Further, Roman law has an intimate connection with most of the standard departments of the Arts curriculum. Thus, as regards classics—without a knowledge of Roman law, the genius of Rome and much of her literature can be understood only imperfectly. After all, Rome's great gift to the world was not her literature but her law. As regards history and economics, the law of Rome has played so large a part in making modern Europe and in moulding the fundamental institutions of Western civilisation that some knowledge of it is necessary to every serious student of political and economic development. The fact that it has filled so large a space in human history is undoubtedly a main reason for the zeal and enthusiasm devoted to its study by modern scholars and for the place it holds in modern education.

As regards its relation to moral philosophy and ethical science, the law of Rome achieved its perfection chiefly through the influence of that great ethical conception known to the Roman lawyers as jus naturalis—and the jus naturalis was, in substance, simply the application of the ethical doctrines of the Stoic philosophy to practical life. The close relation of law to ethics—a relation which the Roman lawyers never forgot—was, indeed, the secret of the greatness of the law of Rome, and has been, in no small measure, the reason of its permanent influence. The relation of Roman law to these and other departments of the Arts Faculty is a tempting theme for discourse. I trust that this side of the work of this chair will not be lost sight of, and that, to a greater extent than hitherto, Roman law may win for itself a place—a real and genuine place—in the Arts curriculum of the University. At the same time the main work, the special sphere and function, of this chair—both in Roman law and in Scots law—is, and must always be, the training of lawyers. In the Faculty of Law the University holds itself out as affording an efficient and systematic education in law—such an education as is adapted to prepare and equip a man for the work of a professional lawyer. While a University Faculty of Law does not exist solely for the purpose of professional training, the great majority of the students in such a faculty must always be men who are preparing to enter some branch of the legal profession.

For the purpose of professional training, the combination of Roman law and Scots law in a single chair is not inappropriate. Our Scots law is a direct descendant of Roman law. In the words of the late Lord President Inglis, "Roman law is the rock out of which Scots law has been hewn." The divisions and categories of our Scots law, most of our fundamental principles, many of our most important rules and maxims, most of our legal terminology, are taken directly from Roman law. So intimately related are the two systems, that from the point of view of a Scots lawyer the two subjects are not really separate. When a student, with a knowledge of Roman law, comes to the study of Scots law, he finds himself already familiar with its legal methods and general principles, and for centuries the voice of Scots lawyers has been unanimous in pronouncing the study of Roman law essential to a thorough understanding of the law of Scotland. As regards Scots law itself, it is necessary for the student to keep always in mind that University teaching constitutes only a part—an important part—but still only a part of his professional training. There are many things in which a student of law must minister to himself. There is much which he can learn only in the school of professional experience and practice. It is not within the walls of a University that a great lawyer can be made. The study of law is the work of a lifetime.

The relation of University teaching of law to the practice of law is, indeed, simply the relation of a science to an art. All that a university professes to do is to treat the general doctrines of law and legal methods: to expound succinctly the main rules; to aid the student to master principle, and study the reason of the rules; to train him in the analysis of complicated facts so that he may be able to cast aside irrelevancies and seize on the legal principle underlying the facts. As to the details, the styles, the forms of process, the matters of practice, the most efficient education in these things must always be found in the office, or the court, or the consulting room. For students of law as well as for teachers, it is all-important to keep in touch with professional life. Do not let the walls of the university shut us off from the life and movement of practice. If the Faculty of Law in this university is to develop and perform its functions efficiently it must co-relate itself with its legal environment, and I trust that the relation between this Faculty and the legal profession in the city will always be that closest of relations—the relation of mutual helpfulness. The close association between the Scottish universities and the learned professions has been an unmixed benefit to both. It has kept the universities in sympathy with actual work-a-day life and it has broadened the basis and strengthened the fibre of the profession. In recent years there has been a remarkable advance in public opinion as to the standard of professional training and qualification required in public servants of every kind. A striking illustration of this tendency is found in the new regulations for the training of teachers, whereby a definite course of professional study is prescribed for intending teachers, and the whole system of training is brought into close association with the work of the universities. In the profession of law—as in the Church and medicine—it has been well recognised for many centuries in Scotland that a course of university study is on the whole the most effective preparation for professional work. In this respect—as in many others—Scottish lawyers have followed the system of legal education universally practised on the Continent. In England and the United States—for reasons into which I need not enter—legal education was for many years regarded as falling outwith the sphere of the universities. Of course, very many of the most eminent English lawyers, from Blackstone downwards, were university men, but the rank and file of English lawyers, and particularly of English solicitors, were not educated at a university. During the last thirty or forty years, however, a resolute effort has been made, both in England and the United States, to remedy this state of matters. As a result of this remarkable movement—which is simply another illustration of the advance in public opinion as to the standard of professional requirements—the English universities, old and new—now provide a wide range of instruction in law, and it is not too much to say that the professional education of English lawyers is rapidly being reorganised on a broad and deep academic basis.

After referring to the development of university teaching in law in the United States, and to the necessity for a fuller law curriculum in Aberdeen University, Professor Irvine proceeded:—

To the community at large, as well as to the University, it is important that the Faculty of Law should be enabled to furnish a full curriculum of legal education. In proportion as society becomes more organised and more civilised, the scope of law constantly increases—extensively and intensively. The range of subjects dealt with and regulated by law grows in extent, and at the same time the law itself becomes more intricate and complex. As a consequence, the part played by lawyers in the community, and the functions of lawyers in the daily life of the citizens, extends year by year. An ignorant or dishonest lawyer is a public danger. It is, then, a matter of interest in the community at large that lawyers—no less than doctors or teachers—should be properly trained for the performance of their duties. If the proper training of lawyers is a matter of importance in the public interest, it is certainly not less urgent from the point of view of the legal profession. The profession of law is a calling, not a craft. "Namque colimus justitiam." The functions of the members of the profession vary. There are judges, there are counsel, there are solicitors, and there are many engaged in administrative work. But we are all members of one body.

The profession is a great unity, inheriting high traditions and organised to serve high public ends. From time immemorial, in all countries, it has been the duty of the profession to protect itself and the public from incompetent and vicious practitioners. To attain this object no better or more efficient means can be desired under present conditions than a careful provision for the training of, and the maintenance of, a high standard of education among its new members. I do not wish to exaggerate the value of university teaching. A university cannot give a man common sense, or tact, or self-possession, or that sympathy with and knowledge of men essential to a lawyer. But it can teach him the principles of law, widen his outlook, and strengthen his powers of exact reasoning and clear statement. Further, experience shows—and in this experience is our safest guide—that trained intelligence, the faculties developed by university discipline, tell more and more effectively as a man rises in the profession. To the judges, or the busy counsel, or the lawyer advising on large and delicate affairs, his university training is more useful than it is to the clerk who books the office letters. I trust, too, that it can be said that a sound university education in law develops a man's moral as well as his intellectual qualities. His ideals are heightened; he comes to realise, and to feel, something of the inspiration of the great traditions of the profession. These high ideals, these great traditions, are, indeed, from the moral point of view, one of the most valuable bequests of Roman jurisprudence. "Est quidem res sanctissima civilis sapientia." The almost sacred character of the "professio juris"—a theme on which the Roman lawyers loved to dwell—is not so much present to our minds in these modern days, though the idea survives in the fact that the legal profession—like the Church and the Army—is traditionally under stricter rules of honour and conduct than other citizens. But another great Roman conception—the conception that the legal profession is an organisation whose chief end and purpose is not private gain but the public weal and the service of the State, still remains with us. Let us who are members, or are preparing to be members, of the legal profession in Scotland, so act that we shall merit the memorable meed of praise bestowed by a Roman emperor on the lawyers of Rome—"They, too, fight for the Empire."

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Sheriff Court Code (Civil Procedure), being The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1907 (with Notes explanatory of the origin and inter-relation of the enactments and Procedure Rules), and an Appendix of Forms. By Thomas Alexander Fyfe, one of the Sheriffs-Substitute of Lanarkshire at Glasgow. Glasgow and Edinburgh, 1907: William Hodge & Co. Price 16*s. net.*

It is in every way appropriate that a work on The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1907 should come from the pen of Sheriff Fyfe. A judge of recognised ability and wide experience, he has for many years taken a leading part in the movement for Sheriff Court reform which has culminated in the passing into law of the Act of last session with a new code of rules for regulating and symplifying Procedure and forms of Process in the Sheriff Court. Mr Fyfe's book commences with an interesting introduction tracing the development of the Sheriff Court system and the powers and duties of the Sheriff. Then follows the text of the new Act, printed in large clear type and with numerous notes, both to the sections of the Act itself and to the sections of the schedule containing the rules of Procedure. These notes will be found very useful, as they indicate the alterations made under the new Act and give cross references to the rules and to the sections of former Acts which stand unrepealed. Mr Fyfe has printed also the report of the Departmental Committee on Sheriff Court Procedure upon which in the main the new Act is based, and the work concludes with a selection of illustrative forms of initial writs as shortened and simplified under the Procedure rules. An Appendix contains the section of Sheriff Court statutes still operative, and there is a satisfactory index. The book, which extends to 223 pages, is not of course intended in any way to cover the ground of Mr Dove Wilson's book on Sheriff Court Practice or of Sheriff Lees' collection of Sheriff Court Styles, and naturally there are no references to decided cases. Doubtless sections of the new code will be open to construction, and in a future edition Mr Fyfe may have to amplify his notes by referring to decisions as to the meaning of the provisions of the Act. With the possible exception of the report of the Departmental Committee, which is now more or less of academic interest, the book is one which every practitioner in or official connected with the Sheriff Courts of Scotland should read from cover to cover.

The Law Relating to Covenants in Restraint of Trade. Second Edition. By Joseph Bridges Matthews and Herbert M. Adler,

M.A., LL.M., both of the Inner Temple and Oxford Circuit, Barristers-at-Law. London, 1907: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd.
Price 7s. 6d.

The special branch of law with which this book deals is examined by the authors with great care and minuteness, and their treatment of the subject shows a thorough appreciation of the legal principles which have been discussed in detail in many of the cases on restraint of trade. Naturally much space is devoted to an examination of the judgments in the case of Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt in the House of Lords [1894], A.C. 535, the leading case on the subject, where much of the previous case law was reviewed. In addition to a general treatise the book contains a "Digest of all the cases from 1711 to the present time," arranged in chronological order, and also tables showing at a glance what covenants in restraint of trade have been held valid and what invalid. So far as we have observed, only two Scots cases are cited—the one incidentally, Ballachulish Slate Quarries v. Grant, 1903, 5 F. 1105—and Stewart v. Stewart, 1899, 1 F. 1158, which finds a place in the digest. This latter case (where a photographer who had undertaken not to start work as a photographer within twenty miles of Elgin in consideration of a loan of £5 was held bound by the contract) is regarded by the learned authors as wrongly decided. The book does not contain any reference to two other cases also reported in Vol. I. of Fraser, The Dumbarton Steamboat Co. v. Macfarlane, and Williams & Son v. Fairbairn. So far as English decisions are concerned the digest seems to be exhaustive.

Private Legislation (Scotland) Reports. Vol. VI. By D. Oswald Dykes, M.A., LL.B., and John W. More, M.A. Edin., B.A. Oxon., Advocates, and A. Beveridge, Parliamentary Solicitor. Session 1906. Edinburgh & London: William Green & Sons. Price 15s. net.

This issue of the Private Legislation Reports, Vol. VI. of the series, is the second volume for which Messrs Dykes, More and Beveridge are responsible. Eleven Provisional Orders are reported in the volume, and many points of importance are dealt with. It contains 90 pages as against 52 in Vol. V., and the reports are in every way satisfactory.

Forms and Precedents for the use of Accountants. Prepared by Specialists in each Department under the General Editorship of George Lisle, C.A. F.F.A. Vol. II.: Landlord and Tenant to Writings in re Mercatoria. Edinburgh and London: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 20s. net.

This volume completes the Forms and Precedents for the use of Accountants issued as a companion series to the Encyclopædia of Accounting. Under such headings as Landlord and Tenant (which contains forms of leases here and in England), Liquidators' Accounts, Local Authorities' Loans in England and Scotland, Parish Council Accounting, Partnership, Probate and Letters of Administration, Revenue Accounts, Sequestrations, Stamp Duty, and Underwriting, are to be found a large number of specimen accounts and well-considered styles with a variety of useful explanatory notes. The "Forms and Precedents," along with the Encyclopædia, will find a place on the bookshelves of many men of business as well as on those of accountants and lawyers.

An Outline of the Law of Joint Stock Companies for the Use of Students. By H. P. Macmillan, M.A., LL.B., Advocate. Edinburgh: Andrew Baxendine, 1907.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

In 1901 Mr Macmillan delivered a course of lectures under the auspices of the Institute of Bankers in Scotland on the subject of the Companies Act of 1900. Lectures on that subject naturally involved a general view of the Law of Companies in order to explain the modifications made by the Act. The lectures have to some extent been remodelled on revision prior to publication, and the volume now issued contains a complete, though of course only a general, survey of Company Law. It is written in the lucid style which characterises Mr Macmillan's pleadings both verbal and written, and shows great discrimination in the choice of points worthy to be discussed in a book which professes to be an outline of its subject. It is an admirable book for students, and we are not surprised to notice that the Institute of Bankers have chosen it as a text-book.

The Parliament House Book, 1907–8. Eighty-third Publication. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons. Price 7s. 6d.

The new issue of the Parliament House Book has as usual appeared at the commencement of the winter session. The Parliament House Book requires no introduction to the legal profession in Scotland, as it has long been recognised as a most complete and valuable book of legal reference. The legislation of last session has added a considerable amount of new matter to this year's issue, and the general information contained in the volume has been thoroughly brought down to date.

A. J. YOUNG, Esq., Advocate,

Sheriff-Substitute of Aberdeen, Kincardine and Banff.

The subject of our portrait this week is Mr Andrew John Young, who has taken up his duties as Sheriff-Substitute and has received a very gratifying and hearty welcome from the legal profession and the public in the city and county of Aberdeen. Mr Young, who is a son of the late Mr William Young, Solicitor and Banker, Auchterarder, and for many years Commissary Clerk of the County of Perth, was educated at the Perth Academy and at the University of Edinburgh, where he graduated as Master of Arts. In 1868 he was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates. He soon proved himself a capable counsel. His written pleadings were careful and concise, and in Court he was known as a lucid and forcible debater, a skilful cross-examiner, and a telling jury pleader. As he held the office of Junior Counsel for a public department he was practically precluded from "taking silk," but he was frequently employed as a Senior, and in that capacity he appeared in recent years, in many well-known cases both in the Civil and the Criminal Courts. In 1886 Mr Young was appointed (in succession to Mr Campbell Lorimer, who became an Advocate-Depute) Counsel to the Inland Revenue. As the holder of that office it fell to him to conduct a large (and in recent years an increasing) number of important cases in all branches of Revenue Law. Successive law officers of the Crown much relied on his thorough knowledge of the statute and case law of the intricate subject of taxation.

Mr Young has been widely known as a Liberal, and has for many years been an active supporter of his party.

Sheriff Young was on Friday, 25th October, introduced to the Bar at Aberdeen by Sheriff-Principal Crawford, K.C. There was a large attendance of the profession and of the public. Sheriff Begg, Lord Provost Sir Alexander Lyon, the City Treasurer, the Magistrates, the Town Clerk, and Town Clerk Depute, were seated on the right of Sheriff Crawford. On the left were Professor Irvine (who has been acting as Interim Sheriff-Substitute), Colonel Innes (the father of the Faculty of Advocates), Hon. Sheriffs-Substitute Douglass Duncan, James Duguid, Henry Peterkin, and James Murray.

Sheriff Young having presented his commission, Sheriff Crawford ordered it to be read. This was done by Dr Littlejohn, Sheriff-Clerk, the audience standing. The commission was then ordered to be engrossed.

Sheriff Crawford said—In addressing a legal audience it is superfluous for me to introduce Mr Young. He is known to you all, and to many of you personally, as a lawyer of ripe experience in the practice of his profession and a man of ability. He has, for a good many years, held the office of Standing Counsel to the Inland Revenue, a post which could not be conferred upon anybody but a sound and able lawyer—and during the term of his tenure of that office, with the growth of the business of the country the importance of it has considerably increased. Now he has come to us at Aberdeen, followed by the warm good wishes of his contemporaries in Parliament House, who are sorry to take leave of a very popular figure there. Here, I doubt not, he will speedily make friends also, and he will find a sphere—a very full and varied sphere—of congenial work. I shall not presume to say more about Mr Young's legal qualifications, nor shall I pretend to speak to him as a judge when he is only putting on his harness. This I know, that no man could come here with a more strenuous resolve than he to maintain the high standard of those who have gone before him in the office which he is to occupy—or better qualified, in my mind, to continue those satisfactory and happy relations which subsist between the Bench and the Bar here. And now, in the presence of the Bar, in the presence of the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city, in the presence of my friend the father of the Scottish Bar, I heartily bid him welcome here, and request him to take his seat on the Bench.

Sheriff Young then took his place on the Bench.

Sheriff Henderson Begg said—I need not say that I concur entirely in every word you have said in regard to my old friend Mr Young. It gives me peculiar pleasure to welcome him as my colleague here, and to renew the happy relations which endured between us when we were both at the Bar. I have not the least doubt he will prove a worthy successor even to the distinguished judge who has now left us.

Mr James Ross, President of the Society of Advocates—In name of the Society of Advocates, I desire on behalf of the members of that Society to offer to Sheriff Young a most cordial welcome to Aberdeen, and to assure his Lordship of their loyal and hearty co-operation and assistance in the conduct of the business of this Court. I do think that hitherto we have been exceptionally fortunate in Aberdeen in getting Sheriffs of conspicuous ability, and when we consider the reputation of Sheriff Young and the high position he has occupied at the Scottish Bar, the members of our Society feel assured of the continuance of the high order of ability and talent with which the judicial business of the north-eastern counties of Scotland has been conducted.

Mr John Craigen, President of the Society of Solicitors—It gives me very great pleasure to have the opportunity on behalf of the Society of Solicitors to join with your Lordship, the Sheriff-Principal, and my friend Mr Ross, in offering to Sheriff Young our cordial congratulations on his appointment, and a hearty welcome to the city of Aberdeen. It will be readily acknowledged, as my friend Mr Ross has said, that Aberdeen has been exceedingly fortunate in its Sheriffs, who have invariably been eminent and distinguished men of sound judgment and high judicial capacity; and knowing as we do the distinction which Sheriff Young has achieved as an advocate, and his reputation as an able and accomplished lawyer of wide experience, we readily recognise in him a worthy successor of the best traditions of the Bench.

Lord Provost Sir Alexander Lyon said—Sheriff Young, on behalf of the Magistrates and the members of the Town Council and the whole of the citizens of Aberdeen, I offer you a very hearty welcome to the city of Aberdeen. When my friend on my left, Sheriff Begg, came here first I noted that he said he had left with very considerable regret his many kind friends in the West. I have no doubt you, sir, have left many kind friends in the South; but I trust you will come amongst a class of people who will no less be friends to you in the future. Perhaps the Aberdonians are colder at first, but I am quite sure, with the reputation you bring to Aberdeen, that our hearts will warm towards you, and to-day, on behalf of the different bodies I represent, I give you a very hearty welcome to Aberdeen.

Sheriff Young, who had a most cordial reception, said—My Lords and gentlemen, I have to thank you with all my heart for the warm welcome extended to me, and for the kind words used in my favour—words which I think are due rather to the gracious sympathy of my well-wishers than to my deserts. I will only say this, that I am not without some true sense of the responsibilities attaching to the duties which I have to discharge in so important a Sheriffdom, and there is present in my mind also a full consciousness of the difficulty there may be in filling the place of one for whose loss there has been general regret and sorrow. The late Mr Robertson had an individuality of his own—and possessing a clear insight and strong common sense, achieved a remarkable success among you, and has left behind him a record of work well and faithfully done. If coming now I have any confidence and courage in entering upon the duties of my position, it is just because I can rely on receiving every assistance from my old friend and esteemed colleague, Sheriff Begg, as well as from the experienced officials of the Court. I know from the highest quarters and on the most eminent authority that I can depend—and this is a great deal to say, more than I can tell—upon the excellent help from the lawyers practising at this Bar, holding as they do an established reputation for learning and ability. Again I thank you, my Lords and gentlemen, for the extreme kindness of your reception, and I trust that our relations to one another will always be of the best.

The Court then adjourned.

The Inaugural Address of the ninety-third session of the Scots Law Society will be delivered by the Hon. Lord Guthrie in the Conveyancing and History Class Room, University, on Monday, 4th November, at 8.30 p.m. The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate, will preside. The subject of address is "The Treatment of Criminals in Scotland."

The New Principal Clerk of Session.—Mr Edwin Adam presented his commission as Principal Clerk to the Lord President and the Judges of the First Division on Tuesday morning. The Lord Advocate and a large number of members of the Bar were present. In accordance with practice, Mr Adam underwent his trials, which consisted in drafting an interlocutor on a case which was advised. The proposed interlocutor was approved by the Court. Thereafter the Lord President administered the oath and welcomed Mr Adam to his place at the table.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Kruger & Co. Ltd. v. Moel Tryvan Ship Co. Ltd.

Ship — Bill of Lading — Reparation — Negligence.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 172) affirmed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Earl of Halsbury, Lord James of Hereford, and Lord Atkinson).—4*th July* 1907.

Boussod, Valadon & Co. v. Marchant.

Trade Name—"Goupil Gallery."—The plaintiffs were successors of Goupil, and as such were entitled to call their picture-selling premises by the name of the "Goupil Gallery," and to restrain others from using the name. They entered into an agreement with the defendant by which they sold the furniture and fittings in their premises to him and appointed him sole agent for them in the United Kingdom.—Held that in the circumstances the plaintiffs were not entitled to restrain the defendant from using the name "Goupil Gallery" in connection with the business carried on by him.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.)—8*th July* 1907.

"The Langdale."

Ship—Collision—Limitation of Liability.—Held that sect. 69 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 48) was not retrospective.—P. D. and A. Div. (Bargrave Deane, J.).—8*th July* 1907.

A QUESTION OF APPORTIONMENT.

By Charles Milne, Esq., M.A., LL.B., Advocate.

Difficult questions sometimes arise when a dividend or bonus has to be apportioned between a liferenter and a fiar. In regard to one point in particular the law on the subject is uncertain, viz., as to what is the exact period referred to in sect. 5 of the Apportionment Act 1870, in respect of which an apportionment should be made. The existence of this uncertainty as to the proper period results in a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs, since some business men adopt one system of apportionment while others adopt a different system, and the relative interests of liferenter and fiar are differently affected according to which system is adopted. The second and fifth sections of the Apportionment Act 1870 are as follows:—

§ 2. "From and after the passing of this Act, all rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing or otherwise) shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly;" and

§ 5. ". . . . The word 'dividends' includes (besides dividends strictly so-called) all payments made by the name of dividend, bonus, or otherwise out of the revenue of trading or other public companies divisible between all or any of the members of such respective companies, whether such payments shall be usually made or declared at any fixed times or otherwise; and all such divisible revenue shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to have accrued by equal daily increment during and within the period for or in respect of which the payment of the same revenue shall be declared or expressed to be made; but the said word 'dividend' does not include payments in the nature of a return or reimbursement of capital."

The point arises in connection with the words "and all such divisible revenue shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to have accrued by equal daily increment during and within the period for or in respect of which the payment of the same revenue shall be declared or expressed to be made." Let us take a concrete case. A company pays its dividends half-yearly in the usual way; and suppose, for example, that at a meeting on 3rd April 1903 a dividend was declared "for half year ending 28th February 1903, payable 16th April 1903." Suppose further that a person who in virtue of a liferent was entitled to the dividends died on 30th November 1902. In a question of apportionment of the dividend between the representatives of the liferenter and the fiar, is the half year to be considered as the six months ending 28th February, or the six months ending 16th April? In the former case the proportion of the dividend falling to the fiar will be a proportion corresponding to the period from 30th November 1902 to 28th February 1903; in the latter case his share will correspond to the longer period from 30th November 1902 to 16th April 1903. Now the words of the statute seem quite unequivocal. It is the "period for or in respect of which" the payment is made, which in the case figured above seems to be the six months ending 28th February 1903, the last day of the half year during which the dividend was declared to have been earned. There has, however, never been any judicial decision on the point either in England or in Scotland since the passing of the Apportionment Act 1870, although a similar question was expressly raised and argued in two English cases, Hartley v. Allen, 27 L.J. Ch. 621, and Maxwell, In re, 32 L.J. Ch. 333; but, be it noted, the decisions in both these cases proceeded on an interpretation of sect. 2 of the earlier Apportionment Act of 1834, 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 22, which says:—

> ". . . . He or she (i.e. the liferenter, etc.) . . . . shall be entitled to a proportion of such rents, annuities, pensions, dividends, ... according to the time which shall have elapsed from the commencement or last period of payment thereof, respectively (as the case may be) . . . ."

In the case of Maxwell, In re, Vice-Chancellor Wood observed:—

> "The period is to be calculated from the time when the dividend became payable, and not the time when the profits were earned, for that is the course which the Vice-Chancellor (Kindersley, in Hartley's case) followed, and I can see no other which could be pursued under the Act of Parliament. . . . The Act of Parliament is express, saying that it should be according to the time that should have elapsed since the last period of payment, and one sees the difficulties which one would be exposed to in any other way of looking at it, because the Act has reference to payments which become due at fixed periods. Whatever is payable in respect of dividend is not due until the meeting has declared that it shall become due and payable. Therefore the apportionment must be made with reference to the last payment and without reference to the year when the profits may be said to have been earned; and there is good reason for that, for though the company might make their account of the profits earned in the last year, it would be most improper in them, if they had a large sum in hand, and knew that there was a large demand coming (as, for instance, in the case of the vast frauds which were perpetrated on the Great Northern Railway Company) to declare any dividend, notwithstanding that the previous year had been one of great profit. It is all in the breast of the directors who have to manage the concerns of the company; and the dividend can only be payable at the period when it is declared to be due and payable."

On the other hand, in the case of Griffith, In re Carr v. Griffith, 12 Chan. Div. 655, in 1879, and therefore under the Apportionment Act 1870, an apportionment was ordered to take place where the last day of the period of earning was taken as fixing the duration of the period of increment, but the only question at issue in this case was whether a certain bonus was or was not subject to apportionment. There was no dispute as to the period of increment during which the apportionment was to take place if the Act should be held to apply, for all the parties seem to have assumed that the last day of the period of earning fixed the duration of the period of increment. The same assumption was made by both parties in the special case Macpherson's Trs. v. Macpherson, 15 S.L.T. 153, in June of this year, but here again the question was whether the Act did or did not apply. In this case it was held that the Act did not apply and that there should be no apportionment.

This way of fixing the period of increment is in accordance with a strict interpretation of sect. 5, but the practice is very general, in Scotland at any rate, of taking the day when the dividend was payable as the last day of the period of increment. From a practical point of view this latter method has much to recommend it, for it is only when the dividend is payable and the shareholder can cash his dividend warrant that the dividend really becomes part of his income; and moreover, an apportionment according to what seems now to be the legal method must often be exceedingly difficult. Indeed in some cases it would be impossible; for example, in a case where the apportionment has been delayed for some years, and no information can be obtained as to what was the exact period during which the dividend was declared to have been earned.

In conclusion, it may be noted that in those cases where the operation of the Apportionment Act is excluded by the terms of the will, "what a tenant for life is to take under an ordinary bequest of shares is what is declared as dividends or bonuses in the shape of dividends during the lifetime of that tenant for life" (per Lindley, L.J., in Armitage, In re Armitage v. Garnett [1893], 3 Ch. 337, page 346), and that although the dividend or bonus is declared to have been partly earned during a period before the liferent came into existence (Hopkins' Trusts, In re, 1874, L.R. 18 Eq. 696). This rule is not directly connected with a question as to the interpretation of the Apportionment Act, but it should be observed that in these cases the period of earning is disregarded, and the crucial factor in determining who has a right to the dividend is held to be the date of payment.

J. A. ROBERTSON-DURHAM, Esq., C.A.,

President of the Society of Accountants in Edinburgh.

Mr Robertson-Durham well deserves the honour which his brethren have done him in electing him President of the Society of Accountants in Edinburgh. He stands in the first rank of his profession; and his services are much sought after by lawyers and by the public. His commanding figure is frequently seen in the Parliament House. He is usually a witness, on one side or other, in cases where an expert skilled in accounting is required, and it is no easy matter for the cross-examiner to shake his testimony either by direct attack or by inducing him in an unguarded moment to make dangerous admissions. He has been appointed Liquidator of many Companies and Factor on many estates. He is frequently nominated as Reporter by the Court, and he enjoys in a marked degree the confidence of the Judges.

Mr James Alexander Robertson-Durham, who was born in 1848, is a son of the late Mr Alexander Weir Robertson, C.A., one of the active originators and first members of the Edinburgh Society of Chartered Accountants. He was educated at the Edinburgh Academy, and after serving a five years' apprenticeship to his father he was, in December 1869, admitted a member of the Chartered Accountants' Society. He is also a Fellow of the Faculty of Actuaries. In 1870 he became a partner in his father's firm. That business has since that date been conducted under the firm name of A. & J. Robertson, C.A., and among Mr Robertson-Durham's present partners is his son, Mr A. W. Robertson-Durham.

Among the many appointments which Mr Robertson-Durham holds are those of Auditor and Accountant of the Church of Scotland; Auditor of the Commercial Bank of Scotland; Auditor of the North of Scotland Bank; Auditor of the Scottish Life Assurance Company, and Manager of the Scottish Reversionary Company Ltd. He is a Director of the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Association. Mr Robertson-Durham was for several years one of the Professional Examiners of his Society, and, since the Board was instituted, he has been a member of the General Examining Board of Chartered Accountants in Scotland. He is a Trustee of the Chartered Accountants Widows' Fund. In 1899 he succeeded to the estates of Boghead and Foulshiels, in the county of Linlithgow, and assumed, as required, his great-grandfather's name of "Durham."

Mr Robertson-Durham has very many interests beyond his professional work. He is a golfer of repute, and was for many years a familiar figure on the links which surround Gullane, where he used to reside in summer. Now he devotes his leisure largely to agricultural pursuits on his own property. His home farm is run on scientific principles, and experiments in arboriculture are being conducted on his estate. He is a keen sportsman and an excellent shot.

He is a member of the Royal Company of Archers, the King's Bodyguard for Scotland. He is also a Justice of the Peace for the counties of Linlithgow and Haddington, and the county of the city of Edinburgh.

Faculty of Advocates.—Mr C. M. Aitchison, M.A., LL.B., and Mr P. F. Hamilton Grierson, B.A., were on 1st inst. admitted to the Faculty of Advocates.

Business in the House of Lords.—There are now nineteen causes standing for hearing. Of these three, are from Scotland and sixteen from England. The following are the Scotch Appeals, with their order in the Roll:—2. United Collieries Ltd. v. Muir & Co. Ltd.; 13. Weir v. Crum Brown; 19. Black v. Scottish Temperance Life Assurance Co. Ltd.

A sitting of the High Court of Justiciary was held in Glasgow on Tuesday and Wednesday. Lord Low and Lord Pearson were the presiding Judges. Mr William Thomson (who made his first appearance as an Advocate-Depute) prosecuted in the Old Court, assisted by Mr Dunbar. Mr Munro, assisted by Mr Oswald Dykes, prosecuted in the New Court. There were six cases, involving six persons.

The Second Division has for the time removed its sittings from the Second Division Court-room to the Justiciary Court. This will enable the work of the erection of the new building above the enrolling-room, and adjoining the Second Division Court-room, to be gone on with without delay. Very rapid progress is now being made with the alterations in the Advocates' Library, rendered necessary by the extension of the Outer House Courts. The Library is at present closed to the public, but it is hoped that it may be re-opened early in the new year.

The sittings of the Extra Division were brought to a conclusion last Saturday. The Act of Sederunt appointing the sittings directed the Extra Division to sit from 15th October to 2nd November. Owing to the indisposition of Lord Stormonth-Darling, the Third Division was not formed till the 22nd October, and its sittings extended only to a fortnight. Six cases were heard—most of them at considerable length—and of these three are still at avizandum. Though the Extra Division has not made much difference numerically to the state of the rolls, some heavy cases have been disposed of. On the other hand in the First Division a large number of cases have been heard and the roll has thus been materially shortened. In the Second Division the progress has been comparatively slow. No announcement has been made as to any further sittings of the Extra Division, but it is understood that that Court will sit again after Christmas should the state of the Inner House Rolls render it necessary.

Mr J. W. E. Steedman, solicitor, Edinburgh, and Mr John Richardson, solicitor there, have entered into partnership, and will carry on business as solicitors at 56 Frederick Street, Edinburgh, under the firm name of Steedman & Richardson. THE SCOTS LAW SOCIETY.

Lord Guthrie and the Treatment of Criminals.

The Lord Advocate on the Probation System.

The inaugural address of the 93rd session of the University of Edinburgh Scots Law Society was delivered by Lord Guthrie in the Conveyancing and History Classroom of the University on Monday, on "The Treatment of Criminals in Scotland." The Lord Advocate (Mr Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P.) presided over a large attendance, which included Lord Salvesen, the Solicitor-General (Mr Ure, K.C., M.P.), Sheriff Johnston, K.C., Sheriff Chisholm, K.C., Mr G. L. Crole, K.C., Clerk of Justiciary, Mr G. Watt, K.C., Mr Crabb Watt, K.C., the Crown Agent (Mr W. S. Haldane, W.S.), and Colonel M'Hardy, C.B., Chairman of the Prison Commissioners.

Lord Guthrie said—In 1901 Sir Robert Anderson, Assistant Commissioner of Police in London, wrote an article in the "Nineteenth Century," titled "Our Absurd System of Punishing Crime." Last month he published "Criminals and Crime," in which identical views are repeated, with ample illustrations from his vast experience. In that same year, 1901, the "Juridical Review" contained an article by me, titled "Our Punishment of Crime—An Admitted Failure." Subsequent observation in the Sheriff Court and in the Court of Justiciary, visits to prisons, and reading reports by Prison Commissioners, and works by criminologists and criminals, have only confirmed the opinions expressed in my article. Experts and amateurs in short agree that we are annually expending immense sums in connection with the treatment of criminals and getting less than no value for our money. The present system no doubt punishes in a haphazard way; but it fails either to deter or to reform; it is costly to the State; it injures the dependants of criminals by depriving them of their bread-winners; and as to the criminals themselves it sends them out less able and less willing to live respectably than when they entered. The indictment of expert and amateur is thus a heavy one. But by neither is blame attached to prison authorities, commissioners, governors, doctors, chaplains or warders. They do their best to accomplish the impossible, to bring satisfactory results out of a system founded on unsound principles.

Nor do I ignore, as I think Sir Robert Anderson sometimes does, the wise legislative changes of recent years, dealing with first offenders and with the establishment of State and County Inebriates' Reformatories.

I am equally alive to the wise if cautious changes made by the Prison Commissioners before and since 1901 at their own hand. Pupil children are no longer to be seen in our prisons, and the day will soon come when minors will be as conspicuously absent. Efforts are made to find work, and, if possible, interesting work for every prisoner. The crank and the treadmill, the handcuffs and the dark cell, are gone for ever. There is increasing realisation of the fact in human nature that rewards are a more powerful incentive to good order and hard work than punishments. Gratuities payable on liberation are earned by work. Cell windows have been enlarged, in many cases doubled. There are prison libraries, available for good conduct. In the cells small mirrors and simple coloured prints have lately been hung. There is an effort now not to destroy, but to conserve, individuality and self-respect. The close-cropped hair and identical shaving of the men is gone; before meals they get time to tidy themselves and to wash. Each winter lectures, with or without the magic lantern, are delivered in the larger prisons. Lastly, instead of a cold and carefully restricted access to those heroic people who undertake that most difficult of all religious and benevolent work, prison visiting, they receive a cordial and sympathetic welcome.

These changes have led to warnings from the supporters of the old school. But in every case, instead of discipline being prejudiced, it has been made easier, and there has been no case of a return to the previous system. All honour to the Prison Commissioners. But they are trying to work, and to encourage others to work, on reformatory lines in places built for purposes of punishment. Consider that picturesque enormity, the Calton Jail.

I don't know more statesmanlike documents than the Prison Commissioners' annual reports. They are thoroughly alive to the evils of the present system, while loyal to the duties they are appointed to perform. In the great work of reform we would like to see the Scotch prison authorities put in a position by Parliament and the Treasury to lead the way, so that our procedure in Scotch prisons may be as superior to the procedure in English prisons as our procedure in Scotch Criminal Courts, Inferior and Supreme, is superior to the procedure south of the Border.

Do not let us be prejudiced against schemes of reform because made in America, nor because some prison reformers expect from them impossible results, and have lent themselves to fantastic experiments. There is no risk of our ever enlivening our prisoners, as is done in one American prison, by admitting crowds of visitors to gaze at them, even although, as in that prison, we could charge each visitor a quarter dollar.

It is easy to reply to all this by the cheap sneer that the new views will render prisons too comfortable. People, it seems to be suggested, once in, will not wish to leave. Such a reply betokens complete ignorance, first, of what the new views are; and second, of what prison life is at its best possible.

What, then, exactly is the system which experts think effete? As already indicated, it is based primarily on two principles, punishment and deterrence. Sin has been committed, it is said; the laws of God and man have been broken, and the culprit must expiate his offence by suffering the loss of life, limb, liberty or property. And further, he must be so dealt with that he will not be likely to repeat the offences; and in any case, all others must be deterred, as the old Scots indictment ran, "from committing the like crimes in all time coming." According to this view, it was rather the crime than the criminal that had to be regarded in the question of punishment. Not so very long ago certain crimes necessarily implied death, and to the gallows all went, despite the circumstance of youth, provocation, or partially deficient intelligence, which now receive such great weight. The first of these principles is abandoned in theory, although not in practice. Whether the Deity punishes for punishment's sake, is a question for theologians. Laymen agree that such mode of dealing with mortals is not for their fellow mortals. The other principle, that of deterrence, is manifestly founded on common sense, and must always receive effect.

But, besides deterrence, we have two other principles to consider and apply: first, the duty of the State to deprive the unreformed, and still more the unreformable, of liberty; and second, its duty, or at least its right, to reform. The present system was not designed to give effect to either of those principles. Cold-blooded experts, in the interests of the State, and warm-hearted philanthropists, in the interests of the criminals, are both agreed they ought to be given effect to. But neither public nor Parliamentary opinion is yet sufficiently enlightened to pass the necessary statutes, and give the necessary funds.

When a man is fined rather than jailed the reason must be because, in the case of statutory offences, the Legislature, and, in common law charges, the judge, thinks the case will be adequately met by a money penalty. If so, and if the man is at the moment unable to pay, why not give him time? It is ludicrous to ask a drunk and disorderly, who has put into the publican's pockets the money which belonged of right to his wife and children, to pay a fine.

Why not give him time to earn the money and pay the fine? Why hale him straight away to prison?

But the most serious aspect of short sentences remains behind. Out of the 58,000 cases of imprisonment in 1906, about 12,000 are for first offences, of which the immense proportion are short sentences. Like all short sentences, they are too short to expel the taste for drink, or to give time for educational or moral training, or to teach a trade; they are too short and too painless either to punish or to deter, and they are too short for benefit to the country, by removing dangerous people for a substantial period. The Departmental Committee on Scotch Prisons of 1900 said: "If short sentences cannot be worked for the improvement of the prisoner" (and they thought they could not), "they cannot, on the other hand, be said to act as a deterrent." But worse than all that, they affix that prison brand for which, as with Esau, there is generally no place of repentance found, though sought carefully with tears. "After being in prison," said Margaret Ward, a Glasgow convict, giving evidence before a Government Commissioner, "after being in prison, I did not care though I never was out of it. Once put in prison, character is gone."

If the ranks of criminals are to be depleted, the supply must be stopped at the fountainhead. One shudders to think what the state of matters in our streets and our prisons would have been but for the work of reformatories and of industrial schools, the State-aided, State-filled, and State-inspected representatives of those voluntary ragged schools, about whose history and work my earliest home memories have made me more of an expert and less of an amateur than I am about prisons.

And now for long sentences. Major Griffiths, a great authority, has said that there are only two classes in our jails—those who should never have been in, and those who should never be out. Of course, the saying has the defects as well as the merits of an epigram. Under present conditions, the saying, in both its parts, is not far from the truth. Indeed, as far as the unreformable are concerned, the saying will always hold good. But if it is meant to assert that under no possible system can places of detention be used for reformatory purposes, then I join issue with Major Griffiths.

Consider first the proved unreformable. I mean the habitual or professional criminal, the man who alternates between prison life and the life of a thief, with negligible spells of casual work, the man who makes crime a trade to live by, and who is an active agency in training others to crime.

Henry Marchant, sentenced some years ago at the Clerkenwell Sessions, was an instance. He had previously had sentences of ten years and seven years. The eminent judge who tried the case thus addressed him:—"You are a most dangerous man, from whom the public require to be protected." This address led up to a sentence of five years' penal servitude. Logically one would have expected either a life sentence to follow, or at least, what the Americans call the indeterminate sentence, meaning a sentence of permanent detention, unless and until the prison committee think the man deserves another chance.

If the country, on the view that the power would be too great to put into the hands of a prison committee without some check, would not stand a bare indeterminate sentence, then it could be coupled with a high maximum limit. In a case like Marchant's, a sentence of a comparatively short definite period is merely a lame conclusion. We do not allow a small-pox patient, so long as the disease is on him, to go at large among the community. But at the end of it the man goes free, even if he is known to be more determined than before to resume his previous career, to live by his wits, not his work, and to prey and teach others to prey, without ceasing, on the public.

You may ask, Why do not the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary, with the absolute discretion which the Crown commits to us, sentence all proved habituals for life? The first answer is that public opinion would not support us, even if the indeterminate sentence were qualified by a maximum limit. The second answer is that we are seldom in a position to know whether an old hand is or is not a professional criminal. A mere list of previous convictions, possibly with lengthened intervals between the liberations and convictions, does not prove it.

But there is a third answer, obvious to everyone who knows what penal servitude for life, or even for a long period of years, means.

Substantial sympathy with it, knowledge of the crushing severity of penal servitude, prevents the long sentences which would otherwise be given. Negro slavery was compatible with much that made life worth living; so is the lot of thousands of Siberian exiles. Ask the question of any of our convicts, and you will get but one reply.

Why should the present system continue? It is not punishment we want; we want only to keep the country safe to live in. For that purpose we need, first, reformatory establishments for the reclaimable. In these, the whole treatment of the prisoner, physical, mental, moral and religious, from the moment he enters, will be directed to fit him to retain the situation which will be found for him on discharge. He will have the chance, the first he may ever have had, through education, reading, and moral and religious instruction, to acquire some control over his criminal nature, and to form tastes and habits and ambitions and views of life which may ultimately make a man of him.

Second, we want places for the permanent detention of irreclaimables. If these lost men and women are kept from doing harm to the lives and property of the lieges, I do not see why their "condition" might not be so ameliorated that judges might not hesitate, as they would do now, to impose that indeterminate sentence to which I have referred, a condition which would not trangress the golden maxim, "All unnecessary pain is cruelty."

To sum up, short sentences, sufficient to affix the indelible prison brand, but insufficient to punish, or deter or reform, or keep out of harm's way long enough to justify the expense, will cease. Sentences long enough and hard enough to deter will continue, under such conditions as will afford time and opportunity to reform. But the subjects of these long sentences will be divided into two classes, which may in some cases become interchangeable — the reclaimable and the irreclaimable, the casual and the habitual or professional. The reclaimable will receive a sentence long enough to enable them to be fitted for a fresh start; and a fresh start, at home or abroad, will be procured for them by the State or by voluntary agencies. The irreclaimable will be detained unless and until they prove that they no longer deserve the name.

But whatever results may be achieved by that system of prison management, the coming of which our Prison Commissioners are doing so much to hasten, it will, at all events, be a system defensible in principle. It will have nothing to do with mere punishment as an aid in itself. If it does not reform, it will deter. It will increase the safety of our lives and property, and, finally, it will not involve the expenditure of immense sums of money in making men and women less fit, physically, mentally, morally, and less willing to live God-fearing, self-respecting lives.

I cannot close without saying that, important as these questions are, they are, after all, new details, symptoms which leave the disease untouched. If crime is to be effectually checked in this country, if the stream of 12000 new cases every year is to be dried up, then the country must be prepared, as it is not yet prepared, to deal drastically with two problems: first, how to prevent the crime which results directly or indirectly from the use, or, if some prefer it, the abuse, of intoxicants; and second, how to remove the children from the influence of the criminal and the drunkard. The chairman of the Scotch Prison Commissioners has said deliberately: "There is no crime to speak of at all in Scotland. It is all a question of whisky. The day may come," Colonel M'Hardy added, "when all but a few of our prisons may become inebriate reformatories."

I say nothing about the absolute importance of the questions which separate Unionist from Liberal, Unionist from Unionist, and Liberal from Liberal, or of those which divide Protestantism into so many denominations. But I express my deliberate conviction when I say that, looking to the interests of this country, material, moral, religious, these great political and sectarian problems are but trifles in comparison with the drink problem, and its train of poverty, vice, disease, insanity and crime.

The Lord Advocate and the Probation of Offenders Act.

The Lord Advocate, in moving a vote of thanks to Lord Guthrie, said:—The address was in all respects according to my own way of thinking. I have been working in that direction in public life for many years, and I am sure that neither his Lordship nor any of you gentlemen will omit to note the latest product of Parliament upon this very topic. Some of you belonging to the old school may think Lord Guthrie's views revolutionary. They are nothing of the sort. Parliament as at present constituted is imbued with the same feelings. Allow me to say that in Parliament itself we have had a most remarkable experience. Were I in a Parliamentary assembly I should command the assent of all shades of opinion to this, that no greater prison reformer has ever impressed his views more consciously and more vividly upon the mind of Parliament itself than the late Michael Davitt. He had gone through in its most savage form terms of penal servitude; he had preserved the enormous faculty of retentive memory and literary power; and he presented the fruits of his experience mostly in discussions upon prison reform to Parliament in such a way as vividly to impress the mind and alter the policy of the nation. I think it right, now that he is gone after a stormy life, to record that in his favour as the opinion of all parties in the State. Last session this Parliament, crowded as it was with public work, was engaged upon a little Bill emanating from the Home Office, and added to and tacked upon by the Scottish Office. It was called "The Probation of Offenders Act 1907." You will be surprised to know that they have just hit exactly the point of Lord Guthrie's address. There could be no greater service to the public on this head of social reform than insisting on attention to the beginnings of a career of crime, and the purpose of the Probation of Offenders Act was to seize all possible cases of beginnings of crime, lift them out of the hard and fast category where the punishment, and the punishment alone, was made, as it were, to fit the crime, and hand them over to some authority which would impose some new test in this situation, and which would give a humane touch of helpfulness and foresight, and which might retrieve the man in danger of being a criminal from a life of crime. So you will find that there are guardians appointed to take charge of the offender who is under probation, and those guardians have to look at the thing, which never in the history of the British Parliament was expressed, I think, so philosophically as actually to consider all the surroundings of the case, the very heredity of the criminal, the situation occurring in the way of temptation that surrounded him, and so to guard the position that the magistrate would, taking all these things into account, be able, although there was guilt, actually to dismiss the charge against the man, and if he did not dismiss him, at all events to put this person, probably young, under probation in the charge of probation officers set up by the local authorities. The case of the criminal never was treated either by a magistrate, a judge, or prison officer, or Parliament in this broad view that there was to be a record had of his character, of his antecedents, of his age, of his health, or of his mental condition. You will be surprised to know also that this very idea of Lord Guthrie's has been not only carried out in that particular of attending to the beginnings, but it has been carried out by this Parliament in attending to the future career and life of those criminals, because the probation officers have actually deputed to them by Parliament this extraordinary duty to advise, to assist, to befriend the prisoner and, when necessary, to endeavour to find him suitable employment. If it were worth nothing else than that statute, it would have been worth while serving fifteen years in Parliament. I had the honour of drawing the Scottish clauses. The whole of the carrying out of this statute will depend upon the co-operation and in some respects the initiative and power of imagination and energy of the local authorities, burghal and county, in Scotland; and I make this public appeal to them that for the humane objects of this statute they will do all they can by the appointment of sympathetic and humane probationary officers—being guaranteed that the necessary funds will be provided out of the regular sources of taxation—so as to assist Parliament in this great work to which it has set its hand.

Lord Salvesen, in seconding, said the prevalence, or supposed prevalence, of crime in Scotland was, he thought, due more to the excellent system of public prosecution that they had, and of which their chairman was the distinguished head, than to any exceptional wickedness on the part of Scotsmen.

The vote of thanks was cordially awarded.

The subject of the portrait in our next issue will be:—

The Late William Fletcher, Esq., W.S.

The Royal Commission on Registration of Title in Scotland will meet to hear evidence on Thursday and Friday next week in the S.S.C. Library, Edinburgh.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Wylie v. Povah.

Insurance—Marine—Total Loss.—The plaintiffs purchased a cargo which was "expected to arrive per sailer . . . . and to discharge . . . . August, September, October, 1905, shipment." The contract contained the clause: "In case of non-arrival, this contract to be void, and should the vessel, from any unforeseen circumstances, be prevented from delivering the whole of the cargo originally shipped, this contract to be void as regards the undelivered portion." The plaintiffs entered into a contract of insurance on profits with the defendants, and the policy provided:—"Warranted free from all average and without benefit of salvage, but to pay a loss on such portion as does not reach its destination." The ship in which the cargo was became a total loss; but part of the cargo was subsequently transhipped and reached its destination in March, the evidence showing that it was no use to the plaintiffs unless it reached them by January. Held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to claim on the policy for a total loss of profits, but only for a loss on that portion which did not reach its destination.—K.B. Div. (Pickford, J.).—5th July 1907.

Attorney-General v. Mersey Railway Company.

Railway Company — Powers — Omnibus Traffic.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 136) reversed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Ashbourne, Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, and Lord Atkinson).—9th July 1907.

Eden v. North-Eastern Railway Company.

Railway—Compensation for Minerals—Railway Clauses Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. cap. 20, sect. 78).—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 148) reversed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, and Lord Atkinson).—9th July 1907.

Kleinwort, Sons & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co.

Payment — Repetition. — The appellants made advances to K on rubber purchased by him. K sold a parcel of rubber and directed the purchasers, the respondents, to pay the price to B, who had made similar advances to them.

The respondents, by mistake, paid to the appellants, who in good faith received it, and placed it to K's account with them. They subsequently allowed K to overdraw his account beyond an agreed sum. The jury in this case held, however, that they had not altered their position with regard to K to their disadvantage on account of this payment. Held that the appellants were bound to repay the amount to the respondents.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord James of Hereford, and Lord Atkinson).—16*th July* 1907.

Assicurazioni Generali de Trieste v. Empress Assurance Corporation Ltd.

Insurance—Marine.—The defendants insured certain shipments of lumber belonging to B. & Co., to whom they gave an open cover, under which B. & Co. were entitled to declare interests by a number of vessels, excluding the vessels of M. T. & Co. The defendants reinsured with the plaintiffs to the extent of one-half of their interests. The defendants paid certain losses under their insurance to B. & Co., including losses by two vessels belonging to M. T. & Co., and recovered the shares under their reinsurance with the plaintiffs. The defendants thereafter, on becoming aware of the facts, sued B. & Co. for damages on the ground of misrepresentations by which they were induced to pay on the losses by the vessels belonging to M. T. & Co., and recovered. This action was at the instance of the plaintiffs for repayment of the shares which they had paid of these losses. Held that they were entitled to recover, but that the defendants were entitled to deduct the costs of the former action against B. & Co., which they had been unable to recover from B. & Co. owing to their costs in that action being taxed as between party and party.—K.B. Div. (Pickford, J.).—16*th July* 1907.

Winans v. The King.

Revenue—Estate Duty.—Held that foreign bonds which were dealt with for money on the Stock Exchange and elsewhere were liable to estate duty when in this country at the date of death.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.).—16*th July* 1907.

Maritime Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Alianza Insurance Co. of Santander.

Insurance—Marine.—A policy of reinsurance was effected on a ship "whilst at port or ports, place or places in New Caledonia." A loss occurred while the ship was on her voyage to New Caledonia and was passing through the barrier reef of New Caledonia, distant about ten miles from the mainland.—Held that it was not covered by the policy of reinsurance.—K.B. Div. (Walton, J.).—17*th July* 1907.

Furniss v. Cambridge Daily News Ltd.

Slander — Privilege — Newspaper. — A newspaper published a report that the defendant had been convicted of an offence under the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act 1893 by having issued an invoice as to the quality of manure sold by him "which he knew to be false." The words quoted were not in the summons served on the plaintiff, who had not appeared and was convicted in absence. The words were not part of the charge, but were taken by the reporter from a copy of the charge-sheet which had been shown to him. They were not read out in Court.—Held that as they were not part of the proceedings in Court, the publication was not privileged.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Kennedy, L.J.).—18*th July* 1907.

Cooper v. Rose.

Revenue—Inhabited House Duty.—The appellant was owner of premises consisting of a dwelling house with other buildings, viz. loose boxes and other erections for the breeding and rearing of horses. The dwelling-house was occupied by his stud groom in virtue of his contract of service, and the appellant paid house duty in respect of the premises. The stud groom was paid a weekly wage, and was dismissable on a week's notice. An agreement was then entered into between the appellant and his stud groom by which the latter's wages were increased by a sum about equivalent to the rates, etc., effeiring to the dwelling-house, and he became tenant of the house, his tenancy being determinable on three months' notice. The agreement was found to be for the purpose of escaping the house duty. —Held that the rights of the parties being in fact regulated by the agreement, it was of no consequence that it was entered into for the purpose of escaping the duty, and that the appellant was not liable therefore.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.). —18*th July* 1907.

Attorney-General v. Sutcliffe.

Statute—Aliens Act 1905 (5 Edw. VII. cap. 13, sect. 4 (2).—An alien came to this country as a stowaway, his presence on board the ship not being known until the ship had sailed from a port to this country. On arrival he was prosecuted and sentenced under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 237, and an order for his expulsion was made under the Aliens Act 1905.—Held that the master of the ship in which he came was liable for the expenses of the Crown in reference to his deportation.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.)—19*th July* 1907.

Attorney-General v. Yorkshire (Woollen District) Electric Tramways Ltd.

Revenue — Excise. — Held that ordinary tramway cars used on tramway lines which ran along the public roads, and propelled by electricity on the overhead system, the lines being constructed under the Light Railways Act 1896, were not liable to excise duty as being within the definition of carriage in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.).—19*th July* 1907.

In re Bulawayo Market and Offices Co. Ltd.

Company—Powers.—Held that it was not ultra vires of a company to pass a special resolution that the company should have no directors and that the sole management should be entrusted to another limited company. — Chan. Div. (Warrington, J.).—23*rd July* 1907.

Philip v. Pennell.

Property—Letters.—Held that authority given by the subject of a biography to the writers to write his biography did not imply authority to publish letters written by him which might come into their possession. Held also that the possessors of letters might use them for the purpose of obtaining information to enable them to compile a biography of the writer of the letters, and so to portray his life and character, although they might not publish the letters.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—24*th July* 1907.

Tate v. Fullbrook.

Copyright — Dramatic Sketch.—Opinion that a dramatic sketch within the meaning of the Copyright Acts might exist, although it contained no words, but only an idea or plot plus the manual and physical actions.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore, J.)—25*th July* 1907.

Summers & Co. Ltd. v. Boyce and Kinmond & Co.

Master and Servant — Inducing Breach of Contract.—B. had been in the service of S. & Co. under a contract which provided that he should not at any time divulge or make known any of the trusts, secrets, accounts or dealings relating to their business. He left, and entered the service of K. & Co., to whom he communicated a list of S. & Co.'s customers in the district where he had travelled for them, and the terms on which they did business. He had also in his possession certain memorandum books in which were lists of the names of such customers and particulars of business done with them by S. & Co. Held that B. had committed a breach of his contract with S. & Co., that K. & Co. had induced the breach, and that both were liable to injunction, and for damages; also that the memorandum books must be delivered up to S. & Co.—Chan. Div. (Swinfen Eady, J.).—26*th July* 1907.

The "Charlotte."

Jurisdiction — Admiralty — Lis Alibi Pendens.—Held that the Court of Admiralty in England had jurisdiction to entertain an action against the owners of a vessel, at the instance of the cargo-owners, for damages in respect of a collision, although an action was proceeding in Norway, the country to which both ships belonged, at the instance of the master, who by Norwegian law was entitled to represent the interests of the cargo-owners.—P.D. and A. Div. (Bargrave Deane, J.).—27*th July* 1907.

Board of Trade v. Baxter.
The "Scarsdale."

Ship — Seaman — Wages.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIII. p. 164) affirmed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord James of Hereford, Lord Atkinson and Lord Collins).—29*th July* 1907.

Palace Shipping Co. v. Caine.

Ship—Seaman—Wages.—Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 159) affirmed.—House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord James of Hereford, Lord Robertson and Lord Atkinson).—29*th July* 1907.

The King v. The Governor of Brixton Prison. Ex parte Calberla.

Criminal Law—Extradition.—C was convicted in Germany of certain offences of an extraditable character, and was sentenced to imprisonment. During the running of the sentence he was transferred to a hospital on account of illness; and he was thereafter discharged because further imprisonment caused apprehension of imminent danger to his life. An order was subsequently made calling on him to enter on imprisonment in order to complete his sentence. Held that he was liable to extradition.—K.B. Div. (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Darling and Phillimore, JJ.).—30*th July* 1907.

The London General Investment Trust Ltd. v. The Russian Petroleum and Liquid Fuel Co. Ltd.

Company—Debentures.—A company issued debentures for £500,000, £100,000 of which were held by B. S. & Co. as security for a loan of £150,000. Part of the loan was paid up and another £500 was borrowed. The rest of the loan was then paid up. Held that when the loan in security of which the debentures were held was paid up the debentures issued in respect thereof were dead and could not be used as security for a new loan.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes and Kennedy, L.J.).—31*st July* 1907.

The Late WILLIAM FLETCHER, Esq.,

Writer to the Signet.

Much regret was felt in legal and other circles on the announcement of the death, from appendicitis, of Mr William Fletcher, Writer to the Signet, which occurred on Thursday, 7th November, at his country residence, Coul-na-coile, Kingussie. He had been married so recently as 12th October last, and had gone to Kingussie to spend his honeymoon.

Mr Fletcher was born on 12th June 1861 in Elgin, and was educated there. After serving an apprenticeship in the office of Messrs Forsyth & Stewart, Solicitors, Elgin, he came to Edinburgh in 1881 and entered the office of Messrs T. & R. B. Ranken, W.S. He was admitted a Writer to the Signet in 1887, and in 1888 was appointed Resident Secretary in Edinburgh of the City of Glasgow Life Assurance Company, a position which he held until December 1898. Returning to the more active pursuit of law, he in 1899 formed, along with Mr A. C. Baillie, the firm of Fletcher & Baillie, W.S., of which he was a partner at the time of his death.

Mr Fletcher was held in high esteem in his profession, while his shrewdness, resourcefulness, and business capacity, combined with great tact and urbanity, rendered him a much appreciated adviser by a wide circle of clients.

Mr Fletcher was greatly interested in Church and other religious work, and had for many years taken an active and leading part in St George's United Free Church, Edinburgh, of which he was an elder, and Clerk to its Deacons' Court. He had a great appreciation of Nature and everything artistic He was passionately fond and had a great knowledge of horticulture, and probably was seen at his best in his garden at Coul-na-coile. In private life he was much engaged in quiet and active benevolence and beneficence, and displayed a courteous, unselfish, and winning manner, which made him a prime favourite wherever he went and endeared him greatly to his many friends. Much sympathy is felt for Mrs Fletcher.

In consequence of the sitting of the Royal Commission on Registration of Title in Scotland, the Lord President was absent from the First Division on Thursday and Friday.

Lord Salvesen has within the last few days made in two cases an important suggestion for the simplification of procedure. In both cases the defenders, when the cases were in the Adjustment Roll, intimated that they intended to raise counter actions. Lord Salvesen suggested to counsel that it was useless to incur the expense and the delay necessitated by the raising of a counter action, and proposed that a minute should be signed and lodged in process in which the parties should consent to the question which would have been raised in the counter action being disposed of in the original process, and empowering the Court, should the judgment lead to that result, to grant decree for payment of a sum due to the defender. The first case in which the point arose was a count, reckoning and payment, where the defender alleged that on an accounting between the parties the balance was in his favour. The second was a shipping case, where the question was whether the pursuers' or the defenders' ship was at fault and therefore liable in damages for a collision. The suggestion made by Lord Salvesen and adopted by the parties is on the lines of the rule laid down in sect. 55 of Sched. I of the Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act 1907, which is to the following effect: "Where a defender pleads a counter claim it shall suffice that he state the same in his defences, and the Sheriff may thereafter deal with it as if it had been stated in a substantive action, and may grant decree for it in whole or in part, or for the difference between it and the claim sued on." The suggestion made by Lord Salvesen could, of course, be given effect to only of consent of parties. Any simplification of process which avoids delay and reduces the cost of litigations is in the interests of the profession as well as the public. Might the Judges of the Court of Session not be given, by Act of Sederunt, the same power in this matter as the Sheriffs now have?

The Royal Commission on Registration of Title met on Thursday and Friday in the Hall of the S.S.C. Library, Parliament House, for the purpose of receiving evidence, Lord Dunedin being Chairman. The other Commissioners present were Mr W. J. Dundas, W.S.; Mr Smith Clark, Keeper of the Register of Sasines; Mr Munro Ferguson, M.P.; Mr Brickdale, of the Land Registry, London; Sheriff Kennedy, and Mr John Prosser, W.S., with Mr Umpherston, advocate, as Secretary. This is the first occasion on which evidence has been taken by the Commission. The witnesses examined were Mr G. D. Ballingall, W.S., and Dr Murray, Glasgow, on behalf of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents in Scotland; Mr Lennox Sellar, of the Town Clerk's Office, Glasgow, on behalf of the Glasgow Corporation; Mr R. B. Shearer, on behalf of a Conference of Delegates of Town Councils and County Councils in Scotland; and Mr Thomas M. Stewart, writer, Glasgow, on behalf of the Glasgow Landlords Association. Dr Murray appeared also on behalf of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow. The next meeting of the Commission will be held in London on Monday 2nd December, when the evidence of some English witnesses will be taken.

Juridical Society of Edinburgh.—The annual meeting of the Juridical Society of Edinburgh was held on Wednesday evening in the Society's chambers, Charlotte Square. Office-bearers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:—President, Mr A. S. Pringle, advocate; Treasurer, Mr W. Cowan, W.S.; Librarian, Mr D. Chapel, advocate; Secretary, Mr W. Dunbar, advocate.

The King's Birthday Honour List.—The list of honours issued on the occasion of His Majesty's Birthday contains the names of very few members of the legal profession; and of the lawyers who are honoured, none are connected with Scotland. The knighthood conferred upon Mr Francis Beaufort Palmer, the well-known author of "Palmer's Company Precedents" and other books on Company Law, will be received with satisfaction by the profession. Mr Palmer, who was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1873, has a very large practice as a Company draughtsman, and has given a great deal of assistance to the Government in the matter of Company legislation Mr John Irving Courtenay, another of the new knights, is also a barrister, having been called in 1861. Knighthoods have also been conferred upon Mr Charles Moss, Chief Justice of Ontario, Mr Robert E. Matheson, Registrar-General for Ireland, and Mr Frank Crisp, a London solicitor. Mr W. E. Davidson, C.B., K.C., Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, who has been made a K.C.M.G., was called to the Bar by the Society of the Inner Temple in 1879.

The firm of J. M. & J. Watt & Boyd, solicitors, Winton Buildings, Ayr, of which Mr James Watt and Mr John Boyd were the sole partners, has been dissolved of mutual consent. Mr Watt will carry on practice at Wellington Chambers, Ayr, under the firm name of J. M. & J. Watt, and Mr Boyd will carry on practice at Winton Buildings, Ayr, in his own name.

The co-partnery of Fletcher & Baillie, W.S., having been dissolved by the death of Mr William Fletcher, W.S., on 7th inst., Mr Augustus C. Baillie has assumed Mr T. J. Carlyle Gifford, LL.B., W.S., as a partner, and the business will be carried on under the firm name of Baillie & Gifford, W.S. Mr Gifford has been trained in the office of Messrs W. & J. Cook, W.S.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Law of Stamp Duties on Written Instruments. By P. J. Hamilton Grierson, B.A. Oxon., Advocate, Solicitor for Scotland to the Board of Inland Revenue. New Edition, revised and in part rewritten. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 15*s. net.*

Mr Hamilton Grierson is the author of several legal works of practical utility, and the contributor of a number of important articles to the Encyclopædia of the Law of Scotland. His edition of Dickson on Evidence, his Index of Cases Commented On, and the first edition of his work on the Law of Stamp Duties, are all widely used in the profession. The new edition of the last mentioned work, issued nine years after the first edition, will receive a very cordial welcome. Mr Grierson's duties as Solicitor of Inland Revenue give him a very practical knowledge of the subject with which he is dealing, and he has not hesitated to state his own opinion on a number of points which have not come before the Court for judicial decision. The book commences with a general introduction dealing with the construction of Taxing Acts, general rules as to Stamp Duties, alteration of Instruments, and proceedings for recovery of Duties and Penalties. Then follows the Stamp Act of 1891, each section amply annotated. The notes contain an exhaustive citation of the numerous decisions on sections of the Act, the import of every case being sufficiently though concisely explained. The sections of later Acts, dealing with Stamps, including the Finance Act of 1907, are then dealt with, and there are a number of appendices setting forth the duties imposed by Acts other than Stamp Acts, special exemptions in statutes not otherwise relating to Stamp Duties, Stamp Acts prior to 1891, and other matters. The book is an excellent piece of work, and is equipped with a full and well-arranged index.

The Yearly Supreme Court Practice, 1908, being the Judicature Acts and Rules 1873 to 1907, and other Statutes and Orders relating to the Practice of the Supreme Court, with the Appellate Practice of the House of Lords. With Practical Notes by M. Muir Mackenzie, B.A., one of the Official Referees of the Supreme Court, Bencher of the Middle Temple; T. Willes Chitty, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, a Master of the Supreme Court; S. G. Lushington, M.A., B.C.L., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at Law; and John Charles Fox, a Master of the Supreme Court (Chancery Division), assisted by R. E. Ross, LL.B., of the Central Office, and Others. In Two Volumes. London: Butterworth & Co., 1908. Price 25*s.*

The practice of the English Courts is regulated by numerous statutes and by a voluminous code of Rules. The "Yearly Practice" dealing with these enactments is an invaluable book of reference for the practitioner. The number of decisions on questions arising under the Rules of the Supreme Court is enormous, and the amount of information contained in the present work cannot easily be overestimated. The index of cases alone occupies 200 pages. Care has been taken to eliminate references to such decisions as have been reversed or otherwise rendered obsolete, but every reported case of practical importance bearing on the present practice of the English Courts has been referred to in the notes. The first volume contains the Rules and Orders printed in large type at the top of each page, while the notes to each Rule are printed below in a smaller though perfectly clear and legible type. Catch words in heavy type direct the reader easily to the decisions on any particular word or phrase in the Order or Rule under discussion. This edition incorporates the Rules issued in August of this year, and notes the cases decided down to that month. Volume II. deals in the same manner with the various Acts of Parliament now known by the short title of the Judicature Acts, with the Arbitration Act and with a number of miscellaneous Acts. The Appendices to the Rules in the Supreme Court, containing forms of various kinds, are also given. There is an excellent Index, which for convenience is printed at the end of each volume, and extends to nearly three hundred pages. Exclusive of the Index and Table of Cases there are nearly two thousand pages in the two volumes. The very numerous notes have in the present edition been carefully revised and to a large extent rewritten, enlarged, and rearranged, and nothing has been left undone to make the book a complete and reliable guide to the lawyer practising in the Courts.

Colonial Laws and Courts, with a Sketch of the Legal Systems of the World and Tables of Conditions of Appeal to the Privy Council. Edited by Alexander Wood Renton, of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, Puisne Justice of the Supreme Court of Ceylon, formerly Judge of the Supreme Court of Mauritius, and George Grenville Phillimore, B.C.L., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd.; Stevens & Sons Ltd.; 1907. Price 15*s.*

This book, which is a reprint of the first volume of the new edition of Burge's "Commentaries on Colonial and Foreign Laws," has now been issued separately, as it is felt by the editors that it will appeal to a wider public than the remainder of that work. In this estimate the opinion of those responsible for its publication will be endorsed by every scientific student of law. The object of this volume is to describe generally the character of the different systems which underly the jurisprudence of the legal world, and their relations to the present laws of the British dominions. Such a comprehensive basis is necessary for any book which deals with the whole body of British colonial law, for the Empire has adopted and developed on its native lines the systems in vogue in each country where it has planted the Union Jack. Further, the work traces the outlines of the existing juridicial constitutions of these dominions, and also considers the position of those tribunals which have been established in lands not strictly British in the exercise of exterritorial jurisdiction or otherwise. It will thus be seen that the book is of interest both to the student of Comparative Jurisprudence and to the practitioner who seeks to discover the basis of the legal system in vogue in any particular colony. Many changes have occurred and much development has taken place since Mr Burge published his great work in 1838. India has been added to the Empire, South Africa has been developed, Canada and Australia have been federated, and immense strides have been made in the codification of law everywhere in the British dominions. The period which has elapsed has also witnessed a great development in the conception of the principles of Private International Law. The successive chapters of the book deal with the broad principles upon which the laws of the different colonies and dependencies now stand, and constitute not only a work interesting in itself, but indispensable as an introduction to the larger treatise of which it forms part. The tabulated statement appended, shewing the conditions of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, not only from the colonies, but from other places where powers and jurisdiction have been acquired by the Crown, whether by treaty, grant or usage, and regulated under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act or otherwise, is of immense practical utility.

The object of this book is to give an outline of the main principles of the Law of Evidence in England. This is done by selecting from the ordinary reports two or three of the leading cases on each branch of the subject. A short report is given of each selected case, eliminating points not applicable to the question of evidence decided, and stating the facts at a length adequate to make the grounds of the decision on evidence intelligible. The book does not contain sufficient detail to be of much use to the practitioner, nor is it the sort of outline of its subject which would appeal to the student preparing for examination. It is nevertheless an interesting contribution to legal literature. The cases are systematically arranged and have been selected with discrimination, and the origin and grounds of many now well-recognised principles of the law of evidence may be traced in its pages.

An Epitome of Real Property Law, for the Use of Students. By W. H. Hastings Kelke, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Fourth Edition. By the Author and Adam Partington. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1907. Price 6*s.*

The popularity and usefulness of this book is indicated by its having reached its fourth edition within fifteen years of its first publication. It contains a succinct statement of the general principles of English Real Property Law, and is specially designed for the purposes of students preparing for examination.

Report of the Twenty-ninth Annual Meeting of the American Bar Association, 1906. In Two Volumes. Philadelphia: Dando Printing and Publishing Company.

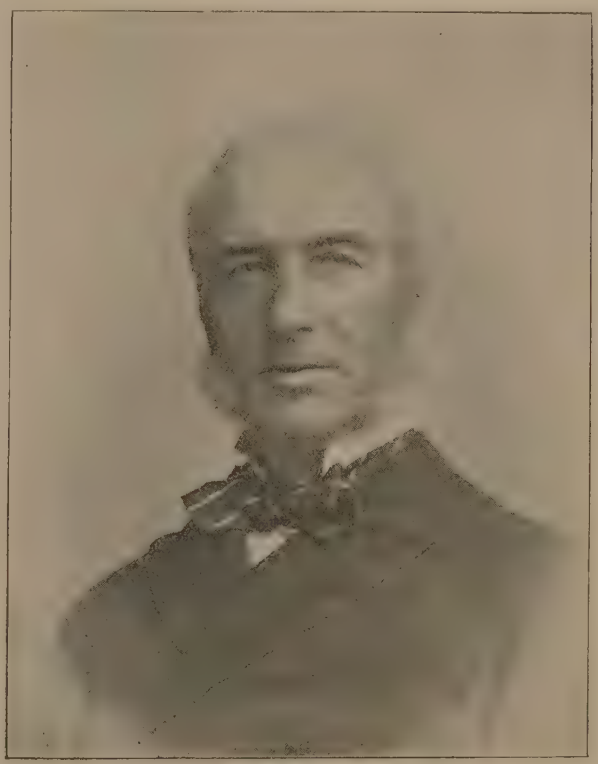
The American Bar Association continues to flourish. Its membership has increased, as has also the size of its Transactions, which are this year for the first time published in two volumes. The Association appoints a large number of Committees to consider a great variety of subjects, and the reports of these Committees, along with the discussions to which the reports give rise, are set forth at length in the transactions. Law Reform, Legal Education, Professional Ethics, Uniformity of Laws in the different States, Prison Discipline, Trusts, and the position of American Insurance Companies, are among the subjects of interest discussed. The address of the President contains a summary of noteworthy changes in State and Congressional Legislation during the year.

The Juridical Review. Vol. XIX. Part 3. October 1907. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons.

This part of the Juridical Review, which is now issued under the editorship of Mr John Chisholm, K.C., contains a number of articles of more than usual merit. The place of honour is given to a sketch of Lord Young, from the pen of Lord Guthrie, which will be read with great interest. Some of the obituary notices of the late judge did him scant justice, and omitted little that could be said by way of criticism. Lord Guthrie writes from the standpoint of a friend and admirer, but his estimate of Lord Young's work is discriminating, and eminently judicial in its tone. The article is illustrated by two portraits of Lord Young (in 1873 and in 1903) and by a reproduction of the well-known picture of "The Lord President's Breakfast in 1865," in which Lord Young appears as Solicitor-General. Sheriff Lees contributes an excellent article on the New Sheriff Courts Act; Mr Charteris deals with "The Second Peace Conference"; and there is a paper by Mr J. S. Mackay, advocate, in which he criticises, with much originality and ability, certain decisions on "Gifts of Liferent under Powers of Apportionment."

The Late JAMES AULDJO JAMIESON, Esq., Writer to the Signet.

Mr James Auldjo Jamieson, W.S., died somewhat suddenly at his London residence on 14th November at the age of seventy-five. Through failing health Mr Jamieson had been for some years partially, and for more than a year wholly, retired from active business. His death, therefore, causes no blank in the working world of the law. None the less is it a striking and sorrowful event to those who recal the great position which for many years he held in the profession.



More than fifty years ago two young Aberdonians, sons of a local doctor, came to Edinburgh to push their fortunes in the professional world. The elder brother, George, chose accounting, the younger, James, the solicitor branch of the legal profession. Both brothers soon attained to the foremost positions in their respective callings. A few years ago George suddenly passed away in the plenitude of his activity and influence as the head of the accounting profession in Scotland. By contrast the younger brother, after being for twenty years the real as well as the nominal head of the largest legal business in Scotland, has gradually slipped from public, or rather from professional (for he never was much in public) view, and his end disturbs no business arrangements, causes no vacancy in professional life. The contrast is typical of the men. George was constantly in the public eye, busy with politics, municipal affairs, church matters, economics, agriculture and other interests, assertive, and, when he thought it necessary, pugnacious. James, though not without his quiet interest in public affairs, took no part in public life, his voice was never heard upon the platform, he penned no letters to the papers. In business hours he was rarely out of his office; to the general public of Edinburgh he was unknown by sight. Many business men to whom his name was as familiar as that of Mr Balfour or Mr Asher, and who had engaged in much correspondence, negotiation, or litigation with his firm, had never, to their knowledge, seen him. His power and capacity were fully recognised, his influence was felt to be greater even than that of his less reticent brother; but, except to a very narrow circle of intimates, he remained to the professional world always a man of mystery behind the scenes.

Mr Jamieson's apprenticeship as a W.S. was served in the office of Messrs Dundas & Wilson, and there he gained that insight into the high finance of estate management upon a large scale which stood him in such good stead in after years and his skilful manipulation of which did so much to aggrandise the firm of Tods, Murray & Jamieson, which he joined in 1867. To that business he did not, as some suppose, bring the name of Jamieson. Another Jamieson had already given the firm that part of its now long-familiar name. When Mr Jamieson joined the firm its head was the late Mr T. G. Murray, father of the present Lord Justice-General, a man of business who, if he did not possess the more brilliant qualities of his distinguished son, was amply endowed with all the solid ones, and who for many years occupied the very foremost position in the Edinburgh professional world. Mr Murray, like Mr George Auldjo Jamieson, was a man of affairs with interests outside the law, and the combination between him and Mr James Jamieson, devoted solely to his profession, was an exceedingly powerful one. Mr Murray's prominent position in the public eye and his known resources inspired confidence, and whenever other interests drew him away, he knew that his assiduous partner was there to do the work as well as he could do it himself. Mr Murray had perhaps more ready shrewdness than Mr Jamieson, but Mr Jamieson had more business imagination. Mr Murray was somewhat slow of apprehension when a matter was new to him, but he had the instinct of ready resource. Mr Jamieson was nimble of apprehension, but not so quick of resource, though perhaps, in the end, he was quite as resourceful. Mr Murray was dexterous in handling a difficulty, Mr Jamieson far-seeing in planning a campaign. Mr Murray's personality attracted business, Mr Jamieson grasped it.

Mr Murray had been Crown Agent under the Conservative Government in 1868, and when the party returned to power in 1874 it was expected that he would resume that office, but he preferred to stand aside in favour of his junior partner, and Mr Jamieson was appointed. He held the office until 1880, and when his party returned to power for a few months in 1885–6 he was again appointed. When, after a brief spell of office, the Government of Mr Gladstone fell in the summer of 1886, Mr Jamieson declined to return to the Crown Office. Regular attendance there for a short time every forenoon and attendance at trials in the High Court he found to be irksome and to interfere too much with his own office work. All things considered, however, there are few men who would have let £1200 a year go by. In these days it was etiquette for the Crown Agent to appear at trials in what even then had long since ceased to be morning dress. Mr Jamieson was perhaps more in the public eye in this capacity than in any other. He sat in the Justiciary Court behind Crown Counsel through the Chantrelle and the City Bank trials.

Perhaps the most dramatic and successful episode in the professional career of Mr Jamieson was his overthrow of the late Mr Padwick. Under the control of the latter, the vast heritage of the House of Hamilton was rapidly slipping away. Mr Jamieson, whose firm were the family agents, and who was in the confidence of the late Duke's mother, Princess Marie of Baden, intervened with great courage and at great professional risk. The result, as is now well known, has been the restoration of the fortunes of the ducal house, whose affairs for twenty years remained mainly under Mr Jamieson's personal direction and control. To the same family he rendered signal service in the steps which were taken to secure the rights of Lady Mary Hamilton and her son, Prince Louis, when her marriage with the Prince of Monaco was annulled by the Pope.

With a staff so large as that of Messrs Tods, Murray & Jamieson it necessarily happens that a very large number of those engaged in legal work in Edinburgh and the provinces at one time or another passed through the office. All such have a keen recollection of Mr Jamieson's industry, power, and benignity. No office sent so many ex-pupils to the Bar, and the large process business made it an excellent school. Mr Jamieson himself, however, was content to learn what had taken place when his assistants returned from the Parliament House. Only on very rare occasions did he deem it necessary to put in a personal appearance there.

Mr Jamieson was the Agent of the Bank of Scotland, a Director of the Scottish Widows' Insurance Company, and also of the most successful of American Investment Companies; but beyond these his interests and his work lay entirely within the four walls of his own room. The legal equilibrium has shifted during the last thirty years. The decay of both the absolute and the relative value of country land, the vast development of our commercial system and the great increase in company work and company promotion, have driven those solicitors who take the leading place more out into the open. There are still doubtless men of weight who seldom leave their chambers, but they are not now popularly regarded as of so much account, because there are so many able and influential men accessible in the market-place. The quiet man behind the scenes will doubtless still long remain with us; but it is unlikely that any practising lawyer will ever again build up so great a reputation so unobtrusively as did Mr James Auldjo Jamieson. C. N. J.

Two Seven Judge cases have been heard this week, and occupied both Divisions on Tuesday and part of Wednesday. One of these (the action at the instance of the widow of the late Mr Black, M.P.) raised the question of the proper form of issue and the scope of the enquiry where defenders in an action of damages admit liability but plead that the damages claimed are excessive. Different views were taken on this subject by Lord Guthrie, whose interlocutor was under appeal before the Seven Judges, and by Lord Johnston, whose opinion in a case which has since been settled, was reported along with Black's case in our issue of 9th November. Black's case was taken to avizandum. Among the reports issued this week are several of more than usual interest and importance. These include two decisions of the Extra Division—one as to the Parliamentary franchise for lady graduates, and the other as to the liability of innkeepers—and a decision of the First Division in a petition for recal of arrestments, where the subject arrested was a ship in course of construction.

The portrait of the late Mr Stewart, Perth, is held over till next issue.

THE EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY COURT.

RESIGNATION OF LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.

At a meeting of the University Court held on Monday the following Minute was approved in regard to the resignation of Lord Stormonth-Darling of the office of Chancellor's Assessor.

"The University Court have with much regret received the intimation that Lord Stormonth-Darling has resigned the office of Chancellor's Assessor. The connection of Lord Stormonth-Darling with the University extends over a period of more than forty years. In 1864 he graduated as Master of Arts, and afterwards pursued his studies in the Faculty of Law. In 1887 he was appointed by the Marquis of Lothian Rector's Assessor on the University Court, and continued to hold that office under three subsequent Rectors. In 1888 he was elected to represent the University in conjunction with the University of St Andrews in the House of Commons. In the following year he took, as Solicitor-General, an active part along with Lord Advocate Robertson in carrying through the House of Commons the Universities (Scotland) Act of 1889. Lord Stormonth-Darling resigned his seat in Parliament on being raised to the Bench, and in 1895 the Senatus conferred on him the Degree of Doctor of Laws. In 1900 he was elected by the University Court a Curator of Patronage. In 1901 the Chancellor, Mr Arthur James Balfour, appointed him to be Chancellor's Assessor on the Court. As a member of the Court for about twenty years, Lord Stormonth-Darling has borne his full share in the administration of the affairs of the University, and the Court feel deeply the loss which they will sustain by the severance of his connection with them. They recognise with thankfulness the benefit reaped by the University from his experience in public life and in the conduct of affairs. In the multiform range of subjects, administrative, financial, and educational, which the Court have to consider and dispose of, they have greatly relied on Lord Stormonth-Darling's liberality of thought, soundness of judgment, and mastery of form; and they would state that the charm of his personality and the consideration which he gave to the opinions of his colleagues contributed in no small measure to the progress and dispatch of business. The Court would express the hope that Lord Stormonth-Darling will long continue to discharge the onerous duties associated with the Bench of which he is so valued a member."

Mr N. J. K. Cochran Patrick, LL.B., advocate, has been appointed by the Edinburgh University Court Examiner in Scots Law, Conveyancing and Forensic Medicine.

The firm of Traquair, Dickson & M'Laren has been dissolved as at 11th November 1907 by the retiral therefrom of Mr William Traquair, one of the partners. The business of the firm will be carried on by Mr William Traquair Dickson on his own account, under the old firm name of Traquair, Dickson & M'Laren.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Attorney-General v. Duke of Richmond.

Revenue—Estate Duty.—The late Duke of Richmond executed a disentail of certain estates in Scotland; and for that purpose it was necessary for him to get the consents of the two next heirs, who were the present Duke and his son. The interests of these heirs were accordingly valued and bonds given over the estates for the amounts, viz., £415,000 and £287,000. The present Duke and his son then assigned these bonds to trustees, who were directed, inter alia, to pay the annual interest to the present Duke. Bonds were from time to time granted by the late Duke to the present Duke for balances of interest due, and at the death of the former these amounted to £88,000. The late Duke subsequently executed a testamentary mortis causa deed by which the estates were entailed on practically the same series of heirs. It was found that all the documents were genuine instruments intended to have full operation, without any reservation of any kind, but that the motive which actuated the late Duke in taking the steps which he did was to diminish the estate duty payable at his death. Held that the incumbrances were created by the late Duke bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for his use or benefit, and that no estate duty was payable in respect of the sums contained therein.—K.B. Div. (Bray, J.).—30*th July* 1907.

Wilson v. Carnley.

Contract—Illegal—Public Policy.—Held that a promise to marry was not void on the ground of public policy, the promise being to marry after the death of the man's wife, who was then living, and it being known to the woman that the man was married at the time.—K.B. Div. (Lord Coleridge, Commissioner.).—31*st July* 1907.

Davis v. Phillips, Mills & Co.

Sale—Payment—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. cap. 71), sect. 4 (1).—The plaintiff raised this action of damages for non-delivery of goods which he alleged he had bought from the defendant and had paid for by cheque, the value of the goods being above £10. The defendants returned the plaintiff's cheque immediately on receipt, and denied that the contract had been completed. Held that the receipt of the cheque was not payment, and that the completion of the contract had not been proved.—K.B. Div. (Channell, J.).—15*th October* 1907.

Macbeth v. North and South Wales Bank.

Bill of Exchange—Cheque—Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. cap. 61), sect. 7 (3).—The plaintiff granted a cheque payable to T. A. Kerr or order, being induced to do so by the false and fraudulent representations of I and W, who told him that they had arranged to purchase 5000 shares in White's Carriage Co. from Kerr. The plaintiff's cheque was presented to the defendants with the endorsement of Kerr's name forged by W, and they paid the amount to W. The plaintiff received certificates for 5000 shares in the company, W having got the secretary to issue certificates which he had no right to issue; but whenever the plaintiff heard of the forged endorsement, he repudiated the transaction. T. A. Kerr was an existing person, but W and I had never agreed to purchase shares in the company from him. In an action against the defendants for the amount of the cheque, held that Kerr was not a fictitious or non-existing person in the sense of sect. 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—16*th October* 1907.

Craig v. Dowding.

Patent — Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. cap. 57), sect. 32.—The defendant wrote a letter to a customer of the plaintiff in which he said, "The article being sold and advertised by you is regarded as an infringement. We therefore request you to cease advertising and selling the articles in question." Held that this was a threat within the meaning of the above section; and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction unless the defendant brought a bona fide action for protection of her patent.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—16*th October* 1907.

Davis v. Mayor, etc. of Bromley.

Reparation—Negligence—Local Government.—Held that no action of damages would lie against a local authority for refusal to sanction a drainage plan, even although malice was averred, the local authority having a discretion to sanction or not.—Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, L.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Bigham, J.).—17*th October* 1907.

Company—Liquidation—Rectification of Register.—The holder of shares in a company, some time before the company went into liquidation, transferred his shares to another person. This was done in order to escape the liability on the shares. There was no contract of sale between the parties; there was no consideration; and the transferee looked to the transferor to indemnify him from any loss he might suffer. Held that the name of the transferor ought to be placed on the list of contributors.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.).—17*th October* 1907.

The "Aristocrat."

Ship—Collision.—Where a collision occurred and one ship had failed to give the signal required by the regulations to shew that she was altering her course, held that that ship must be found to have been in fault unless she could shew that the collision would have occurred although her signal had been given.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.)—22*nd October* 1907.

Greenwood v. Greenwood.

Master and Servant—Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), sect. 1 (1).—The plaintiff was injured by a machine while in the employment of the defendant. In an action under the Employers' Liability Act 1880, the County Court judge found that the machine was properly made and not insufficiently fenced, but that it was a dangerous machine to be worked by an inexperienced person like the plaintiff, and that the defendant ought to have instructed him in its use and did not do so. The County Court judge therefore gave decree for the plaintiff. Held that the fault found did not constitute a defect in the machinery in the sense of the Act.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore and Walton, JJ.). — 25*th October* 1907.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (4).—An action under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 was brought in the County Court and decree was given for the plaintiff. On appeal to the Divisional Court this was reversed and the defendant found not liable. On application for assessment of compensation, held that the County Court was the Court in which the compensation should be assessed.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore and Walton, JJ.).—25*th October* 1907.

The Late JOHN A. STEWART, Esq., Solicitor, Perth.

In legal and political circles much regret has been caused by the announcement of the death of Mr John A. Stewart, solicitor, Perth, which occurred on 9th inst., after an operation. For some time past the deceased had not been in very robust health, but his indisposition was not considered serious, and his death came as a great shock to all those who knew him.

Mr Stewart was a native of Rannoch, and was born in the year 1864. He was educated at the village school and at Sharp's Institution, Perth. On leaving school he entered the office of the late Mr John Stewart, solicitor, Perth, with whom he served his apprenticeship. Thereafter he proceeded to Edinburgh to attend the law classes, and was for some years in the office of the late Mr Gregor M'Gregor, S.S.C. In 1888 he qualified as a law agent, and soon afterwards returned to Perth and was assumed as a partner by his former master. In 1891 the partnership was dissolved and Mr Stewart started business on his own account. He soon acquired a large number of clients, and at the time of his death, in addition to a large conveyancing and trust business, he had one of the best practices in Perth Sheriff Court. By his industry and ability he attained a very high position as a pleader, and by his genial and courteous manner he won the esteem and affection of his professional brethren. Mr Stewart was also engaged in several important litigations in the Court of Session, including the Dunkeld right-of-way case, in which he acted as agent for the public. On questions arising under the Poor Law he was recognised as an authority, and he held the appointment of Law Agent to several Parish Councils. For a number of years he was Honorary Secretary to the Society of Solicitors for the City and County of Perth.

In political circles Mr Stewart was very well known. He was a keen Liberal and took an active interest in political work, in connection with which he held various appointments. He was Secretary of the Perth and West Perthshire Liberal Associations, and also Liberal Agent for the city of Perth and for the Western Division of Perthshire.

An enthusiastic Highlander and a keen Gaelic scholar, Mr Stewart took a great interest in Celtic folklore, and devoted much of his spare time to the preservation of the Gaelic language. For many years he was Chief of the Perth Gaelic Society—the success of which was largely due to his enthusiasm. Of a bright and cheerful disposition, he was much respected and liked by all classes of the community, and his early death will be much mourned by a wide circle of friends. He is survived by a widow and two young children.

The case of Barclay Curle & Co. v. Sir James Laing & Sons, which was reported in our issue of last week, was heard and decided in the House of Lords on Monday. The House, after hearing an argument confined to the question whether the property in the ships had passed, dismissed the appeal. The rapidity of the proceedings in this case constitutes a record. The arrestment which gave rise to the petition was executed on 29th October; the petition for recal was presented on 1st November; answers were lodged on 4th November: the case was transferred from the Single Bills to the Summar Roll in the First Division on 5th November, and a hearing occupying the whole of that day took place. Judgment was given by the First Division on 7th November, a petition of appeal was presented within a week; cases were lodged with great expedition, and the hearing before the House of Lords took place and the judgment of the House was given on the 25th November. Though there was in this case, which was initiated by an Inner House petition, no preliminary Outer House procedure, it is certainly very remarkable that it should have been possible to obtain the judgment of the ultimate Court of Appeal within a month of the cause of action arising.

Appointment of Junior Counsel for the Treasury.—The Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury have appointed Mr Robert Munro to be Standing Junior Counsel of the Inland Revenue Department of Scotland in room of Mr A. J. Young, appointed Sheriff-Substitute at Aberdeen. A portrait and biographical notice of Mr Munro will appear in an early issue of the "Scots Law Times."

Society of Advocates in Aberdeen.—The annual meeting of this Society was held on 26th inst., Mr James Ross, President, in the chair. Mr Ross was re-elected President, and Mr F. T. Garden, Treasurer, for the ensuing year.

The Late Mr Justice Kekewich.

The death took place, after a very short illness, on Friday, 22nd inst., of the Right Honourable Sir Arthur Kekewich, Senior Judge of the Chancery Division. He had been in Court till within a few days of his death, and it was not generally known that he was seriously ill. Sir Arthur Kekewich, who was in his seventy-sixth year, was the second son of Mr Samuel Trehawke Kekewich of Peamore, Exeter, who was for many years M.P. for Exeter and South Devon. He was educated at Eton, and thence went to Balliol, where he obtained a second class in Mathematical Moderations in the first list issued in 1852, a first class in the Final Classical Schools at Michaelmas 1853, together with Lord Goschen, and a second class in Mathematics at Easter 1854. In the latter year he was elected to a Fellowship at Exeter, following by three years precisely in the footsteps of the late Lord Justice Chitty. In 1858 he was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, and in the same year he was married to a daughter of Mr James William Freshfield, the well-known solicitor. Thus success was assured at the outset, and in the course of a few years he became standing Junior Counsel to the Bank of England, his leader in that capacity being the late Lord-Justice Cotton. His quickness of apprehension and a certain fluency of speech were an advantage to him as a stuff gownsman, but in later years rather a source of weakness. For many years he enjoyed one of the largest junior practices at the Equity Bar. In May 1877 he became a Q.C. He was a West Country Tory of an old Tory stock, and he fought two elections, though he was each time at the bottom of the poll. Mr Justice Kekewich was a good lawyer and a man of great ability, though he never ranked as a great judge. He was too apt to arrive at a conclusion before hearing both sides of a question. His opinions, especially on facts, were occasionally prolix, and he was not unfrequently reversed in the Court of Appeal. But he was a careful, courteous judge, and was personally held in high esteem by the profession. He had been a Judge of the Chancery Division since 1886, and was created a Privy Councillor last year.

On Saturday morning in the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls, in presence of the whole of the Judges of the Chancery Division and a large Bar, said they all recognised Mr Justice Kekewich's industry and his devotion to the public service, and they all regretted his untimely death. Mr Eve, K.C., on behalf of the Bar, generally associated himself with the Master of the Rolls' remarks.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Law affecting Foreigners in Egypt as the Result of the Capitulations, with an Account of their Origin and Development. By James Harry Scott, B.A., LL.M., Advocate, Lecturer at the Khedivial School of Law, Cairo. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 15s. net.

"The Capitulations," under which foreigners alone in former times acquired any rights at all in the Near East, are defined in Mr Scott's excellent work as "grants of special privileges extended to foreign merchants while trading in the territories of the granter." They were granted to stranger nations, not only under the Mahommedan Sultans, but also by the Byzantine Emperors and again under the short-lived Frankish Kingdom of Jerusalem. Mr Scott in this book, which is so well written that it gives real pleasure to the reader, and which is of no mean historic value, traces the growth of the Capitulations in the East, and especially in Egypt, which naturally attracted Western trade until its commerce was destroyed by the opening of the Cape route. The author gives an interesting account of the trade of Egypt from the twelfth to the sixteenth century. A Capitulation was granted by the Khalif of Egypt in 1154 (and confirmed in 1173 by Saladin) to the Republic of Pisa, and another was given to the State of Florence in 1422. After the commencement of the Ottoman Empire the Capitulations became much more political than the former commercial protections, and by 1580 France had obtained commercial supremacy over all other foreigners. Master Anthony Jenkinson was the first known Englishman to obtain a "privilege" from the "Sultan Solymann the Great Turke" in 1553, and, in spite of French opposition, the first Capitulation was granted to England in 1580. The usual favours in these early grants of privilege were: Safety, a special quarter or "Funduk," that the foreigners should be judged by their consul according to the law of their country, that they should succeed to property by their own laws, and to have exemptions from taxes; and these favours they bought from time to time as "Amurath to Amurath" succeeded. It is interesting to notice, however, that the Christian King of Sicily, Frederick II., granted, like the Eastern rulers, permission in 1230 to a Saracen prince to appoint a Mohammedan Consul in Corsica.

The original Turkish and Egyptian Capitulations have been modified by the reforms in the Turkish Empire known as the "Tanzimat." These included mixed courts, codes promulgated, laws of nationality being defined, and more recognition being granted to non-Western communities and religions. In 1841 the firman of the Sultan gave the Pashalik of Egypt to Mohammed Aly with the consent of the Powers, and succeeding firmans make it clear that Egypt is still a province of Turkey, though it "has acquired a degree of autonomy which approaches independence." With this quasi-dependence came the influx of foreigners, the interference of the British in 1883, and their continued occupation and its legal necessities. The chief privileges secured to foreigners in Egypt under the old Capitulations are summarised by Mr Scott into six heads: (1) Residence and commerce; (2) religious toleration; (3) inviolability of domicile; (4) exemption from taxes, other than Custom dues; (5) right to apply national law to successions; (6) immunity from local jurisdiction and laws. The last of these is naturally very much the most important, but the history of each is fully discussed. Four of the first privileges are so much superseded by other enactments or customs that the Capitulations are almost useless, but inviolability of domicile still rests upon them. The privileges of jurisdiction and legislation and the complicated history of the consular courts is narrated at length. From the favours shown from 1841 to 1867, the position of foreigners in Egypt was one of almost absolute immunity from the local law, but in 1876 this evil was considerably modified when a mixed court was created. The difficulties with regard to legislation were not then at an end, for confusion reigned until mixed codes were hastily drafted and approved by the Powers. The difficulties of these—for deciding cases arising between foreigners and natives, including the thorny cases of marriage, and between foreigners of different nations—can be imagined; and we are glad that the mixed blend of French and Moslem rules still gives the judge power to refer to the "droit naturel" or to the rules of equity where the code is either "silent or obscure." Mr Scott describes the changes in Egyptian legislation which have taken place since then, and ends with an enquiry into the direction in which further changes will move. That the Capitulations have almost served their time seems from this excellent account likely enough, but we agree with the author that they cannot be allowed to vanish until a sufficient legal guarantee for the rights of foreigners in Egypt has fully taken their place.

A Commentary on the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906. By Francis A. Umpherston, M.A., Advocate, Author of the "Law of Master and Servant"; with Comparative Tables of the Workmen's Compensation Acts 1897, 1900, and 1906, and Acts of Sederunt, arranged by J. Hossell Henderson, M.A., LL.B., Advocate. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 12*s. net.*

No Act of Parliament has given rise to a greater number of legal controversies than the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897. Almost every clause in that Act contained expressions susceptible of different construction, and diverse views were taken by various Courts on a large number of the questions which arose. The Act of last year gets rid of a number of points which gave rise to difficulties under the earlier statute, and happily, therefore, many of the decisions under the 1897 Act are rendered obsolete. But, on the other hand, the new Act re-enacts many of the old rules and makes use of language of the old Act, the meaning of which has in course of time been conclusively interpreted by the Courts of Law. Mr Umpherston in his Commentary has of course discarded all cases which are no longer of use. But the number of surviving authorities is still very large. The notes which are appended to each section of the new Act contain references to and quotations from the judgments in all the cases which discuss language or enactments either repeated or modified in the new Act. What is "accident"? What is meant by "arising out of and in the course of"? What is "serious and wilful misconduct"? What is covered by "on, or in, or about"? What are "average weekly earnings"? These are all questions—but by no means all the questions—on which reference may still be usefully made to the old decisions. Mr Umpherston's treatment of the rules laid down in the decided cases will be found to be concise, lucid, and masterly, and his Commentary on the Act will be largely used and much appreciated by both branches of the profession. He tells us that it has not been his object either to suggest puzzles or to answer them. But wherever any question has been authoritatively dealt with by the Courts, either here or in England, the decision will be found noted in the appropriate places in the book.

Mr Hossell Henderson has rendered excellent service in the preparation of the Comparative Tables of the Acts and Acts of Sederunt. The corresponding sections of the 1897 Act and the 1906 Act are printed on opposite pages. In the old Act those portions which are omitted from the Act of 1906 are printed in italics, and in the print of the Act of 1906 the portions that are new are distinguished in the same way. The same treatment is applied to the two Acts of Sederunt. The various Statutory Rules and Orders which have been issued under the Act of 1906 are printed in Part IV. of the book. There is a well-arranged index. It is no small ground for satisfaction that on this Act, which applies to the United Kingdom, no Scots lawyer need consult an English treatise, but that all may rely on finding everything of use on the subject in a Scots Text Book.

An Epitome of the Law affecting Marine Insurance. By Lawrence Duckworth, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: Effingham Wilson, 1907. Price 3*s.* 6*d. net.*

The first edition of this book was published six years ago, but the passing of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 has made it necessary to bring the treatise up to date. The law affecting this class of contract is expounded with care and accuracy, and the decisions are clearly explained. A new chapter has been added dealing with cases decided since the former edition. The Act of 1906, which codifies the law relating to the subject, is printed as an Appendix. There is also a clear and full index. The book may be recommended as of use not only to lawyers, but to all whose business brings them into touch with this branch of mercantile law.

The Law and Practice of Divorce. By G. L. Hardy, of the Inner Temple and South-Eastern Circuit, Barrister-at-Law. London: Effingham Wilson, 1907. Price 5*s. net.*

This book is written to supply "a succinct inexpensive text-book on the Laws and Practice in Divorce, suitable for use by students and in the offices of solicitors." The object of the writer has, we think, been fully accomplished. The work is divided into two sections. The first deals with the law of matrimonial causes, and indicates shortly the grounds on which divorce or separation can be obtained in England, and also what evidence is admissible and what is required. The second part deals with the practice in an eminently practical way, and the appendices contain statutes, rules, and various forms. There is an extensive citation of authority, and the book will be found to be a useful and trustworthy guide to the subject.

The Law of Married Women's Contracts. By M. R. Emanuel, M.A., B.C.L., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworth & Co., 1907. Price 7*s.* 6*d.*

Interest in the subject discussed in this treatise has been increased by the arguments in the various Courts, ending in the House of Lords, in the case of Paquin v. Beauclerk, decided last year. Difficult questions frequently arise as to whether a wife is acting without the authority of her husband and therefore does not bind him by the contract she has made, or whether a wife is acting as agent for her husband and is accordingly not herself bound. There have been numerous decisions as to what are "necessaries," and there is much law both on the liability of the husband and on that of the wife. Mr Emanuel has collected all the English authorities on the subject of Married Women's Contracts—and they are very numerous—and lays down a series of general principles and rules set out as much as possible in the actual words of the judges. The book is very complete, and is well written and well arranged. The English Married Women's Property Acts are printed in an Appendix.

Tebbs' A.B.C. County Court Practice. By Herbert L. Tebbs, of Gray's Inn and the North-Eastern Circuit, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworth & Co., 1907. Price 10*s.*

This is a concise guide to the practice of the County Courts in England. It consists of, first, a digest in which each subject is dealt with in alphabetical order, and second, an appendix containing the full text of the County Courts Acts and Rules. Information on any point of practice, and on any of the subjects, which are arranged under well-selected headings in the Digest, can be obtained with great facility in the book. No pains have been spared to ensure completeness and accuracy.

Waterston's Edinburgh Diaries for 1908.

Messrs George Waterston & Sons have now issued a very large variety of diaries for next year. One or other of the many forms in which the diaries are produced will be found to suit the tastes and requirements of every class. The needs of the legal profession are amply attended to. The Scots Law Diary, in pocket form, is replete with information useful to the practitioner, while his needs for his office and desk are catered for in the various editions of the "Accountants' and Solicitors' Diary." Tablet diaries, diaries combined with blotting pads, and diaries encased in pocket books, may also be obtained. The calendars, postal rates, lists of public officers, and many miscellaneous items of official information prefixed to the diaries, render them of exceptional utility.

WILLIAM THOMSON, Esq., Advocate.

Mr William Thomson, whose portrait we publish this week, was recently appointed an Advocate-Depute in succession to Mr Edwin Adam, now Principal Clerk of Session.

Mr Thomson, who is a son of the late Bailie Thomson, merchant, Dundee, was born there forty-two years ago. He was educated at the Dundee High School and at the Universities of Edinburgh and Paris. In the former he graduated as Master of Arts in 1886, and as Bachelor of Laws in 1889. His career in the Law Faculty was one of great distinction. He took his degree with honours, and was first prizeman in Scots Law, Criminal Law, Conveyancing, and Medical Jurisprudence. In Civil Law he obtained the fourth place. The Dickson Travelling Fellowship was awarded to him in 1890, and in that year he studied in the University of Paris. He afterwards acted as Assistant to the Professors of Scots Law and Conveyancing in Edinburgh.

Mr Thomson was the junior of the seventeen gentlemen who were admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in the year 1890, and as no less than twenty-three admissions had taken place in 1889, he commenced his professional career among very many competitors. But he quickly became known in the Parliament House. Hard-headed, painstaking, resourceful and cautious, he has made a reputation both as a jury pleader and in the Divisions, and he has for many years enjoyed a very large junior practice. He holds retainers for several County, Parish and Town Councils, and, till he accepted his new office, he often appeared for the accused in trials for murder and other serious crimes.

Like his immediate senior among the Deputes —Mr A. M. Anderson—Mr Thomson was a candidate for Parliamentary honours at the recent General Election. He contested the Wick Burghs, and, against a powerful opponent, came within measurable distance of winning the seat for his party. He has done much other political work, and is an effective platform speaker.

Mr Thomson devotes his leisure hours to golf, and on the links of Carnoustie and Barnton he is known as a useful player.

The Lord President has been in London part of this week presiding over a three days' sitting of the Royal Commission on Registration of Title in Scotland. A number of witnesses were examined. The other Judges of the First Division have been sitting as a Court of Justiciary, and a long roll of cases has been heard. On Thursday a case was debated before a Full Bench consisting of the eight Judges of the Inner House. After sitting for three weeks in the Justiciary Court, the Second Division has returned to its own Court-room. It was found that the noise made by the builders was heard quite as distinctly in the Justiciary Court-room as in the Second Division, and the ventilation in the Justiciary Court is far from satisfactory.—During the absence of the Second Division from their Court-room it was occupied almost every day by one or other of the Lords Ordinary.

Court of Session—Christmas Recess.—The Lords have resolved to adjourn the Court from Saturday the 21st day of December next to Saturday the 4th day of January 1908 inclusive, and have appointed Tuesday the 31st day of December to be box-day in the recess. The sittings of the First and Second Divisions for the trial of civil causes by jury, in the ensuing Christmas recess, will commence on Monday the 23rd day of December next, at 10 A.M.

The Governor of the State of Texas has appointed Mr Chilton L. Addison Smith, W.S., Edinburgh, a Commissioner for that State in Scotland.

Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts.—At a stated general meeting of the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts of Scotland, held on the 5th inst., the following appointments were made for the ensuing year:—Reporter on the probabilis causa of Applicants for Admission to Poor's Roll, Mr Thomas J. Cochrane; Agents for Poor in Civil Causes, Messrs James More, Dall, and Peter Weir; Agents for Poor in Criminal Causes, Messrs Robert Gray, M.A., LL.B., and John M'Clure Brodie, B.L.; Commissioners to adjust the rate of interest on heritable securities, Messrs Charles Ritchie and R. Addison Smith; representative to the Board of Management of the Royal Infirmary in terms of the Act 33 & 34 Vict. cap. 48, Mr A. Scott Ireland. Mr Robert Miller, M.A., LL.B., was admitted a member of the Society.

THE JURIDICAL RESULTS OF THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

By T. Baty, D.C.L., LL.D., Barrister-at-Law, one of the Hon. General Secretaries of the International Law Association.

Although the wide-reaching results which were hoped for in various quarters have not been secured by the Peace Conference which separated last October, its deliberations have not been altogether unfruitful. In this it resembles the Conference—now belonging to ancient history—which the Emperor Alexander convened at Brussels in 1874. From that Conference, which met, like the present, under the shadow of a great war recently concluded, much was hoped. It was to inaugurate an era of universal humanity, if not of universal peace. All it effected was to adopt a convention about lawful combatants, and to prohibit certain savage methods of warfare and the use of explosive bullets. But no one denies that this was useful work.

In such a restricted sphere the activity of the Hague diplomatists has been commendable. Their First Committee, which was concerned with Arbitration, has elaborated two new tribunals, and (a more valuable work) has regularised and cleared up the procedure of those Inquiry Commissions which proved so useful in the Dogger Bank incident. The Second Committee (on Land Warfare) has done something to supplement, though not much to secure the enforcement of, the rules dealing with the anomalous situation of territory in hostile occupation. The Third Committee (Sea Warfare), after much difficulty, adopted a series of rules dealing with mines as a means of warfare, and agreed upon a set of rules regulating (very inconclusively) the vexed question of the quantum of assistance and shelter which may be given to a belligerent's war-vessels by a neutral. Lastly, the Fourth Committee (also on Naval Warfare) dealt in a tentative fashion with the position of merchantmen and their crews.

The work of the First Committee does not call for much comment from the juridical point of view. It was attempted to classify disputes according as they present a purely legal character or involve wider considerations, and to refer the former class to obligatory arbitration. As was pointed out by the German plenipotentiary, no such classification can be made, for it is impossible to say that the most commonplace topic may not occasionally raise moral, and therefore political, issues, which cannot be settled by a legal decision. The few questions on which a few nations did agree as proper for obligatory arbitation were utterly insignificant, and one can hardly imagine their ever leading to war: only an empty recommendation resulted from the discussion. One of the new Courts, to which reference has been made, was erected as the result of Russian and American proposals, which apparently aimed at the subjection of the nations to the decrees of a select body of jurists. The ostensible reason assigned for the erection of a new Court when there already existed an old one, was that the old one had no cohesion, the tribunal being selected for each case ad hoc; consequently it had no continuity and no esprit de corps. But the entire Conference revolted against giving unlimited supremacy to a permanent bench of five lawyers, and the question then resolved itself into the amount of representation which each nation was to have in a Court of twenty or thirty. It was eventually left open, and it is permissible to believe that the old tribunal and not this cumbrous Areopagus, if ever it is formed, will remain the effective body. As to the Drago doctrine, the Conference adopted a resolution which virtually makes arbitration obligatory in the case of money claims arising ex contractu. Belgium, Roumania and Switzerland, with Sweden and Venezuela (an odd companion for Belgium in this connection), declined to accept this as sufficient, feeling that it gave an implied sanction to the employment of force for a money-debt when once converted into a judgment-debt.

The First Committee is also responsible for what may variously be regarded as the most brilliant or the most fatuous work of the Conference—the creation of an International Prize Court. Brazil and Turkey flatly declined to have anything to do with it. The notion of making a nation's representation on the Court a function of three variables, one of which is its naval strength, is a curious notion for a Peace Conference which has made the diminution of naval expenses a subject of solemn exhortation. The Conference quietly puts a substantial premium with one hand into the pockets of the nations at which it points the finger of warning with the other. Professor Holland and others have called attention to the serious danger of entrusting the determination of the many open questions of prize law to a Court which is not unlikely to be influenced by doctrinaire speculations. And there is certain to be a powerful agitation against the ratification of such a convention by Great Britain.

Of the Second Committee's (land warfare) proposals, the only important ones which survived were those preventing the requisitioning of neutrals' rolling stock (subject to an Argentine reserve), and defining the conditions under which a neutral subject can be properly treated, on account of his pronounced hostility, as a belligerent. The latter provides that he must not be worse treated than a true belligerent, and thereby seems to abrogate the old rule under which neutrals accepting letters of marque were harshly regarded. In not defining what are "acts of hostility" the article opens a wide door to abuses. The Haytian delegate pertinently enquired, would a neutral journalist become "hostile" if he violently attacked the belligerent in the press? The provision of supplies to a belligerent is actually made a hostile act, and thus every contrabandist may in future be an enemy!

The Fourth Committee accomplished very little. On the broad questions of neutrality, which were its main occupation, it did nothing. The British proposal to abolish contraband, though widely accepted (among others, by Austria), was not adopted. It was urged by Lord Reay in a speech of singular clearness and force. A meeting of its supporters was subsequently convened, at which the principle was rather abruptly propounded for definite acceptance by those present. It is difficult not to agree with the criticism that this step was a "frontal attack," which rather tended to retard than to forward the eventual adoption of the principle. In minor matters, this Committee set its seal of approval on the exemption of fishing-boats and scientific expeditions from capture, and secured the proper authorisation of converted mercantile cruisers. And it takes one long step in advance, in making the crews of merchantmen no longer liable to be made prisoners. The crews of warships are now sufficiently specialised to make this a safe course. The belligerent is further fortified by being allowed to take the parole of the men liberated. As to the possibility of commissioning vessels abroad or at sea, nothing could be settled. The Committee approved, without enforcing, the usual concession of liberty to hostile merchant vessels to depart within a limited time, and the principle that ships at sea when war breaks out should be allowed to reach port in safety.

In the Third Committee irreconcilable views displayed themselves on almost every controverted subject. On that of the conditions under which a belligerent warship can be admitted to asylum and hospitality in a neutral port the Conference came to the lame conclusion to adopt the twenty-four hours rule, provided that each nation may legislate for the matter as suits itself. This course of appearing to lay down a rule, whilst in reality leaving matters where they were, is eminently characteristic of the whole proceedings. The convention on this point remains unsigned by Great Britain. It is inaccurate to say that this Committee came to no conclusion on the subject of floating mines. Its conclusions were: (1) To prohibit floating mines which do not automatically become harmless in one hour; (2) to prohibit moored contact mines which do not become harmless when they break away from their moorings; (3) to prohibit the use of torpedoes which do not become harmless when they have run their course; (4) to prohibit the employment of mines for the obstruction of commerce; (5) to enforce the duty of warning neutrals against moored contact mines ("as far as military exigencies permit"—which may mean anything), and of rendering them harmless ("as far as possible") after a limited time: particularly after the end of a war. What was not effected was the eminently proper prohibition of laying mines at all in the high seas. And it should be remarked that a nation which does not know how to make its mines innocuous is thereby expressly released from the obligation to do so, and is virtually absolved from the restrictions laid down. So that here again the Conference, in adopting the proposals of the Committee, does very much less than it seems to do at first sight.

We should add that the bringing of prizes into neutral ports (usually considered improper) was seriously, and with good reason, considered by the Third Committee as a matter which might fairly be legalised. The recent extraordinary claim of Russia to destroy neutral prizes—a thing hitherto unheard of—makes it well worth considering the advisability of relaxing the strictness of neutral duty in this respect. If a country cannot take her prizes into a neutral port, she will sink them—that is, if she is at liberty to do so; and the Conference was inclined to say she might.

Here we have its very worst and most dangerous feature. The Conference has been the occasion of Great Britain's taking part in the discussion, as of open questions, of matters which she ought never for a moment to have admitted as proper subjects of discussion at all. If we really mean to contend that our neutral passenger ships and cargo ships are never, under any circumstances, to be sent to the bottom by a belligerent cruiser for its own convenience, it is fatal to discuss the matter as one we are not sure of. And so with regard to other vital questions of maritime law. It is impossible to doubt that by consenting to discuss our position as one with regard to which we stand open to conviction, we have seriously, and perhaps irreparably, impaired it.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Shepheard v. Bray.

Company — Director — Liability.—Case reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 64, settled after appeal, the action being dismissed, and the order of the Court below reversed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—21*st October* 1907.

Newman v. A. & S. Gatti.

Contract — Construction — Theatrical Artiste.—A contract was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, under which the plaintiff was engaged in the defendants' theatre for the run of a certain piece to understudy the principal actress. Held, on the evidence, that the plaintiff was not entitled to take the part of the principal actress in the latter's absence, but was only bound to do so if requested. —Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, L.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Bigham, J.).—22*nd October* 1907.

James v. The Institute of Chartered Accountants.

Club—Expulsion of Member.—The plaintiff was a member of the defendant society, one of whose rules provided that if a member did not pay his annual subscription within six months from the time when it was due he would be liable to be excluded from membership of the society by a resolution of the committee of the society, the member having first had an opportunity of being heard. The plaintiff forgot to pay his subscription when it was due, and five notices were sent to him by post, including notice that a meeting of committee was about to be held at which a resolution dealing with his membership would be considered. These notices were not received by the plaintiff, owing to the fact that he had changed his address and had not intimated his new address to the society, and the notices were therefore returned to the defendants through the dead letter office. Held that the rule as to the member to be excluded having an opportunity of being heard had been complied with, and that the plaintiff's exclusion from the society was in accordance with the rules. — Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—29*th October* 1907.

Attorney-General v. Mayor, etc. of Brighton.

Statute—Shop Hours Act 1904 (4 Edw. VII. cap. 31), sect. 1.—When a local authority had completed their part in making a closing order under the above Act, and the order had been sent to the Home Office for approval and confirmation, held that an action for injunction against the local authority proceeding with the order and expending the ratepayers' money in so doing was incompetent. Opinion that an order for closing hairdressers' shops for an afternoon on one day in the week without regulating the hours of closing on other days was not ultra vires or unreasonable.—Chan. Div. (Joyce, J.).—31*st October* 1907.

In re Orlebar. Wynter v. Orlebar.

Revenue—Estate Duty.—Held that where a power of appointment was exercised in a will the estate duty, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, was payable out of the general personal estate and not out of the appointed fund.—Chan. Div. (Neville, J.).—2*nd November* 1907.

United States Shipping Co. v. Empress Assurance Corporation.

Insurance—Marine.—Decision of Channell, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 136) affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—4*th November* 1907.

Dibdin v. Skirrow.

Ferry—Extent of Right—Interference. —Decision of Neville, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 179) affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—5*th November* 1907.

In re Dover Coalfield Extension Ltd.

Company — Director — Remuneration— Trust.—One company acquired shares in another company, and a director of the first company was appointed a director of the second, the qualifying shares being transferred from the first company to the director, and the director executing a declaration of trust in favour of that company. The first company went into liquidation, and the liquidator claimed on behalf of the creditors the remuneration which the director had received from the second company. Held that the remuneration was not received on behalf of the first company or as profit on their property, and that the director was entitled to retain it.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—7*th November* 1907.

ROBERT MUNRO, Esq.,

ADVOCATE.

The position of Junior Counsel to the Treasury is one of great importance. There is no class of cases more intricate or requiring more delicate handling than those which emanate from the Inland Revenue Department. As time goes on the number of these cases appears to increase rather than to diminish, and, considering the relative size of the two countries, Scotland contributes a larger proportion than England to the bulk of Tax Cases. In the selection of Mr Munro for the office rendered vacant by the resignation of Sheriff Young, an appointment has been made excellent alike in the interests of the Department concerned and of the Court of Exchequer. Mr Munro is singularly well qualified to deal with a difficult subject, and to explain with clearness the perplexing details of the Revenue Acts so frequently framed on the principle of legislation by reference.

Born in 1868, at the Free Church Manse of Alness, Ross-shire, Mr Munro is a son of the late Rev. A. R. Munro, M.A., for many years minister of that charge. He was educated privately, then at Aberdeen Grammar School, and later at the University of Edinburgh, where he graduated as Master of Arts and Bachelor of Laws. His academic career was a distinguished one. Among the many honours which he obtained was the Forensic Prize. He was Secretary, and afterwards President, of the Students' Representative Council, and also of the Edinburgh University Liberal Association.

After leaving the University he went to London, and for about a year acted as Official Receiver in Bankruptcy under the Board of Trade. He there gained an insight into Commercial Law and business which has since stood him in good stead.

In 1893 he returned to Scotland, and in November of that year was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates. Since then he has had a large and ever-increasing practice, and he is universally recognised as a counsel of great ability.

On the formation of the present Government he was appointed Sheriff Court Depute, and a year later Extra Advocate-Depute on the Western Circuit. The latter appointment he held till November of the present year.

THE RIGHT HON. CHARLES SCOTT DICKSON, K.C., Lord Advocate in the late Administration, has, in reply to an invitation by Conservatives and Liberal Unionists, intimated his willingness to become Unionist candidate for the Central Division of Glasgow at the next election. Mr Dickson represented Bridgeton Division of Glasgow from 1900 to 1905. Mr James Avon Clyde, K.C., Solicitor-General in the late administration, has been adopted as prospective Unionist candidate for the West Division of Edinburgh. Mr Clyde unsuccessfully contested Clackmannan and Kinross at the last election.

THE list of jury causes for trial at the ensuing sittings has been issued. There are nine cases in the First Division and five in the Second.

BUSINESS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—There are still ten causes standing for hearing. Of these, three are from Scotland, and they stand as follows in the Roll:—1. United Collieries Limited v. Robert Muir & Co.; 3. Weir v. Crum Brown; 8. Cameron v. Young.

Society of Writers to His Majesty's Signet.—The following gentlemen have been admitted members of the Society of Writers to the Signet:—William Thorburn Blackwood, LL.B., 2 Bellevue Crescent; Andrew Henry Cowan Lamb, LL.B., 1 Western Terrace; David Mackenzie, LL.B., 1 Atholl Place, Perth; George Frederick Graham Smith, 12 Belgrave Place; Alan Graham Thomson, 21 Chester Street; George Muir Thornton, LL.B., Grange Park; Frederick Lewis Maitland Tod, 23 Lennox Street; Ernest Maclagan Wedderburn, LL.B., 6 Succoth Gardens.

The trial took place on the 10th inst. at Airdrie, before Sheriff Glegg and a jury, of Frederick Ekeval, the engine-driver of the train which met with an accident on 30th September at Sunnyside Station, Coatbridge, by which one passenger was killed and fifty injured. The charge was one of culpable homicide, and the case has excited much public interest. The jury returned a verdict of not proven. Mr Lyon Mackenzie, who prosecuted, made his first appearance as Advocate-Depute in the Sheriff Court.

NEW ENGLISH JUDGE.

It is officially announced that the King has been pleased to appoint Mr Henry Trelawney Eve, K.C., to be one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, in place of the late Right Hon. Mr Justice Kekewich.

The new Judge, who was born in 1856, was called to the Bar in 1881. He practised on the Chancery side and became a Queen's Counsel in 1895. He was elected a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn in 1899. Both as Junior and Leader he had a very large practice. A Liberal in politics, he has represented the Ashburton Division of Devon since 1904.

LANARKSHIRE SHERIFF COURT.

COURT ARRANGEMENTS.

In view of the new Sheriff Court Act coming into force on 1st January, several alterations are being made in the arrangement of the Courts and business generally at the County Buildings. Amongst these it may be noted that in each week there will be four sittings of the Small-Debt Court—viz., on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday—instead of only three days as at present. In the months of July, August, and September, however, there will be only three sittings, viz., on Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday. As regards the Ordinary Court, which at present is held on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, there will be an additional Court on Monday, probably presided over by Sheriff Mackenzie, who at present sits, as a rule, daily in the Summary Court, but who, after the new Act comes into force, will share the Ordinary and Summary work with the other Sheriff-Substitutes. The Ordinary Courts will, it is presumed, continue to be taken by Sheriffs Balfour, Boyd, Fyfe and Davidson on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday respectively as heretofore. The Summary work will be taken in rotation by the resident Sheriff-Substitutes, along with Sheriff Scott Moncrieff and Sheriff Glegg, and other arrangements are being made for, as far as may be, an equal allocation of judicial work among the Sheriff-Substitutes.

Mr M. Boyd Auld, writer and notary public, 29 St Vincent Place, Glasgow, has assumed as a partner Mr Angus Mackenzie, writer, sole partner of the firm of James Smith and Son & Mackenzie, writers, Glasgow. The combined businesses will be carried on at the above address under the firm name of M. Boyd Auld & Mackenzie. Before taking over the business of James Smith & Son two years ago, Mr Mackenzie was for six years managing clerk to Messrs R. & J. M. Hill, Brown & Co., writers, Glasgow.

The Late G. Wemyss Renton, Esq., Solicitor, Kirkcaldy.—We regret to record the death of Mr G. Wemyss Renton, which took place on the 9th inst. at his residence in Kirkcaldy. Mr Renton was a son of the late Rev. John Renton, United Presbyterian minister at Auchtermuchty, and among his brothers are Mr Justice Renton, of the High Court of Ceylon, and Mr R. W. Renton, Procurator-Fiscal in Edinburgh. Mr Renton commenced business in Kirkcaldy about eighteen years ago, and was one of the best known and most respected lawyers in Fife. He acted as agent for the Liberals in West Fife, and he was Secretary of the Society of Procurators of the Central District of Fife.

MARRIAGE OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

The marriage of Lord Loreburn to Miss Violet Elizabeth Hicks Beach, eldest daughter of Mr W. F. Hicks Beach, of Witcombe Park, Gloucestershire, took place at the Chapel of St Stephen, Westminster Hall, on Tuesday, 3rd inst. The officiating clergy were the Bishop of London, assisted by the Archdeacon of Westminster and Canon Henson, rector of St Margaret's, Westminster. Lord Loreburn was attended by Lord Granard, Master of the Horse, as best man. Among those present in the chapel, in addition to the Lord Chancellor's colleagues in the Cabinet, were Lord Halsbury, Lord Alverstone, Lord James of Hereford, Lord Selby, Mr Justice A. T. Lawrence, Mr Lyttelton, K.C., M.P., Sir George Lewis, Sir W. E. Davidson, K.C., Mr E. S. Hope, C.B., Registrar of the Privy Council, and Sir Kenneth Muir Mackenzie. Of the wedding gifts, the members of the Cabinet gave a Queen Anne inkstand and candlesticks; the Judges of the Supreme Court, a set of nine silver Elizabethan bowls; the Benchers of the Inner Temple, a silver tray; and the judicial members of the House of Lords, silver inkstand and candlesticks. It is understood that there is to be a presentation later from the House of Lords. Lord Loreburn is the only Lord Chancellor who has been married during his term of office.

The Inner Temple, the Benchers of which have given the Lord Chancellor a large silver salver for a wedding present, numbers (says the Law Journal) the Speakers of both Houses of Parliament among its members. Mr Lowther, like Lord Loreburn, is a Bencher of the Inner Temple. The same distinction belonged to the Inn when Lord Halsbury and Mr Gully were in office. Yet another coincidence exalts the Inner Temple above the other Inns. Both the Law Officers of the Crown belong to it. Two or three years ago Lincoln's Inn had a far larger number of judges among its members than any other Inn. The Inner Temple has now ousted it from this proud position. Fourteen judges, including Lord Alverstone, Lord Macnaghten, Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, and Lords Justices Vaughan Williams, Farwell, Buckley, and Kennedy, belong to Lincoln's Inn; fourteen, including Lord Loreburn, Lord Halsbury, Lord Atkinson, and Sir Gorell Barnes, belong to the Inner Temple. The Middle Temple is only half as fortunate; but seven judges, including Lord Collins, Lord Robertson, and Lord Justice Moulton, belong to it. Gray's Inn has not a single High Court judge among its members.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Normandy v. Ind, Coope & Co. Ltd.

Company—Special Resolution—Notice.—A notice was sent to the shareholders of a company calling a meeting for the purpose of approving new regulations, and it was stated that a copy of the regulations would be sent on application being made. In order to make these regulations valid a special resolution was necessary. The new regulations provided for payment of a pension to the managing director, for increasing the fees of the directors, for appointing certain persons to be directors for life, for indemnity to the directors for what they did in office, and gave power to the directors to borrow a large sum of money. Opinion that the notice of the business to be transacted was not sufficient, and that resolutions passed at the meeting and confirmed at a later meeting were not valid.—25*th October* 1907.

Company — Director — Powers. — Among the objects of a company stated in its memorandum of association was "to provide for the welfare of persons in the employment of the company . . . . by granting pensions." The articles of association authorised the directors to exercise all the powers of the company except such as were expressly reserved to the company in general meeting; but they provided that the remuneration of the directors should be a stated sum, and that the company might from time to time grant an additional remuneration. Opinion that an agreement by the directors to pay an annuity to the managing director on his retirement was ultra vires of the directors, although the company might enter into such an agreement.

Company—Shareholders—Title to Sue.—Held that a shareholder of a company had no title to sue an action for a declaration that certain meetings called for the purpose of substituting new articles of association for the old ones were not properly convened, that the resolutions passed thereat were not duly passed, and that an agreement entered into by the directors was ultra vires.—Chan. Div. (Kekewich, J.).—7*th November* 1907.

Lewis & Lewis v. Durnford.

Contract—Restraint of Trade.—A clerk to a firm of solicitors bound himself, in the event of his service coming to an end, not to act for any person who was or had been within five years previously a client of the firm. He left and began business on his own account; and on three occasions he acted for persons who had during the five years previous to his leaving been clients of the firm.—Held that the stipulation was not wider than was reasonably necessary for the protection of his previous employers' business, and that they were entitled to an injunction against him.—Chan. Div. (Swinfen Eady, J.).—8*th November* 1907.

Rawsthorne v. Rowley.

Trust—Trustee—Liability.—Where a lady on her marriage transferred a certain security to a trustee to hold for certain trust purposes, held that, in the absence of circumstances giving rise to suspicion, there was no duty on the trustee to make an examination of the security or to enquire into the solvency of the debtor.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—9th November 1907.

Mansell v. Grifin.

School — Schoolmaster — Corporal Punishment.—Opinions (per curiam) that the right of giving corporal punishment to a pupil is not confined to a headmaster, but, in the absence of evidence to shew a limitation of the power, a responsible teacher of a class is entitled to administer moderate punishment. — K.B. Div. (Phillimore and Walton, JJ.). — 9th November 1907.

In re Nelson & Co. Ltd.

Company—Liquidation—Life Assurance Claims.—A company engaged in the business of selling tea offered pensions to purchasers who should become widows, subject to certain conditions. The company went into liquidation, and at the date of liquidation there was a large number of widows who had claims for pensions under their contracts, and there were also purchasers of tea who were fulfilling the qualifying conditions. The company had, under the Life Assurance Companies Act 1870, deposited in Court a sum of £20,000, and under their articles of association a proportion of their profits had been annually set aside to meet pension claims. Held that the sum deposited in Court and the accumulated profits must be applied to meet the claims of pensioners and customers, and that pensioners were entitled in the distribution to a preference over customers.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—12th November 1907.

Storey v. Fulham Steel Works Co.

Master and Servant — Termination of Contract—Illness.—Decision of Channell, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 186), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—14th November 1907.

Wade v. Robert Arthur Theatres Co. Ltd.

Contract—Construction.—A contract was entered into between the plaintiff and the defenders by which the plaintiff was engaged for "principal part in pantomime required at a salary of £130 per week first year, £140 per week second year, £150 per week third year, ... with the option, in consideration of this engagement, of retaining his services on the same terms and conditions as set forth in this agreement for the following pantomime season." Held that the option might be exercised by the defenders on payment of the same salary as was agreed to be paid for the third year.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.).—14th November 1907.

Emanuel and Others v. Symon.

International Law—Foreign Judgment—Enforcement.—Decision of Channell, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 135), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—15th November 1907.

Bristol United Breweries Ltd. v. Abbot.

Company — Debentures.— Before the commencement of the Companies Act 1900, a company created debentures and executed a trust deed by which they conveyed certain heritable property to trustees to secure the debentures, the trustees having power to sell part of the property and reinvest the proceeds. The trustees, after 1st January 1901, sold part of the property and reinvested the proceeds in heritable property. Held that it was unnecessary to register the deed of conveyance, as it did not create a charge within the meaning of sect. 14 of the Companies Act 1900.—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.).—15th November 1907.

Ogden v. Ogden.

International Law — Marriage — Validity.—Decision of Bargrave Deane, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 148), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Kennedy, L.J.).—18th November 1907.

Cleverly v. Gas-Light and Coke Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. I. (1) (a).—A workman received injury by accident which resulted in tumours and incapacity for work. His employers agreed to pay him a weekly sum during incapacity. Some time afterwards he died, and in an arbitration between his employers and his dependants the arbitrator found that death was due to disease and not to the accident, but that the employers were estopped from denying that death was due to the accident by reason of the agreement. Held that the agreement did not operate as an estoppel, and that compensation was not payable. —House of Lords (Lord Loreburn, L.C., Earl of Halsbury, Lord Macnaghten and Lord Atkinson). —18th November 1907.

Heard v. Stuart.

Lease—Construction.—A lease of certain premises provided that the tenant should keep the premises in good and substantial repair and condition, and not make any addition or alteration to the buildings nor alter their external appearance. He let the end wall of the premises as a bill-posting stance to a company, and there was evidence that the use of it for this purpose was injurious to the wall. Held that he had committed a breach of both the above conditions of the lease.—Chan. Div. (Joyce, J.).—19th November 1907.

The Late HECTOR SUTHERLAND, Esq., Solicitor, Wick.

Many, not only in the legal profession, but beyond it, will learn with deep regret of the death of Mr Hector Sutherland, Town Clerk of Wick, at the comparatively early age of fifty-one. Born at Wick and educated there, Mr Sutherland commenced his law apprenticeship while a mere boy, and while still under twenty, came to Edinburgh to attend the law classes at the University. He proved himself an excellent student, gaining distinction not only in Scots Law and Conveyancing, but in Medical Jurisprudence and Moral Philosophy. He at the same time was a Parliament House assistant in a busy office, and fought through some of the most notable litigations of those days. He was also an active member of the Scots Law Society, in which he was the contemporary and personal friend of many men who have since risen to eminence in the legal profession. But the anxiety to begin practice on his own account drew him away from Edinburgh to his native town in 1879, shortly after he had qualified as a solicitor. Thereafter his meetings with his former Edinburgh companions were comparatively rare, though many of them doubtless retain pleasant memories of his genial and interesting personality. He rapidly built up a good practice at Wick, and his local popularity was indicated by the fact that in 1885, at the early age of twenty-nine, he was appointed Town Clerk of Wick, being then the youngest Town Clerk in Scotland. Prior to receiving this appointment he had entered into partnership with Mr W. Paterson Smith, solicitor, Wick, as whose apprentice he had commenced the study of law.

In 1893 he formed the firm of Hector Sutherland & Green, which subsisted till his death, by taking into partnership Mr G. A. O. Green, solicitor. In addition to the Town Clerkship he held many appointments as agent for public bodies and local trusts. He also for many years acted as local agent for the Duke of Portland, and as Liberal Unionist agent for the County of Caithness. His firm also acted as law agents for Sir Arthur Bignold, M.P. for the Northern Burghs, while his partner acts as that gentleman's election agent. From the institution of the Liberal Unionist party he was one of its most ardent supporters.

Mr Sutherland was a shrewd and reliable adviser, and a keen and resourceful agent in conducting litigation. He was a skilful debater, and his knowledge of law was extensive. He did not, however, confine his attention to law. In educational matters he took a profound interest, and for about twenty years, down to the time of his death, he was a member of the Wick School Board. He used to say that "a good education was the working man's best legacy to his family," and he was an earnest advocate of higher education. A man of pronounced literary tastes, he was widely read both in classical and modern literature.

In private life he was of quiet and unassuming manner, and kindly and genial disposition. His friendly aid will be much missed, not only by charitable institutions but by the poor whom he unostentatiously befriended.

He never caught the craze for golf. A quiet game at bowls was his chief recreation. In earlier days he enjoyed nothing better than a walking excursion along the interesting cliffs of the Caithness coast.

His death from hemorrhage of the lung took place with almost tragic suddenness, for, though he had been far from well for a considerable time, he was at business on the day preceding his death.

In expressing the deep regret of the Bench and Bar, Sheriff Stuart, at the first sitting of the Sheriff Court after the sad event, aptly observed of him: "A man of high sense of honour, Mr Sutherland, besides the essentials of an ample knowledge of law and a wide knowledge of human nature, possessed a certain humour of his own,—a most useful and delightful gift, which served often to lighten the seriousness of our judicial work."

It has already been proposed by some of Mr Sutherland's friends that his memory and the memory of his work in the cause of education should be perpetuated by founding a "Hector Sutherland" prize in connection with the Wick Academy, where he received his general education. There could be no more suitable memorial of him. J. F. M'L.

In the correspondence (which appears in another column) between the Lord Advocate and the Secretary of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents as to the Sheriff Courts Act of last year, the Society conveyed to his Lordship their thanks for his services in securing the passing of that Act. In his reply the Lord Advocate calls the attention of the profession to the Criminal Procedure and Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Bill, which was introduced towards the close of last session. His Lordship is anxious that the Criminal Procedure in the Sheriff Courts should be simplified, and that in that branch of practice the machinery of the Courts of Ordinary Jurisdiction should be made as efficient as it is in civil practice. He invites the assistance of the profession by way of suggestion or amendment to the Bill of last year, which will be reintroduced next session. The main objects of the Bill are thus set forth in the memorandum which was issued with it last year: "This Bill is designed to reduce to order summary criminal procedure in Scotland, in regard to which certain confusion prevails, to extend the jurisdiction and powers of the Sheriff in summary criminal cases, and to effect some amendments on the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887. The main purpose of the Bill is to provide a uniform and simple system of procedure applicable to summary criminal courts in Scotland, and practically to consolidate the existing provisions contained in various statutes bearing on the subject. It also proposes to make an extension of the present summary powers of the Sheriff. The Bill is largely a consolidation of the existing provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, in Local and General Police Acts, and in a number of other Acts bearing on summary procedure. Provisions which have proved useful, but which at present are only available in certain Courts, have been made generally applicable, while provisions which have proved incumbrances have been dispensed with. In addition, the existing procedure has been amended on the following general lines, viz.: 1st, Simplification; 2nd, the extension of the summary powers of the Sheriff, more especially with the view of meeting the case of accused persons who have established a criminal record; 3rd, the amendment of the procedure as to evidence in certain cases, so as to obviate expense; 4th, a new and more equitable scale of imprisonment for non-payment of fines; 5th, a less cumbrous and more prompt and efficacious mode of review; 6th, opportunity has also been taken to amend the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, in directions which experience has shown to be, and supervening legislation has rendered, desirable." The Faculty of Advocates at its meeting on Thursday received a report from a Committee appointed to consider the Bill, and, in view of the importance of the subject, continued the discussion till a special meeting to be held early in January. The Lord Advocate points out that if amendments are to be suggested that should be done early, and the other legal bodies which have the Bill under consideration will therefore probably express their views upon it without delay.

The case of the Aberdeen Steam Trawling Co. Ltd. v. Gill, which we report this week, is the first case under the Workman's Compensation Act 1906 which has been decided in the Court of Session. The Second Division have reversed the decision of the Sheriff-Substitute. The English Courts have already had several difficult points under the new Act before them. It seems not improbable that the new statute may produce nearly as large a crop of litigation as its predecessor. 256 cases under the Act of 1897 have been reported in the "Scots Law Times" up to 14th December 1907. The following analysis shows how these cases are distributed over the last ten years:

Vol. VI., 1898-99,	10.	Vol. XI., 1903-04,	35.
,, VII., 1899-1900,	39.	,, XII., 1904-05,	28.
,, VIII., 1900-01,	22.	,, XIII., 1905-06,	23.
,, IX., 1901-02,	22.	,, XIV., 1906-07,	30.
,, X., 1902-03,	34.	,, XV., 1907-08,	13.

Faculty of Advocates.—A meeting of the Faculty of Advocates was held on Thursday, 19th December, the Dean of Faculty, Mr William Campbell, K.C., presiding. Sir Ludovic Grant was appointed the representative of the Faculty on the Royal Infirmary Board for the ensuing year. Mr Middleton Rettie, K.C., and Mr Christopher N. Johnston, K.C., were appointed managers of the Craigcrook Mortification. The Report of a Committee on the Criminal Procedure and Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Bill was presented by Mr John Cowan, Convener of the Committee, and was continued for further consideration.

THE LAW OF PUBLIC AUDIT.

By H. Burn Murdoch, B.A., LL.B.,
Advocate and Barrister-at-Law.

The vast and increasing sums which are annually spent by local public bodies render good management indispensable. Rightly or wrongly, there is frequent distrust in the minds of the public concerning the prudence of its councillors; sometimes even improper dealings are hinted at. The only cure for this state of matters is a complete and open reckoning between the public and those who manage its affairs: a regular, independent audit is needed, in the interests both of ratepayers and councillors.

A private firm employs an auditor solely to check the bookkeeping of its cashier, but with a public body, in theory at least, the case is different. The Council's own dealings should be examined. A joint Parliamentary Committee reported in 1903 "that it should be made clear, by statute or regulation, that the duties of those entrusted with the audit of local accounts are not confined to mere certification of figures." The Local Government (Scotland) Act of 1889 was the first general establishment of an independent supervisory audit, which, with careful detail, it prescribed for County Councils (including their District Committees) by sects. 68–70. The Secretary for Scotland appoints the auditor and orders a surcharge in cases where the auditor has reported "that any payment is in his opinion contrary to law and should be disallowed, or that any sum which in his opinion ought to have been, is not brought into account by any person." The Secretary for Scotland may abstain from penalising a technical illegality if the circumstances "make it fair and equitable that the disallowance or surcharge should not be made." This meets the case of honest mistake. If a surcharge is imposed, it falls upon the persons who have actually made the illegal payments; those, for instance, who signed the cheque (Maclachlan, 1899, 6 S.L.T. p. 384). A county auditor can demand the production of "all books . . . . and other documents and papers which he may deem necessary," and may require any person holding or accountable for the same to appear at the audit and to make a signed declaration as to their correctness. Refusal to obey the auditor may be punished by fine not exceeding forty shillings, recoverable summarily, while a person who knowingly makes a false declaration is liable to the penalties of perjury. It is the auditor's statutory duty to recover sums involved in a surcharge from the individuals who are responsible, and the Council must reimburse him for his expenses and time. For seven days before the audit, the date of which is fixed by the auditor, all the accounts and other documents are to be kept at the County Council office, open to the inspection of all ratepayers. A ratepayer may state objections himself and be present at the audit to support them, but these opportunities are seldom used. Finally, the Council must print and publish an abstract of the accounts as audited, and also the auditor's report in cases where a surcharge has been made.

Five years later, the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1894, sect. 36, extended the accounts and audit rules of the 1889 Act to Parish Councils also. The Local Government Board was made the central authority over Parish Councils, and was given power to make various regulations. All parish auditors now work under a uniform system prescribed by the Board.

The Town Councils Act of 1900 established a precise but imperfect law of audit for the generality of Scottish burghs. The Secretary for Scotland appoints an independent auditor (sect. 94), to whom the Council must deliver their accounts and books. The auditor is to make a special report "if it appears to him expedient," or if he finds "that any statutory or other requirement with respect to the repayment or extinction of debt has not been observed, or that any debt is not being duly repaid" (sect. 95). Any special report by the auditor is to be read at a meeting of the Council (sect. 96), but it does not appear that anyone is bound to pay attention to it, although it is to be printed with the abstract of accounts and copies may be bought at a reasonable charge by persons assessed or electors. Any dissatisfied ratepayer or elector may complain by petition to the Sheriff, within three months after the special meeting referred to. This is subject to the same right of appeal as in ordinary actions in the Sheriff Court. The ratepayers do not, in fact, exercise their privilege.

Sect. 109 of the Town Councils Act 1900 permitted the five largest towns of Scotland to avoid the new general law (thus repeating the exemption of the Burgh Police Act 1892). They were given power, by their own resolution passed within the ensuing twelve months, to declare inapplicable to themselves any part of certain important divisions of the Act, including "Accounts and Corporate Property," and at the same time to save from the general repeal the corresponding portions of the existing law as it applied to them. Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen and Dundee promptly seized the opportunity. The wording of sect. 109, and the manner in which these cities exercised their power, suggest a material doubt as to the validity of their resolutions, but this question has not yet been raised. In the recent case of Eadie and Others v. Magistrates of Glasgow (15 S.L.T. pp. 379 and 612), it was not argued that the resolution of Glasgow was ineffectual, and the only matters of decision were points of procedure under the revived sections of the old Acts. These are the Royal Burghs (Scotland) Acts of 1822 (sects. 1–4, 9 and 10) and 1833 (sects. 24 and 32). The citations are 3 Geo. IV. c. 91, and 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 76. In these the word audit is not even mentioned.

The provisions as to the making up of accounts are disconnected and conflicting. The only check on expenditure provided applies to the Common Good, and gives a limited right of complaint by three burgesses to the "Barons of the Court of Exchequer." In the event of a well-founded complaint, it is not explained what is to happen. In short, if the four great towns have validly evaded the Town Councils Act scheme of audit, they have revived nothing equivalent.

The District Lunacy Boards also have no legal audit. The Lunacy Act 1857, and the series of amending Acts, were silent on the subject. The important central control of the General Board of Lunacy for Scotland is administrative and not financial.

There are many quasi-public departments, such as Water Trusts and Gas Commissions, in a still less defined position. Each depends upon a set of private Acts peculiar to itself. Thus the law of public audit in Scotland is in a chaotic state, and plainly requires a general measure of revision.

EARLY SCOTTISH PRINTED BOOKS IN THE ADVOCATES' LIBRARY.

The fourth of the winter course of lectures arranged by the Edinburgh Typographia was delivered on the evening of Monday, 16th December, in the Reference Department of the Edinburgh Public Library, by Mr W. K. Dickson, Keeper of the Advocates' Library, the subject being "The Advocates' Library, with special reference to the collection of early Scottish printed books." Treasurer Harrison, Chairman of the Public Library Committee, occupied the chair. The lecturer described the foundation of the Library by the Faculty in the 17th century; its propitious start under the Deanship of Sir George Mackenzie, the "bloody Mackenzie" of Covenanting tradition; its encouragement by the Court as "a thing useful and expedient for the College of Justice and profitable for the whole nation"; its narrow escape from destruction by fire in 1700; the privileges granted to it by the Copyright Act of Queen Anne; and its great expansion under the Keepership of Thomas Ruddiman and David Hume. Its more recent history was briefly sketched, and a short account was given of some of its more interesting contents, the illuminated manuscripts, the royal letters and other historical documents, and the fine specimens of early printing. The lecturer then described in some detail the early days of printing in Scotland, giving an account of the introduction of the art in the time of James IV. by Walter Chepman, a prominent Edinburgh citizen, who found the capital for the enterprise, and Andro Myllar, who was the working partner, and who imported from France "ane prent, and expert men to use the samyne," and describing the work of their immediate successors, numerous specimens of whose productions are preserved in the Library. A series of illustrative lantern slides was exhibited. Several slides were shown illustrating the famous "Porteous of Noblenes" volume, the series of poetical pieces printed by Chepman and Myllar at the Southgait Press in 1508, the first-fruits of the Scottish press, of which the Library possesses the only known copy. Among other volumes illustrated were the Aberdeen Breviary, compiled by Bishop William Elphinstone and printed in 1510, of which only four copies are known; the Acts of James V., printed by Thomas Davidson in 1541–2, of which only two copies are known; Bellenden's Croniklis of Scotland; Archbishop Hamilton's Catechism, issued on the eve of the Reformation; and the Book of Common Prayer issued by the authority of Charles I., the introduction of which into St Giles's in 1637 brought about the famous riot which is associated with the name of Jenny Geddes, and which started the Civil War.

The firm of Buchanan & Bennett, civil engineers, 12 Hill Street, Edinburgh, of which John Buchanan, C.E., and James Bower Bennett, C.E., were the sole partners, has been dissolved as at 30th November 1907, of mutual consent. The former partners will carry on separate businesses as civil engineers, Mr Buchanan at 12 Hill Street, Edinburgh, and Mr Bennett at 42 Frederick Street, Edinburgh.

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF LAW AGENTS AND THE LORD ADVOCATE.

The following correspondence has passed between the Secretary of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents and the Lord Advocate.

The Secretary, Incorporated Society of Law Agents in Scotland, to the Right Honourable the Lord Advocate, Advocate's Chambers, Parliament Square, Edinburgh.

Dunblane, 12*th November* 1907.

My Lord,—I have the honour of informing you that the Incorporated Society of Law Agents have unanimously resolved to convey to you their respectful thanks for your Lordship's most successful efforts in passing through Parliament the Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act of 1907, and to assure you that the whole profession in Scotland feel that they are under a deep debt of gratitude to your Lordship for securing the passing of a measure which has been urgently desired for many years.—I am, my Lord, your most obedient servant, (Sgd.) J. W. Barty, LL.D.

The Right Honourable the Lord Advocate to the Secretary, Incorporated Society of Law Agents in Scotland.

Lord Advocate's Chambers, Edinburgh,
5th December 1907.

Dear Dr Barty,—I had the honour of duly receiving your recent letter conveying to me the thanks of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents in reference to the passing through Parliament of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act. I accept with much pleasure the assurance of the gratitude of the profession which you are good enough to express. So far as the harmonious co-operation of all interests and parties are concerned, no statute could have a better chance of success and usefulness.

May I venture to add that after the conclusion of our labours on the civil side of procedure, it would be desirable that the structure should be completed, and that the other side of the legal reform in which you have taken such a deep and helpful interest—viz. the Criminal Procedure and Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Bill—should be passed into law? Nothing would give me greater pleasure than that this should be done also as the result of a similar co-operation in public and professional quarters, so that the removal of so many evils which experience has shewn to be clamant in Scotland in this department may be accomplished, and we may together see the Bill placed upon the Statute Book. In this connection I may point out that one of the serious risks run by last year's measure arose from the late arrival of suggested amendments. I am not sure that it is sufficiently understood how dependent in technical measures of that character Parliament is upon the contributions made by skilled experience, and how regrettable it is when these contributions cannot be harvested because they have been sown too late. It was with this in view that I ventured to ask the House of Commons to give a first reading of the Bill last session. It has been circulated throughout the country, and I may express to you the hope that before the ensuing meeting of Parliament I may be favoured with such views and opinions as may assist either in shape or substance the new measure. To yourself personally I stand already indebted; indeed I do so to such an extent that I hardly think that further amendments will be of a far-reaching character; yet, such as they are, I trust that I may ask the favour of your Society putting them forward at an early day.—Yours very faithfully,

(Sgd.) Tho. Shaw.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

Notable Scottish Trials: Trial of Deacon Brodie. Edited by William Roughead, Writer to the Signet. Glasgow and Edinburgh: William Hodge & Co., 1907. Price 5*s.*

Notable Scottish Trials: Trial of James Stewart (the Appin Murder). Edited by David N. Mackay, Writer, Glasgow. Glasgow and Edinburgh: William Hodge & Co., 1907. Price 5*s.*

These two volumes in the Notable Scottish Trial series take the reader much further back in history than any of the former volumes of the series. The trials of Madeline Smith, Chantrelle, Pritchard, and the Glasgow Bank Directors are all within living memory, and all illustrate Scottish criminal procedure much as it is at the present time. The present volumes deal with history of the 18th century. The trial of James Stewart in 1752 is full of reminiscences of the Rebellion of '45. That of Deacon Brodie in 1788 throws an interesting light on the manners and customs of the capital of Scotland more than a hundred years ago. The records of both trials contain the names of the most eminent judges and counsel of the day. Both were keenly contested, and in both cases the Crown succeeded and the death sentence followed. But on the case of Stewart the verdict of history is that the charge was not proven, and that the trial is a blot on our judicial records, while in Brodie's case there never was any reasonable doubt of his guilt, and little exception can be taken to the mode of his trial. Stewart was convicted on circumstantial evidence of the murder of Campbell of Glenure. But, even had the evidence been much stronger than it was, a trial of a Stewart for the murder of a Campbell, conducted at Inveraray, presided over by a Lord Justice-General who was a Duke of Argyll (and who created a precedent by sitting at a criminal trial on circuit), with two Campbells among the counsel for the Crown, and eleven Campbells among the fifteen jurymen, did not give the accused much chance of justice. Mr Andrew Lang has said of the proceedings: "James Stewart was, to speak plain words, judicially murdered. . . . Political necessities and clan hatred killed him," and his view is assented to by most other writers who have dealt with the subject. The Lord Advocate, Mr Grant, afterwards Lord Prestongrange — whose appearance on circuit was, like that of the Lord Justice-General, unprecedented — was supported by four juniors, James Erskine, afterwards a Baron of Exchequer; Robert Campbell; John Campbell, afterwards Lord Stonefield; and Simon Fraser, Master of Lovat. For the defence there appeared Thomas Miller, afterwards Lord President; George Brown, afterwards Lord Coalstoun, and two others. After long speeches on objections to the relevancy (of which the book contains verbatim reports), the objections were repelled and evidence was led. The trial commenced at 6 a.m. on 22nd September, and continued without intermission till 7 a.m. on 24th September. The Lord Advocate spoke for the prosecution, and Mr Brown replied in a long speech, delivered in the early hours of the Sunday morning. There was no summing up, and the jury, on Monday 25th September, returned a verdict of guilty. Anyone reading the speech of the Lord Justice-General in passing sentence will have but little doubt that his political bias unfitted him to preside at this trial.

Deacon Brodie, who was tried in Edinburgh in 1788, thirty-six years later, was a cabinetmaker, Deacon of the Wrights, a member of the Town Council, and a rogue of the first water. Well-known and respected in the community, he was all the time living a double life, associating with thieves and gamblers. He took part in several successful burglaries the perpetrators of which escaped detection; but one of his partners, in an attempt to rob the Excise Office, turned King's evidence, and the Deacon, who had fled to London and thence to Holland, was there arrested, and after extradition proceedings was brought back to Edinburgh to stand his trial. There were five judges on the Bench. Lord Braxfield presided. Whatever may have been his severity in other cases, his charge to the jury contains a perfectly fair review of the evidence, though it states his own opinion in very definite terms. The other judges were Lord Hailes, Lord Eskgrove, Lord Stonefield, and Lord Swinton. The Lord Advocate, Ilay Campbell, afterwards Lord President, the Solicitor-General, Robert Dundas, afterwards Lord Chief Baron, William Tait, and James Wolff Murray, afterwards Lord Cringletie, appeared for the Crown. Brodie had the good fortune to be defended by the Dean of Faculty, the Hon. Henry Erskine, who had with him Alexander Wright and Charles Hay, afterwards Lord Newton, whose famous portrait by Raeburn hangs in the National Gallery. George Smith, the other accused, was represented by George Clerk, afterwards Lord Eldin, then a comparatively young counsel, and by Robert Hamilton, afterwards a Clerk of Session. Mr Clerk's speech is interesting for a passage of arms between him and Lord Braxfield. He contended that the jury were to judge of the law as well as the facts. A scene ensued, in which Clerk refused to go on with his speech unless allowed to do so in his own way. The Justice-Clerk called on Erskine to address the jury on behalf of Brodie. This the Dean declined to do, and the Justice-Clerk proposed to commence his charge when Clerk started to his feet, shook his fist at the Bench, and said, "Hang my client if your daur, my Lord, without hearing me in his defence." The judges thereupon retired to the robing room for consultation, but in a little while returned and asked Clerk to continue his address. Henry Erskine's eloquent speech, in which he skilfully deplored that unhappy itch for gambling which had led to the downfall of his client, and in which he vigorously attacked the credibility of the principal witness for the Crown, will be read with interest as an example of the forensic skill of one of the most brilliant ornaments of the Scottish Bar. The editors of both of these volumes have left nothing undone to make their books attractive. All that is to be said about the trials, and those who took part in them, has been carefully collected, and is narrated in a most interesting way. The many illustrations which both volumes contain add much to their charm.

Encyclopædia of the Laws of England, with Forms and Precedents by the Most Eminent Legal Authorities. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Vol. VII. Ice to Landlord and Tenant. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 21*s.*

The editors and publishers of the second edition of the Encyclopædia of the Laws of England deserve commendation both on account of the rapidity with which the new edition is being issued and also of the thoroughness with which the work is being carried through. Mr Justice Wood Renton and Mr Max A. Robertson have again been fortunate in having secured the services of many of the original contributors to revise their articles. Sir William Anson, Mr Craies, Professor Holland, Mr Burney, one of the Masters of the Supreme Court, Sir Howard Elphinstone, Mr de Colyar, K.C., Mr Blake Odgers, K.C., and Mr Foa, whose names are all familiar to the profession, have themselves revised their contributions. Among the more notable of the articles in this volume are those dealing with Income Tax, International Law, Infants, Justice of the Peace, and Landlord and Tenant.

The Companies Act 1907. Annotated by D. G. Hemmant, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, with Notes on Practice, by Herbert W. Jordan, Company Registration Agent. London: Jordan & Sons Ltd., 1907.

Price 2*s.* 6*d. net.*

The provisions of the Companies Act 1907 impose a number of new restrictions and obligations on joint-stock companies, whether existing before the passing of the Act or registered since its date. Mr Hemmant, who has already done useful work in annotating the new Table A which was issued last year, has supplied a series of practical comments on the various sections of the Act of the present year. Reference is made to many cases which have a bearing on the provisions of the new Act, or which shewed the necessity for amending the previous law. The book also deals with the Companies Act 1900. Sect. 37 of the 1907 Act, which contains a definition of "Private Company," calls for careful consideration, as its requirements must be complied with if it is desired to avoid some of the obligations imposed upon public companies.

A Practical Guide to the Death Duties and to the Preparation of Death Duty Accounts. By Charles Beatty, Solicitor of the Estate Duty Office, Somerset House. Second Edition. London: Effingham Wilson, 1907.

Price 4*s.*

The second edition of this handbook (which originally appeared in 1905, and has been enlarged and revised) contains notes of a practical kind for the use of solicitors on Estate Duty, Settlement Estate Duty, Legacy Duty, and Succession Duty. It also includes a number of forms relating to the various duties chargeable. While it does not profess to be a complete treatise, and refers to a few only of the decided cases on the subject, it lays down clearly the general rules under which the death duties are imposed. The Death Duties portion of the Finance Acts 1894 to 1907 are printed in an Appendix.

The Land Registry Fiasco, The Reign of King Stork. By J. S. Rubinstein. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1907. Price 6*d.*

In this pamphlet Mr Rubinstein, a London solicitor, states the case against the Registration System as it has been in operation for a number of years in London and elsewhere in England. He comments on the recent appointment of a Royal Commission to enquire into Registration of Title in Scotland, and objects somewhat violently to Mr Brickdale, the Registrar of the Land Registry, having been nominated one of the Commissioners. Mr Rubinstein has been examined as a witness before that Commission, and has doubtless laid his views fully before the Commissioners. He has apparently made a careful and prolonged study of the subject, and condemns the Land Registry system as being complicated, unsatisfactory and expensive. It would have been better had he devoted less of his space in this pamphlet to attacking Mr Brickdale, and if he had moderated the tone in which he discusses the whole subject.

A New Guide to the Bar, containing the most Recent Regulations and Examination Papers, and a Critical Essay on the Present Condition of the Bar of England. By LL.B., Barrister-at-Law. Third Edition. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1907.

Apart from the Critical Essay with which this work begins, it will be found to contain all the information necessary to guide aspirants to the English Bar. The regulations of the various Inns of Court and of the Council of Legal Education are set forth at length, and there are a number of specimen examination papers recently set at Bar Examinations, both preliminary and in law. But if the future barrister reads the introductory chapter on the general view of the English Bar before he has paid his fees he will probably think better of it and select some other occupation. The learned author says: "At the present time there are only two ways by which a really satisfactory income can be obtained at the Bar: firstly, by influence; secondly, by a miracle." He also refers to the journalistic work which is done by so many English barristers in the years when they are waiting for briefs, and to "coaching," by which others attempt to eke out a livelihood, and he gives a warning as to the exaggerated view of the public of the incomes of the average King's Counsel or Stuff Gownsman. Perhaps the highest compliment which he pays to the work of barristers is when, in discussing their journalistic labours, he asks, "What would become of the London daily press and its morning issues if, some fine night, the Inns of Court were visited with the doom of Sodom and Gomorrha?"

THE LORD PRESIDENTS.

XIV.—SIR GEORGE LOCKHART OF CARNWATH.

In the series of portraits of the Lord Presidents which have already appeared in the "Scots Law Times," all the Presidents of the Court from Lord Stair onwards have been represented. Lord Stair was twice Lord President, from 1671 to 1681, when he was deprived of office, and from 1689 till his death in 1695. During the period between his first and second Presidentships there were three occupants of the Presidential chair—Sir George Gordon of Haddo, 1681–82, Sir David Falconer of Newton, 1682–86, and Sir George Lockhart of Carnwath, 1686–89. The third of these is the subject of our portrait this week.

Sir George Lockhart, the second son of Sir James Lockhart of Lee, a Senator of the College of Justice and for a time Lord Justice-Clerk, was born about 1630. He was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1656, and two years later was nominated "Advocate to the Protector." This early promotion he owed to his brother, the distinguished Sir William Lockhart, who was one of Cromwell's staunchest supporters, and was married to his niece. In 1658 George Lockhart was appointed Sheriff of Lanark, and he represented that county in the English Parliament 1658–1659. On the Restoration he was re-admitted as an advocate, having previously taken the oath of allegiance to King Charles. In 1663 his connection with the Protector had been so completely forgiven that the King honoured him with a Knighthood.

He was elected Dean of Faculty in 1672, an honour richly deserved by his learning and intellectual powers. Sir George Mackenzie, one of his most distinguished contemporaries at the Bar, speaks most highly of his talents. Burnet declares him to have been the greatest lawyer and ablest pleader ever known in any nation, and Lauder of Fountainhall thus describes his oratorical gifts:—"He did so charm, and with his tongue draw us all after him by the ears in a pleasant gaping amazement and constraint, that the wonderfull effects of Orpheus' harp in moving the stones seems not impossible to ane orator on the stupidest spirit."

When he was Dean he became involved in a controversy which for a time practically led to a cessation of business in the Court of Session. He claimed the right, on behalf of a client, to appeal from the Court to Parliament — a claim which was much resented by the King. Lockhart was ordered to appear before the Court and explain why he had advised his client that he had such a right of appeal. Any advocates who refused to disown the appeals were threatened with deprivation. On 23rd June 1674 a meeting of Faculty took place, with the result that the Advocates supported the Dean, and when he had been debarred by the Court he left the house followed by practically every member of Faculty. One group migrated to Haddington with Sir George, while others resided at Linlithgow, and no attention was paid to threatening proclamations issued by the Court from time to time. Ultimately, after proceedings against the members of Faculty had been raised before the Privy Council, Sir George Mackenzie intervened and persuaded many of his brethren to yield the point in dispute. Lockhart and a few more remained obdurate for a time, but finally joined in the general submission. Lockhart was readmitted as an Advocate on 28th January 1676. Thereafter he appeared in many of the important Covenanting prosecutions, generally for the defence.

In 1685 he became Lord President, and in the next year was made a member of the Privy Council and a Commissioner of the Exchequer. When he was head of the Court he was frequently consulted by King James II. on affairs of state. What his ultimate position towards the Prince of Orange might have been, has been frequently questioned, but he did not live to see the new government finally settled. On Sunday, 31st March 1689, he was shot in the High Street of Edinburgh, by John Chiesley of Dalry, against whom he had shortly before given a decision. The crime was a premeditated act of revenge, and the President had received warning of Chiesley's intention. Lockhart died almost instantaneously, and his assailant was caught "red handed." Chiesley was tortured, to discover if he had any accomplices in the crime. At his trial he confessed his guilt and gloried in the act. He was sentenced to be carried on a hurdle to the Market Cross on Wednesday, 3rd April, and there, between the hours of two and four of the afternoon, to have his right hand cut off alive, and then to be hanged upon a gibbet, with the pistol about his neck with which he committed the murder, his body to be hung in chains between Leith and Edinburgh, his right hand fixed on to the West Port, and his moveable goods to be confiscated.

The portrait of Sir George Lockhart which we reproduce with this notice is from the painting which hangs in the Parliament House.

The year 1907 will be remembered as a somewhat eventful one in the annals of the legal profession in Scotland. This is not because of changes on the Bench or the filling of many legal appointments, but from the passing of measures calculated to improve the efficiency both of the Supreme and the Inferior Courts. The Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907 has done much to simplify procedure and is the most important effort to deal with that subject since the Court of Session Act of 1868. The Sheriff Courts Act 1907 is still more important to the Inferior Courts, and affects also the Supreme Court in extending the jurisdiction of the former and removing from the latter certain classes of cases scarcely of sufficient importance for the Courts of Session. The abolition of the Debts Recovery Court, the institution to a limited extent of jury trial in civil causes in the Sheriff Court, and the conferring on the Sheriff of a jurisdiction in actions of separation and aliment, are all provisions of great importance. The Probation of Offenders Act introduces new procedure calculated to prevent those who have been guilty of one offence from joining the ranks of the habitual criminal. Both in Scotland and in England efforts have been made to deal with the arrears of business in the Courts of Appeal. The institution of the Extra Division in Scotland, and the arrangement by which the Inner House sat in three Divisions of three judges each, has been a successful experiment, and has had the effect of considerably reducing the arrears in both the First and the Second Division. In the Court of Appeal in England the arrears were even more serious than in Scotland. The Lord Chancellor proposed early in the year to pass an Act allowing the Court of Appeal to sit with two judges only, and in that way provide three Courts to work off the heavy rolls. This proposal, which would have impaired the prestige and authority of the Court of Appeal, was not insisted in, but a third Court was established in which the Lord Chancellor, Lord Halsbury, Lord Alverstone, Sir Gorell Barnes and Mr Justice Bigham acted from time to time as judges, and in this way the arrears in the Court of Appeal have been practically cleared off. Another change affecting the profession in England has been the alteration of the dates of the Long Vacation, which has not been shortened, but which now commences on the 1st instead of the 12th of August. There has been only one change on the Bench of the Court of Session during the past year, and that an unexpected one. Lord Kyllachy resigned in January last, and was succeeded by Lord Guthrie. There have been few changes among the Sheriffs and Sheriff-Substitutes. Among the former the vacancies caused by the death of Sir John Cheyne and the elevation of Lord Guthrie were filled by the appointments of Mr J. A. Reid and Mr N. J. D. Kennedy. The only new Sheriff-Substitute is Mr A. J. Young, who succeeded the late Mr Duncan Robertson at Aberdeen. Mr Edwin Adam has succeeded Mr C. T. Couper as Principal Clerk of Session, Mr Swinton Paterson was appointed in room of the late Mr Duncan Antonio, Clerk of the Bills, and Mr Smith Clark has taken the place of the late Mr Hope Finlay as Keeper of the Register of Sasines. A curious feature of 1907 is that for the first time since the institution of Queen's Counsel in 1897, a year has elapsed without any members of the junior Bar taking silk. The death roll during the year has been exceptionally heavy. Scotland has lost Lord Young, while in England Lord Davey, Lord Brampton, Lord Field, and Mr Justice Kekewich have passed away. The Faculty of Advocates has lost many of its older members. Mr Robert Taylor, the Father of the Faculty, admitted in 1836; Lord Young; Sir John Cheyne, for many years Vice-Dean; Mr Alexander Innes Shand; Mr Charles Rampini, an ex-Sheriff of Dumfriesshire; Mr P. A. Spiers, formerly Sheriff-Substitute at Jedburgh; Mr A. Erskine Murray, formerly Sheriff-Substitute in Glasgow; Mr David Duncan; Mr Duncan Robertson, and Mr George Moncrieff, are included in the death roll. The Society of Writers to the Signet has lost Sir Charles Logan, a former Deputy-Keeper and Crown Agent, and Mr James Auldjo Jamieson, also a former Crown Agent, Mr Alexander Howe, and Mr Hope Finlay; while among the Solicitors in the Supreme Courts who have died are Mr J. L. Boyd, Mr Peacock Edwards, Mr Marcus Brown, Mr J. Otto M'Queen of Aberdeen, and Mr Nenion Elliot, late Clerk of Teinds. The deaths have also been recorded of Mr William Shaw, Writer, Glasgow, Mr James Don of Brechin, and Mr Charles M'Kie, Sheriff-Clerk of Dumfries.

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES.

The Criminal Procedure Bill.

A meeting of Faculty was held in the Library on Wednesday, 8th inst., Mr J. A. Fleming, K.C., Vice-Dean, in the Chair. The Faculty approved of the Report of the Committee on the Criminal Procedure and Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Bill.

The Committee consisted of Mr R. F. L. Blackburn, K.C., Mr T. B. Morison, K.C., Mr Dugald M'Kechnie, Mr J. C. Guy, Mr A. M. Anderson, Mr John Cowan, Convener, and Mr M. P. Fraser.

The report was to the following effect :—

"The main purpose of this Bill is to simplify the law regulating Summary Criminal Procedure in Scotland, and it effects this purpose partly by consolidating, and partly by amending, existing law. It proposes to repeal the following Acts: The Circuit Courts (Scotland) Act 1828, sects. 18, 19, 20; The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881; and the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act 1875, and to substitute in lieu of the provisions contained in these Acts a new code to regulate summary criminal procedure. This new code of procedure is by Clause 4 of the Bill made applicable to all Courts possessed of summary criminal jurisdiction. The special rules of procedure contained in various private Acts of Parliament, and applicable to various cities and burghs, will thus be superseded, and uniformity of procedure in criminal cases will be secured throughout Scotland. The code contained in the Bill consists largely of a re-enactment of the provisions contained in the Acts repealed, but these provisions have in many instances been amended, and in addition the Bill contains other provisions; some of them novel, others introduced from various private municipal Acts. The principal results which will follow from these amendments and introductions are: (1) The old and somewhat cumbrous forms of complaint will disappear, and more convenient forms will take their place; (2) the present scale of imprisonment for non-payment of a fine or penalty, contained in sect. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881, will be abolished, and a new and more equitable scale contained in Clause 45 of the Bill will take its place; (3) much greater facilities will exist for obtaining review by means of a Stated Case, and this without prejudice to the other methods of review at present competent.

"In addition to simplifying summary procedure, it is proposed by means of the Bill to amend the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, to some extent, and to introduce certain minor alterations in procedure by indictment. The Bill also proposes to confer additional powers upon Sheriffs when sitting in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

"The Committee, speaking generally, approve of the objects of the Bill, of the methods adopted for carrying out its objects, and of the manner in which it is drafted. They consider, however, that the attention of the Faculty should be specially called to certain clauses of the Bill, either because of the novelty of the provisions contained therein, or because they seem to the Committee to be objectionable, or capable of being improved upon. These clauses are hereinafter referred to under headings similar to those contained in the Bill."

The report then examined the various clauses of the Bill in detail, and made a number of suggestions for amendment in certain respects, including the following :—

Definitions.

Clause 2. This clause, inter alia, provides that "county shall include any district of a county for which a separate Procurator-Fiscal is appointed." There is no other definition of "county" or "district of a county" contained in the Bill. The Committee suggest that the definition contained in the Bill should be deleted, and the following substituted :— "County" shall extent to the limits within which a Sheriff has jurisdiction in criminal matters whether by statute or at common law, and shall include "district of a county." "District of a county" shall mean any part of a county in which a separate Court is held and for which a separate Procurator-Fiscal is appointed. . . . .

Application of the Act.

(Clauses 4 to 8.)

Clause 5 provides :—

The jurisdiction and powers of all courts of summary criminal jurisdiction, except in so far as the same may be altered or modified by this Act, shall remain as at present, and the justice of peace court and justices of the peace, and also any judge of police or burgh magistrate, shall, without prejudice to any other or wider powers conferred by statute, have within their respective jurisdictions the same jurisdiction and powers as police magistrates under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, or any Act amending that Act.

The Committee consider this clause too vague, and are of opinion that the latter part of the clause, beginning "and the justice of peace court," should be deleted. They suggest that the powers of Magistrates and Justices of Peace when trying common law offences should be set forth in detail.

Clause 6. This clause provides that certain sections of the Criminal Procedure Act 1887 shall be applicable to summary procedure. These sections are already all made applicable to summary procedure by section 71 of the Criminal Procedure Act. That section also provides that sections 66 and 67 of the Criminal Procedure Act shall be applicable to summary procedure. These two sections are properly omitted from the enumeration in this clause. Section 66 dealt with the proving of previous convictions, but in terms which were inapplicable to summary procedure. Section 67 taken along with section 71 provided that previous convictions should be kept from the knowledge of the Court until the case was decided. This was impossible in summary procedure. In view of the difference between this clause and section 71 of the Criminal Procedure Act, the Committee suggest that that section be specially repealed.

Clause 8. This clause, inter alia, provides that sentences may be signed either by the Judge or by the Clerk of Court. The Committee consider that sentences should invariably be signed by the Judge. They understand that the only reason suggested for this proposed alteration in what has been a well-established practice in Summary Courts, is to economise the time of the presiding Judge. The Committee consider that the abbreviated forms of sentence provided in Schedule D are by themselves amply sufficient to meet this point. They suggest that the words "and sentences" should be inserted between the words "search" and "shall" in line 21, and that the words "and sentences" between "orders" in line 22 and "may" in line 23 should be deleted.

Boundaries of Jurisdiction.

(Clause 9.)

This clause provides for the case of offences committed close to the boundaries of the jurisdiction of two or more Courts, and for the case of offences committed in the course of a journey by road, railway or water, and for the case of offences committed in different jurisdictions. The clause seems well drawn, and the only amendment the Committee have to suggest is the insertion of the word "railway" between the words "road" and "river" in line 21.

Extension of Powers of Sheriff.

(Clauses 10 to 14.)

Clause 10. This clause defines the maximum punishments which may be imposed by the Sheriff upon a person convicted summarily of a common law offence. It, inter alia, empowers him to pass sentence of three months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour. The Committee approve of this extension of the Sheriff's power. The clause concludes as follows:—"The total period of imprisonment imposed under this section shall not exceed three months, unless where several charges from several counties are embraced in one complaint, when the imprisonment may exceed three, but not exceed six months." The Committee fail to see why the Sheriff should be empowered to pass a heavier sentence because offences happen to have been committed in different counties. They recommend the deletion of these words.

Clause 11 provides:—

Where a person is charged with any offence inferring dishonest appropriation of property, or attempt thereat, and such person has been at least twice previously convicted of any such offence, or where a person is charged with any offence inferring personal violence aggravated by at least two previous convictions of any offence inferring personal violence, he may on summary conviction by the sheriff be sentenced to imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months with or without hard labour. If the prosecutor desires to take advantage of the provisions of this section he shall add to the charge the words "whereby the accused is liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months." This section shall not apply to offences of such a serious character as to be suitable only for trial by indictment.

The Committee approve of this additional power being given to Sheriffs. They suggest that the last sentence of the clause should be deleted, as unnecessary. . . .

Procedure at Trial.

(Clauses 26 to 40.)

If the Bill is passed as it stands one result will be that an accused, brought before the Court on a warrant of apprehension, will be deprived of his right to demand an adjournment of forty-eight hours. The Committee consider that this right should be retained, and suggest that a clause similar to section 11 of the Summary Procedure Act 1864 should be inserted immediately after Clause 20.

Clause 26, inter alia, provides:—"At the first calling of the case, when the accused is present, the charge, or the substance thereof, shall, unless a copy has been previously served upon him, be read to him, and he shall thereupon be required to plead in common form." The Committee consider that in any case the accused when placed at the bar should be verbally informed of the charge against him, and suggest the deletion of the words "unless a copy has been previously served upon him."

Clause 27. This clause provides for the amendment of the complaint, and farther provides that if the Court is of opinion that the accused may be in any way prejudiced in his defence on the merits of the case, it "may" grant such adjournment as may seem just. The Committee are of opinion that in such circumstances the accused should be entitled to demand an adjournment, and suggest that the word "shall" should be substituted for the word "may" in line 2.

Where the accused pleads guilty to the charge or to such part thereof as may be accepted by the prosecutor, his plea shall be recorded, but it shall not be necessary for the accused to sign his plea, and the Court shall thereafter pronounce sentence at the same or any adjourned diet.

The Committee are of opinion that signature of a plea of guilty by the accused should not be dispensed with. They suggest that the words "but it shall not be necessary for the accused to sign his plea" should be deleted, and that the words "signed by the accused, or, if he is unable to write, by the Judge or Clerk of Court, and" should be inserted before the word "recorded" in line 7.

Clause 31. This clause provides for libelling and proving previous convictions in a manner somewhat similar to the method presently employed in procedure by indictment.

Clause 33. This clause, inter alia, empowers the Court to go, along with the accused and his law agent, and the prosecutor, to the house of any witness who is unable to attend the Court on account of age, illness, or absence from the country, for the purpose of taking his evidence. The Committee consider this clause unworkable, and suggest its deletion.

Clause 38 provides :—

In the trial of any case in a justice of peace court, if the justices are equally divided in opinion as to the accused's guilt, the charge or part thereof on which such division of opinion exists shall be found not proven.

The Committee consider that if an accused person has satisfied half of his judges that he is innocent he should be entitled to a verdict of not guilty. They suggest that the words "the charge or part thereof on which such division of opinion exists shall be found not proven" should be deleted, and the following words substituted : "the accused shall be found not guilty in respect of such charge."

Conviction and Sentence.

(Clauses 41 to 57.)

Clause 41. This clause empowers a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to mitigate penalties imposed by Act of Parliament in various ways. The enumeration of the ways in which penalties may be mitigated is, in view of the Probation of Offenders Act 1907, incomplete, and the Committee suggest that the words "in addition to the powers already conferred by Act of Parliament" should be inserted between the words "have" and "the" in line 5.

Clause 43 provides :—

The Court may in its discretion, if such course appears to meet the justice of the case, dismiss with an admonition any person found guilty of a statutory or common law offence.

The Committee approve of this clause.

Clause 45. This clause regulates the amount of imprisonment which may be awarded in the event of non-payment of a penalty or fine. It also, inter alia, provides that "If in any sentence or extract sentence the period of imprisonment inserted in default of payment of any penalty or of caution being found is in excess of that competent under this Act, such period of imprisonment shall be held as being reduced to the maximum period under this Act applicable to such default, and the Clerk of Court shall have power to correct such sentence and extract accordingly." The Committee consider that this portion of the clause should be deleted. In any event they consider that a sentence should only be altered by the Judge who has pronounced it. It appears to them undesirable to authorise a Clerk of Court to alter a sentence because in his opinion it is outwith the Judge's power to pronounce it. . . .

Clause 51, inter alia, provides :—

Every sentence under this Act, unless where otherwise provided for, shall be pronounced in open court in presence of the accused, but it shall not be necessary that such sentence be written out or signed in presence of the accused. The signature, either of the presiding judge or of the clerk of court, at the end of the record of the proceedings of each day, shall be sufficient to authenticate all the minutes of procedure, and proceedings taken on that day.

The Committee, in commenting on Clause 8, have already indicated their opinion that sentences should be signed only by the Judge who pronounces them. They suggest that the last sentence above quoted should be deleted from this clause, and that the words "provided that such sentences shall be signed by the presiding Judge upon the day on which such sentence is pronounced" should be inserted in lieu thereof.

Clause 52. This clause provides that the finding "guilty as libelled" shall apply to statutory as well as common law crimes. It also provides : "It shall not be necessary to set forth in any finding or sentence the mode or alternative mode in which the contravention was committed, although alternative modes are libelled in the complaint." The Committee suggest that these words should be deleted from the clause. It seems to them essential that the accused should know precisely what he was convicted of. In view of the definition of "offence" contained in the Bill, they suggest that the word "crime" in line 22 should be deleted, and the word "offence" substituted therefor.

Clause 53 provides : "It shall be competent to correct any error in the minutes of procedure or in the extract of any sentence or order, and such correction shall be sufficiently authenticated by the initials of the Clerk of Court." The Committee consider that this clause should be deleted, or if it is allowed to stand some indication should be given as to the person who is entitled to make the alteration, and also as to the time within which it must be made.

General.—Section 23 of the Summary Procedure Act 1864 provides, inter alia, for sentences running consecutively in certain circumstances. The Committee suggest that a similar clause should be inserted in this Bill.

Review.

(Clauses 58 to 75.)

Clause 58 provides :—

On the final determination of any cause brought under this Act, either party to the cause may, notwithstanding any provision in any Act of Parliament excluding other methods of review, make application to the court to state a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary, and it shall thereupon be competent to bring under the review of the High Court by stated case—

(1) The relevancy of the complaint ;
(2) Irregularities in procedure ;
(3) Any alleged error of the court in point of law ;
(4) The sentence imposed if of undue severity ; and
(5) Generally any matter which may at present be competently reviewed by suspension or appeal under the Act 20 Geo. II. c. 43 or otherwise ;

but providing that review on the merits shall only be competent where such review is permitted by the statute under which proceedings have been taken and a note of the evidence has been preserved.

No provision is made in the Bill for the purpose of compelling a magistrate to state a case. The Committee suggest that the first five lines of the clause should be deleted, and the following substituted :—"On the final determination of any cause brought under this Act, any party to the cause shall, on application being made therefor and subject to the conditions hereinafter provided, be entitled to have a case stated by the Court for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary. It shall be." They also suggest that the word "advocation" should be inserted between the word "suspension" and the word "or" in line 12.

Clause 59 provides that an appeal may be taken at the time when judgment is pronounced or within five days thereafter. The Committee suggest that the words "application to have a case stated shall be made" should be substituted for the words "such appeal may be taken" occurring in line 20 of the clause. . . .

Clause 61. This clause empowers the Court to grant interim liberation to an appellant who is in custody, on such conditions as it may think fit. An appellant, if dissatisfied with the decision of the inferior Court on the question of interim liberation, may appeal to the High Court. The Committee approve of this clause.

Clause 62. Upon the assumption that their suggestion regarding caution is adopted, the Committee suggest that this clause should be altered as follows: —"The Clerk of Court, unless consignation or caution has been ordered in terms of sect. 60, shall, within ten days from the application for a Stated Case, prepare a draft Stated Case, and shall within the said period send the said draft to the appellant or his agent, and a duplicate thereof to the respondent or his agent, and such case shall be framed as nearly as may be in the form contained in Schedule F annexed to this Act. Where consignation or caution has been ordered, the said period of ten days shall run from the date on which consignation is made or caution found. When an appeal has been taken against the said order to make consignation or to find caution, the said period of ten days shall run from the date of the final determination of the appeal, unless on appeal the order to make consignation or to find caution has been affirmed, in which case the said period shall run from the date on which consignation is made or caution found."

Clause 63. The Committee suggest that the words "within fourteen days" should be inserted between the words "adjustment" and "the" in line 28.

Clause 64. The Committee suggest that this clause should be altered as follows: — Insert between "taken" and "and" in line 32, "or by the Clerk of Court," and between "shall" and "transmit" in the same line, "on payment of his fees for preparing the case."

Clause 65. The Committee suggest that this clause should be deleted and the following substituted:— "The appellant, within five days of receiving notice from the Clerk of Court that the case has been signed, shall pay the Clerk's fees for preparing the same, and failing such payment he shall be held to have abandoned his appeal." . . . .

Clause 75. This clause, inter alia, provides that suspensions must be brought within one month of the date of conviction or sentence. The Committee suggest that the period should be three months.

In concluding their remarks upon the subject of review, the Committee suggest that provisions should be inserted in the Bill for the purpose of enabling an accused convicted before a Sheriff and Jury to appeal to the High Court upon the ground that the Sheriff has misdirected the Jury upon points of law.

Amendment of Criminal Procedure Act 1887.

(Clauses 76 to 78.)

Clause 76. This clause, inter alia, dispenses with the necessity of taking a declaration from the accused if, on being brought before the Sheriff, he or his agent intimates that he does not desire to emit a declaration. The Committee consider that the fact of this intimation having been made should be recorded, and suggest that the words "such intimation shall be recorded" should be inserted between the words "charge" and "it" in line 38. . . .

Forms.

The Committee approve of the forms contained in the various schedules appended to the Act. . . .

JOHN COWAN, Convener.

DISSENT.

I dissent from the report on two small points: —

(a) Clause 28. This clause provides that where the accused pleads guilty it shall not be necessary for him to sign his plea. At present, under the Edinburgh Police Acts, an accused person in the Police Courts of Edinburgh pleading guilty does not require to sign his plea, and so far as I know no miscarriage of justice has resulted from the exercise of this provision. The Glasgow Police Acts make, I understand, the same provision for Glasgow. The present Bill proposes to extend the Edinburgh and Glasgow powers to all Summary Courts. I should not object to matters in this respect remaining as they are, but the Committee's proposal would not only prevent such extension, but would, standing Clause 4 of the Bill, make the Police Courts of Edinburgh and Glasgow revert to the old practice of requiring signed pleas. No one who knows the work of a city Police Court would ever suggest this. I have seen more than one hundred persons charged as drunk and incapable pass the bar of the Police Court on a single morning. The provision for taking their pleas without the trouble and annoyance to them, the magistrate, and the clerk, and the consequent waste of much time, should not be abolished.

(b) Clause 38. I think the clause in the Bill is properly expressed so long as the verdict or finding of "not proven" is competent. Where the two justices differ as between "guilty" and "not proven," the Committee think that both justices should be considered to be wrong, and the finding should be entered up as "not guilty," even although neither of the two justices could affirm that finding.

JOHN C. GUY.

Members of the legal profession have learned with much regret that on account of the state of his health Lord Pearson has been obliged to apply for leave of absence for six months. Prior to the rising of the Court for the Christmas recess, his Lordship was not feeling well, and was advised to take a complete rest for a time. As his Lordship had been in constant attendance in Court, the news of his illness was quite unexpected. It appears, however, that on several occasions when other Judges were absent, and when the Inner House was sitting in three Divisions, his Lordship had attended in his place in Court when he was far from fit for the work. The result of this has been to make a period of rest quite necessary. His Lordship has left Edinburgh, and intends to spend the winter in Egypt. Leave of absence for six months means that Lord Pearson will probably not resume his official duties till after the summer recess, which extends from the middle of July to the middle of October. One result of his Lordship's absence is that any further sittings of the Extra Division—if such should be necessary — will have to be postponed till after Lord Pearson's return. No Judge has had a better record of constant attendance in Court than Lord Pearson during the eleven years since his appointment. His long tenure, extending over eight and a half years, of the position of Lord Ordinary on the Bills gave him an undue share of anxious judicial work, and he never spared himself in the performance of his duties. It is hoped that his well-deserved rest will restore him completely to his usual health.

A SITTING of the High Court of Justiciary took place in Glasgow on 26th and 27th December. Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Dundas were the presiding Judges. Mr Wm. Thomson, A.-D., assisted by Mr Hendry, prosecuted in the Old Court, and Mr Grainger Stewart, assisted by Mr Macdiarmid, in the New. There were eleven cases involving fifteen persons.

THE DEBTS RECOVERY COURT.—Presiding in Glasgow Debts Recovery Court on 23rd December, Sheriff Scott Moncrieff referred to the changes brought about by the new Sheriff Court Procedure Act, and said that that was the last sitting which would be held of the Debts Recovery Court, which expired on 31st December. As a legal institution that Court was not, perhaps, very ancient; yet it extended beyond the memory of almost every one now practising within those buildings and the lifetime of the vast majority of the present Bar. It was said never to have been a popular Court, and in fact the number of cases annually called had remained very much the same, in spite of the increase of business in other departments and the great increase of population. Yet it seemed a Court well suited for a commercial community, as affording a cheap and speedy method of settling mercantile disputes. It had always appeared to him that its main defect lay in its connection with that ancient statute which created the triennial prescription. Had the Act been extended so as to cover all the cases which could be raised under the Small Debt Act, and provision made for the proper remuneration of agents in cases of appeal, that would have greatly added to its usefulness. While they wished, he was sure, all success to the new procedure, they parted, not without some feelings of sentiment, with their old friend the Debts Recovery Act

THE LATE ALEXANDER ERSKINE MURRAY, ESQ., ADVOCATE.—We regret to record the death, which took place at his residence at Parkstone, near Bournemouth, on 17th December, of Mr Alexander Erskine Murray, who for thirty-six years was one of the Sheriff-Substitutes of Lanarkshire. Mr Murray was a son of the Hon. James Erskine Murray, advocate, and a grandson of the seventh Lord Elibank. His mother was a daughter of the late Mr James Erskine of Aberdona, from whom he inherited the well-known Alva Collection of portraits, cabinets and papers. Mr Murray was born in 1832. His father, who practised for a time at the Australian Bar, was in 1843 killed in an encounter with pirates in Borneo. Spending the early years of his boyhood in Australia, he came to Scotland and was educated at the Edinburgh Academy, King's College, Aberdeen, and at the University of Edinburgh. As a student he distinguished himself greatly, both at Aberdeen and Edinburgh. At King's College he was first in the senior Humanity class, and at Edinburgh he was first in Aytoun's class of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, and second in the Conveyancing class. For some years he was employed in the office of Messrs Walker & Melville, W.S. In 1856 he was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates, among others who joined the Bar in that year being Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear. In his early years at the Parliament House he acted as a law reporter for newspapers, and in 1860 officiated as an interim Sheriff-Substitute at Glasgow and at Falkirk. At the end of 1861 he was appointed a Sheriff-Substitute at Glasgow. He ultimately became senior Sheriff-Substitute, and retired in 1897. During his long period of official work in Glasgow he maintained the highest reputation as a judge, and was one of the most esteemed and best-known men in the West of Scotland. His resignation was much regretted by his colleagues, by the legal profession, and by the public.

Before he left the western city to take up his residence in Edinburgh, the legal profession in Glasgow united to do him honour, and to express appreciation of his personal qualities and judicial work. At a representative gathering, he was the recipient of a presentation, accompanied by gifts for Mrs Erskine Murray. In making the presentation the Dean of the Faculty of Procurators, Dr Murray, said that Mr Erskine Murray's work had been constant and exacting, but he had faced it resolutely, and had given his time and energies to it ungrudgingly. Every case that came before him was thoroughly and exhaustively considered and disposed of in its turn and without delay. That a British judge is impartial goes without saying, but a perfectly impartial judge may not always be without bias. He may have views as to the law, as to the existence of custom, as to the value of certain kinds of evidence, which give a set to his opinions. Sheriff Murray, he said, was not only absolutely impartial, he had also a perfectly open mind. He heard every argument, he considered every piece of evidence, before he allowed himself to come to any decision. No part of the duties of a judge was more delicate and required greater tact than the ascertainment of the facts of a case. On questions of fact Sheriff Murray had a singularly accurate judgment, and in this particular branch he thought that Mr Sheriff Murray was about as perfect as could be.

Mr Erskine Murray resided in Edinburgh from 1897 till about two years ago, when, compelled to seek a more genial climate, he migrated to Dorset. He was for many years an elder of the Free Church in Glasgow, and later a member of the congregation of St Andrew's United Free Church in Edinburgh. He is survived by a widow, three sons and a daughter.

The Late W. J. N. Liddall, Esq., Advocate.—The death took place on 27th December at Findatie, Kinross, of Mr William J. N. Liddall, advocate, of Navitie and Findatie, and of 26 Great King Street, Edinburgh. Mr Liddall, who was born in 1853, was a distinguished scholar. In 1870 he was Dux of the Edinburgh Academy. He entered the University of Glasgow, and in 1873 was awarded the Greek Blackstone Prize. Later he matriculated in the University of Edinburgh, and among the honours which he gained there were Dr Muir's Prize for Sanscrit (1876), Medal in the Advanced Greek Class (1877), and the Greek Travelling Scholarship (1879). He graduated as M.A. of Edinburgh and as B.A. London. Mr Liddall was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1879. He was never in large practice, and his name appears in the reports more frequently as litigant than as counsel. He fought questions in connection with his properties both in Kinross and in Edinburgh. But though he was not in regular practice, he maintained his connection with the Parliament House and with Scots law. He was an honorary Sheriff-Substitute of Fife and Kinross, and he acted on several occasions as an interim Sheriff-Substitute. He was a candidate for the Chair of Celtic Languages and Literature in Edinburgh University when that Chair was founded in 1882. For three years from 1897 he sat as a member of the Edinburgh School Board, where he took a special interest in the financial policy of the Board. He was the author of a volume entitled "Place-names in Fife and Kinross," published by Messrs Wm. Green & Sons in 1896.

The Late James Campbell, Esq., Sheriff-Clerk of Caithness.—We regret to record the death, which took place at Wick on 29th December, of Mr James Campbell, Sheriff-Clerk of Caithness. For more than two years Mr Campbell had been in indifferent health, and he succumbed to the effects of a chill which he sustained some few weeks before his death. A native of Caithness, Mr Campbell was born in 1856. At the age of seventeen he entered the office of Mr Robert Maclachlan, who was then Sheriff-Clerk of Caithness, and after serving for some years as Depute, he succeeded, on Mr Maclachlan's death, to the vacant office. Mr Campbell held also the public appointments of Auditor of Court and Clerk of Lieutenancy. In his earlier life he was an active Volunteer, and held a commission in the local rifle corps. For many years he acted as Honorary Secretary to the Wick branch of the National Lifeboat Institution, in which he was keenly interested. As a public servant who came much in contact with all classes, Mr Campbell was held in high esteem, and not least by the legal profession, by whom his accurate and courteous discharge of his official duties was justly appreciated. In private life Mr Campbell's death, at the early age of 51, will be deplored by a large circle of friends whom his genial and kindly nature had gathered round him. Mr Campbell leaves a widow and family.

Golden Wedding of Sheriff Mackenzie of Dornoch.—Sheriff and Mrs Mackenzie, in celebration of their golden wedding, gave a reception and ball in the Royal Hotel, Tain, on the 23rd December, to about one hundred guests. Sheriff Mackenzie, who is in his 77th year, was married fifty years ago to his cousin, a daughter of the late William Mackenzie of Holme, Inverness. An interesting feature of the evening was the presentations to the Sheriff and Mrs Mackenzie from the staff of Tain Royal Academy, the Bar of Dornoch, Sutherland ladies and gentlemen, and Ross-shire ladies and gentlemen. Sheriff Mackenzie, who is the senior judge in His Majesty's dominions, was appointed Sheriff-Substitute at Dornoch in 1859.

Mr J. Duncan Millar, M.A., LL.B., advocate, has been selected as Liberal candidate for the St Andrews Burghs.

Mr Archibald Hamilton, Solicitor and N.P., has assumed Mr James Ballantine, M.A., LL.B., as a partner. The business will in future be carried on at 131 West Regent Street, Glasgow, under the firm name of Archibald Hamilton & Ballantine. Mr Ballantine served his apprenticeship with Mr John Pairman, S.S.C., Edinburgh, and qualified as a law agent in 1896. Since qualifying, he has been in the employment of Messrs Borland, King, Shaw & Co., writers, Glasgow, acting latterly as principal clerk to the late Mr William Shaw, senior partner of the firm, and also as Mr Shaw's assistant in connection with the class of Mercantile Law in the University of Glasgow.

CHARLES H. BROWN, ESQ.,

ADVOCATE.

Few men at the Bar have more friends among their brethren than Charles Herbert Brown. He touches life at many points, and has the pleasant gift of using all his interests to get in touch with men. The goodwill of the fireplace is with him, yet does not exclude the closer intimacy of special friends.

Mr Brown, who is the son of an eminent Scottish banker, was born in Glasgow in 1868. He was educated at Rossall and at Glasgow University, where he graduated as LL.B. in 1893. Two years later he was called to the Bar, having served his apprenticeship in the office of the late Professor Roberton, and gained some additional experience with Messrs Ronald & Ritchie in Edinburgh. He has served upon several committees of the Faculty of Advocates, and is presently one of the reporters upon probabilis causa.

Mr Brown acted upon the editorial staff of the recently issued Scots Digest. In 1902 he was appointed a reporter for the "Scots Law Times," and after a year's work in the Second Division, which his increasing practice began to render too exacting, was appointed to discharge the less arduous office of reporter in the Outer House. Although his practice has gone on consistently increasing, Mr Brown continued to act as reporter till the beginning of the present year. He has now too large a practice to allow of his retaining his appointment, and has been forced to sever a connection with the paper which resulted in a series of lucid and incisive reports.

As a pleader Mr Brown has special gifts of clearness and force of statement. He is an excellent lawyer, and while insisting upon a complete delivery of his brief, he never fails to secure the attention of the Bench. In politics he is a Conservative, and has done his full share of platform and general work.

As a social entertainer of chosen friends, Mr Brown is perhaps without a rival. His happy choice of subject and mastery of technique give to his interpretations the fine flavour of mirth and scholarly address. As the former pupil of the present editor of "Punch," Mr Brown shows his breeding by wide knowledge of the literature of humour. He is in particular a profound Gilbertian, but lays this writer under less frequent contribution than others of whose work the rendering has not in the same measure been canonised.

Mr Brown is fond of travel, and has seen much of the world, both within and beyond Europe. He has an excellent history in games, and ambitious projects in golf.

THE FEBRUARY WEEK ADJOURNMENT OF THE COURT OF SESSION. — A notice has been issued stating that the Lords, under the authority of the 4th section of the Court of Session Act 1868, resolve to adjourn the Court from Saturday the 8th to Saturday the 15th February next inclusive.

THE First Division did not sit on Wednesday. Lord Kinnear was attending a meeting of the Church Commission, and as Lord Stormonth-Darling was, through indisposition, absent from the Second Division, no judge was available to sit with the Lord President and Lord M'Laren to make up a quorum in the First Division.

FACULTY OF ADVOCATES.

The anniversary meeting of the Faculty of Advocates was held on 15th January in the Advocates' Library—the Vice-Dean, Mr J. A. Fleming, K.C., presiding. The Faculty Officers for the year were appointed as follows: Dean of Faculty, Mr William Campbell, K.C.; Vice-Dean, Mr J. A. Fleming, K.C.; Treasurer, Mr A. A. Grainger Stewart; Keeper of the Library, Mr W. K. Dickson; Auditor, Mr P. A. Blair, C.A. Mr C. H. Brown and Mr A. J. Alison were appointed Reporters on Probabilis Causa Litigandi, and the following gentlemen were appointed Counsel for the Poor:—Mr L. H. Strain, Mr J. Hossell Henderson, Mr J. A. Christie, Mr C. A. Macpherson, Mr F. C. Thomson, Mr J. L. Wark. The reports of various Committees were presented and approved.

THE LIBRARY.

Mr James Clark presented the report of the Curators of the Library, with which was incorporated the report of the Keeper of the Library for the year 1907. The Keeper's report contained the following items:—

Accessions.—The following is a list of the accessions to the Library in 1907:—

Volumes received per London Agent, 8395; direct from Publishers, 640; and by Purchase and Presentation, 550; amounting to	9,585
Parliamentary Bills and Papers	1,935
Pamphlets	3,494
Parts and Volumes of Periodicals, per London Agent, 18,835; direct from Publishers, 5400; and by Purchase, 1240	25,475
Volumes and Pieces of Music	3,228
Ordnance and other Maps	2,068
Total number of items received	45,785

The following table gives the number of items received into the Library during the last ten years:—

In 1898	42,654
In 1899	40,804	decrease, 1850
In 1900	41,811	increase, 1007
In 1901	43,856	„ 2045
In 1902	42,819	decrease, 1037
In 1903	47,243	increase, 4424
In 1904	43,273	decrease, 3970
In 1905	45,956	increase, 2683
In 1906	45,676	decrease, 280
In 1907	45,785	increase, 109
Total in 10 years,	439,877

Library Extension.—The alterations on the buildings of the Parliament House which are at present being carried out by H.M. Office of Works, the plans of which were submitted to and approved by the Faculty on 7th February 1907, include a considerable alteration of and addition to the premises occupied by the Library.

Donations.—Among the donations may be noted a rare French engraved portrait of David Hume, presented by Sir John Batty Tuke; a copy of the fine illustrated catalogue of the pictures in the collection of Mr J. Pierpont Morgan, in three volumes, compiled by Mr Lockett Agnew, presented by Mr Morgan; and a valuable collection of seventeenth-century pamphlets, presented by an anonymous American donor.

Manuscripts.—The calendaring of the mediæval manuscripts in the Library by Miss Catherine R. Borland has been continued during the year. Miss Borland has completed the examination and description of the Biblical, liturgical, and other theological manuscripts, the books of Decretals and other books of Canon and Civil Law, and the ecclesiastical records and chartularies. She is now working on the collection of mediæval poems and romances. Her Research Scholarship has been renewed for another year, so that the Library will have the benefit of her work until October next.

The collection of early manuscript maps of Scotland by Timothy Pont, Robert and James Gordon, and John Adair has been entirely rearranged, mounted, and re-bound. These maps were in an unsatisfactory condition, and at my request Mr C. G. Cash, F.R.S.G.S., who has made a special study of early Scottish cartography, reported on their condition and on what treatment of them seemed desirable. In consequence of this report the maps were carefully dismounted, arranged according to their authorship, inlaid when necessary, and remounted on linen. They have now been re-bound in three volumes. A detailed descriptive catalogue of them was prepared by Mr Cash, and was printed in the "Scottish Geographical Magazine" for November 1907, accompanied by an account of the recent examination and rearrangement of the maps. The thanks of the Curators have been conveyed to Mr Cash for his valuable services to the Library in this matter.

The cataloguing of the Gaelic manuscripts was interrupted in the early part of the year by the illness of Professor Mackinnon, but has proceeded steadily since the Long Vacation. Professor Mackinnon hopes soon to be able to print an instalment of his catalogue.

An annotated hand-list of the Northern manuscripts, based upon the Latin catalogue which was compiled by Mr T. G. Repp about 1830, has been prepared by Miss Barclay.

A certain amount of binding and repairing has been done to some of the older manuscripts, including the rebinding of the Rosslyn Missal, which was in a precarious condition.

Cataloguing and Placing of Printed Books.—All books and pamphlets received during the year have been catalogued, and the catalogue slips have been incorporated, and all books and pamphlets have been placed, with the exception of those reserved for exhibition in the Reading Room, those in circulation as new books, and a certain number of those allocated to Room L, from which all the books have been temporarily removed

A hand-list of books printed in Scotland down to 1640, copies of which are in the Library, has been prepared.

Exhibition of Books and MSS.—A selection of books and manuscripts was exhibited in the Laigh Parliament House up to the beginning of the Long Vacation. During the winter session this exhibition has been temporarily discontinued in consequence of the exclusion of the public from the Library. Two new double desk cases have been provided out of the sum given last year for this purpose by the Dean of Faculty, and a further selection of objects will be placed on exhibition as soon as it is possible to re-admit the public.

THE CHALMERS HOSPITAL.

Mr C. H. Brown presented the Report by the directors of the Chalmers Hospital. The report, which contained the following statistics was approved.

The number of patients treated during the year was :—

In the Public or Free Wards		386
In the Private Wards, paying Board		222
In all		608
Whereof were Surgical Cases	366
„ Medical „	242
		608
The daily average number in the House was		35·71
Total operations		339
The number of Outdoor Patients treated in the Waiting-room and Surgery was		3535
Whereof Surgical Cases	3075
„ Medical „	460
		3535
Operations under general anæsthesia in Outdoor Patient department		156
Dressings in ditto		16,373

The Books and Accounts for the year have been examined by the Auditor, and a copy of his Report is appended to the Abstract of Accounts.

The ordinary income for the year amounted to	£3517	18	7
and the ordinary expenditure to	3102	2	0
leaving a surplus of	£415	16	7
During the year the Directors made certain alterations and additions which were found to be necessary in the kitchen premises at a cost of	181	9	6
reducing this surplus to	£234	7	1

The Directors request the trustees to allow them the whole revenue of the Trust for the year 1908.

The Directors desire to express thanks to the many friends who have during the year made donations of money, game, flowers, books, and magazines; also to those who have responded to the appeal for old clothing for the use of poor patients on leaving the Hospital. The Directors renew the appeal, and desire to remind members that the Matron will be glad to send for parcels on receipt of a postcard.

The Directors have pleasure in acknowledging the valuable services of the Surgical, Medical, and Nursing Staff, and they must also express their indebtedness to the clergymen of St Cuthbert's Church for their services on Sundays, which are greatly appreciated by the patients and staff of the Hospital.

They have to record with great regret the death of Sir Patrick Heron Watson, who was associated with the active work of the Hospital for forty years. They have also to record with great regret the death of Sir John Cheyne. This occasioned a vacancy in the Directorate, which was filled up by the appointment of Mr C. H. Brown.

THE LATEST ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

There appears to be no limit to the energy and versatility of Mr C. E. Green. A Scotch law publisher, he has not only issued practically all the most notable modern works on Scots Law, but he has also published "The Encyclopædia of the Lrws of England," and has undertaken the reprinting of the whole series of English Reports prior to 1865. He has published an "Encyclopædia of Medicine" and an "Encyclopædia of Accounting," and only the other day he appeared as author of an interesting work on the County of East Lothian. Now he is acting in the dual capacity of publisher and joint-editor of an "Encyclopædia of Agriculture," which is to be completed in four large volumes.* The volume before us is the first instalment of that work, which promises to be of very great value to all farmers in Scotland and England, and also to everyone else interested in farming, whether as landlords, land agents, or otherwise. The book presents in an easily accessible form all the practical information which can usefully be conveyed by book. It is very well got up, and most of the live-stock articles are illustrated by very good photographs. The articles are contributed by well-known authorities in the agricultural world, and their names are a guarantee that the articles are the product of real knowledge and experience. Among those who contribute to the present volume are Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr Jesse Collings, the Rev. Dr Gillespie of Mouswald, Sir Richard Cooper, Mr John Clay of Chicago, Principals Wrightson and Percival, and Professors Hamilton, Cossar Ewart, Long, Lloyd, Penberthy, Drummond and Malden. Dealing with the book from a legal point of view, there are articles on the Agricultural Holdings Acts, Allotments, Arbitration, Copyholds, and the Law of Distress in England. The somewhat complicated provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Acts are very clearly set out and explained, and particular attention is directed to the Agricultural Holdings Act 1906, which is of great importance at the present time. There is also a full discussion of the Law of Distress for Rent in England, which sets forth clearly and accurately that difficult subject. The article on Aberdeen-Angus cattle is a particularly good one, and gives a history of the progress of that very successful breed—a progress which should form an incentive to all stock farmers to keep the best stock they can, and to go on improving that stock as much as possible. It is well illustrated by two very good photographs of an Aberdeen-Angus bull and cow. The Scottish breed of draught-horses is not forgotten, and the article on Clydesdales traces what is known of the early history of the breed, and gives an interesting account of many famous horses and their successes in the showyard. The various lines of descent are clearly worked out, and the names of the best-known breeders are given, as also some interesting particulars about prices. The article on Ayrshire cattle, which is also illustrated by two good photographs, will prove of great interest to any one interested in the dairy. It contains some very instructive information about the milking qualities of Ayrshire cows, and confirms their widely-known reputation as good milkers. The advice as to feeding and management of dairy cows given in this article is thoroughly practical, and deserves to be carefully read by any one keeping dairy cows. Scotland's two famous breeds of sheep, the Blackfaced and the Cheviot, are fully and ably dealt with, and here again the photographs are particularly good. In particular, the Cheviot ram shown in the photograph looks a sheep conspicuous alike for his fine fleece of wool and his qualities as a first-class mutton sheep. The Devon cattle and the Devon Longwool sheep, which are influential breeds much thought of in the West of England, are shortly and accurately dealt with, and there is also an interesting article on the Border-Leicester sheep. The dairy also receives full attention in various instructive articles which deal with butter and the making of Cheddar cheese, both English and Scotch. There is also a very good article on cream-separators. Calf-rearing and cow-keeping are each dealt with in a way which deserves careful attention, and there is also some very valuable information on veterinary subjects. The article upon abortion in cattle is one which should be very carefully studied by everyone who keeps cows, as it treats very fully and explicitly of the subject, and sets forth the foreign and colonial views thereon, as also the remedies which have been found successful in various cases. Careful treatment and attention seems all that is necessary for the successful application of such remedies; and having regard to the very serious losses which are caused by the disease, no trouble would appear to be too much to get rid of it. Another article which should be mastered by every farmer is that upon anthrax. The risk to human life involved in skinning an animal which has died of this dread disease is so great that every stock owner or person in charge of stock should have it brought home to him as much as possible. There are useful articles upon Basic Slag and Bone Manures, and the article upon Bacon Curing will be read with interest by all who keep and kill their own pigs. There is a long and useful dissertation on Buildings for the Farm, and this contains many practical hints, and is illustrated by sets of plans adapted to various classes of farms. Nor are Cottages for the Farm forgotten, and here again the plans are a distinct feature. In this connection it is interesting to note the divergences between the Scotch and the English cottages. Altogether the book is one of sterling value, and is a mine of useful practical information presented in a very readable form. T. H. W.

Mr Robert Campbell, procurator and chief assistant to the late Mr John A. Stewart, solicitor, Perth, and Mr John Campbell, procurator and assistant to Messrs Condie, Mackenzie & Co., W.S., Perth, have acquired the business of the late Mr John A. Stewart, which they are to carry on at Clydesdale Bank Buildings, 5 St John Street, Perth, under the name of John A. Stewart & Campbell.

Aberdeen Property and Income Tax Commissioners. Appointment of Clerk.—The Aberdeen Property and Income Tax Commissioners met on Friday, 10th inst., at the office, 27 King Street, for the purpose of appointing a clerk in succession to the late Mr J. W. Robson. Mr J. C. Bennett, advocate, was unanimously appointed to the vacant office. It is understood that the applications for the vacant office were numerous, and that after deliberating for about an hour the Commissioners unanimously resolved to appoint Mr Bennett, who was summoned to the meeting, and accepted office. The remuneration of the office is about £600, out of which the clerk has to provide his office staff. Mr Bennett, who is the proprietor of the estate of Allathan, was a member of the Commission previous to being appointed clerk.

At a meeting of the trustees of the Church of Scotland Ministers' Widows' Fund, held on 14th inst., Mr F. P. Milligan, W.S., was appointed clerk and law agent in room of the late Mr H. H. Inglis, W.S.

The Late DAVID PATRICK, Esq.,

Solicitor, Hamilton.

We regret to record the death of Mr David Patrick, Solicitor and Honorary Sheriff-Substitute at Hamilton, which took place at his residence there on Wednesday, 15th January. Till within a few days of his death he had been going about his work as usual, and the sad news came as a great shock to the community of Hamilton, where he was most highly esteemed.

A native of Hamilton, Mr Patrick was born there sixty-eight years ago. He was educated at Hamilton Academy and at the Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and received his legal training in the office of Messrs Moncrieff, Paterson, Forbes & Barr, Writers, Glasgow. In 1865 he joined the firm of Aikman & Keith in his native town, and on the death of Mr William Aikman two years later the present well-known firm of Keith & Patrick was formed. When the Clydesdale Bank opened a branch in Hamilton in 1867, Mr Patrick was appointed agent, a position which he occupied with great diligence and unswerving fidelity, until illness laid him aside a few days ago. He was also assessor for Income Tax and Inhabitated House Duties for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, an office which now devolves on the Surveyor of Taxes in terms of Act of Parliament. In 1889 he was appointed, along with Mr Robert Weir, Joint Procurator-Fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court for the Hamilton District.

For many years Mr Patrick was Dean of the Hamilton Society of Solicitors, an appointment which he resigned in 1893 on receiving his commission as an Honorary Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire. In this judicial capacity he did much excellent work both in the Civil and Criminal Courts. A member of Council of the Incorporated Society of Law Agents in Scotland since its incorporation, he was one of those named in the Royal Charter, and he has served for two years as vice-president of the Society.

Mr Patrick served the Burgh of Hamilton for several years in the capacity of Town Councillor and Magistrate. He entered the Council in the early eighties, and about the middle of that decade was raised to the magistracy, from which he retired in 1893. Interested in educational affairs, he was one of the first members of the Burgh School Board after the passing of the Education Act in 1872. Mr Patrick, in early days, was associated with the Volunteer movement, and for a period was Captain of the Bothwell Company. In private life he had many friends.

Before proceeding with the business of the Hamilton Sheriff Court on the 17th inst. Sheriff Thomson said:—Dean of Faculty and gentlemen of the Bar, the ever busy hand of death has taken from us this week a much respected member of our Bar and an Honorary Sheriff-Substitute of this Court. Deeply indeed do we deplore the loss of Mr David Patrick. For forty years he was a busy practitioner in Hamilton, and in legal and business circles, not only here but throughout the whole West of Scotland, he was ever highly esteemed and universally trusted. Personally, I feel unable to give adequate expression to my profound regret that this most kind and esteemed friend has passed away never to return, and that I shall see his face no more, nor ever receive again his genial, kindly greetings; but I feel that many now present, who have known him for longer than I have been privileged to do, will understand, and share my sorrow at his loss. He was an excellent type of the thoroughly trusted family solicitor; a shrewd, cautious, and friendly adviser, having the real interest of his clients ever at heart, and I have no doubt these qualities materially contributed to the eminent position which his firm of Keith & Patrick now occupies in the West of Scotland. His high standing in the legal profession fully justified his promotion to the various official positions which he filled during his long career, and in them all he acted firmly, wisely, and conscientiously, and to the great satisfaction of the community. I need not dwell specially on his work as an Honorary Sheriff-Substitute, for all present here to-day know how well he discharged the duties of the office. It is pleasant to think that he has two sons to perpetuate his name and carry on his career in our profession. I fear his death may have been hastened by the distressing suspense and anxiety which he and his wife and family have been sustaining during the past few months as to the fate of a much-beloved son at sea. The circumstance must still more deeply evoke our sympathy with them in this period of anxiety and bereavement, and I know that the Bar joins with me in tendering to them in this dark hour our tenderest and sincerest sympathy.

Mr William Stodart, Dean of Hamilton Society of Solicitors, said:—On behalf of the members of the Bar I desire to associate myself with your Lordship's remarks. We all deplore the sudden and unexpected loss which this Court and the whole district has suffered from the removal by death of a life so useful and so public-spirited as that of Mr Patrick. Many of us remember him as an able and careful practitioner at this Bar, and as an active member of our Society, and for many years our Dean, and latterly as one of the Hon. Sheriff-Substitutes of this county. And we all know what a life of usefulness in various walks he has left behind him. We desire to concur in the eloquent tribute which your Lordship has paid to his memory, and that our feelings may be added to those which your Lordship has expressed.

The subject of the portrait in our next issue will be:—

The Late Sir John Lawson Walton, K.C., M.P., Attorney-General for England.

The Late Sir David Brand, Advocate, Sheriff of Ayrshire.—It is with great regret that we record the death of Sir David Brand, which took place at his residence in Edinburgh on Wednesday morning. The learned Sheriff had been in delicate health for some time back, but during last year his health had somewhat improved. He had been Sheriff of Ayr since 1885, and in October of last year he received a congratulatory address from the members of the local Bar in his sheriffdom, in which they expressed their sense of his judicial and public services to the county. He acted as Chairman of the Crofters Commission since the passing of the Crofters Act, and since 1897 as a member of the Congested Districts Board. His important work on the Crofters Commission was very fittingly recognised when, in June last, he received the honour of knighthood from His Majesty. On that occasion his portrait, along with a biographical sketch, appeared in our columns. [S.L.T., 6th July 1907, Vol. XV. p. 41.]

Referring to his death, the "Glasgow Herald" says: "It is by his work in connection with the Crofters and Deer Forests Commissions that Sir David Brand's name will be long and gratefully remembered, particularly in the Highlands. The Crofters Commission came into existence in 1886. He was its first and only chairman. It was directed to amend the tenure of land by crofters in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. The counties brought under the Act were Argyll, Inverness, Ross and Cromarty, Sutherland, Caithness, Orkney and Shetland, and the first duty of the Commissioners was to ascertain what parishes within these counties were crofting parishes within the meaning of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act; that is to say, parishes wherein there were in 1886, or had been within eighty years prior thereto, holdings consisting of arable land held with a right of pasturage in common with others, and in which there then were tenants of holdings from year to year who resided on their holdings, the annual rent of which did not exceed £30 in money. There were 163 civil parishes in the seven counties to which the Act applied. The Commissioners determined that of these 151 were crofting parishes. Every such determination was confirmed by the Secretary for Scotland from time to time, so that there are only twelve parishes in the whole of these counties which have not been determined to be crofting parishes up to the present time. From the commencement of their labours in October 1886 till the end of December 1887 they fixed fair rents for 1767 holdings. The old rents of these amounted to £12,457, and the fair rents fixed amounted to £8617, being a reduction of £3840 per annum, or of nearly 31 per cent. The arrears dealt with in connection with those applications amounted to £23,533. Of the total, the sum of £14,418 was cancelled, or 61·283 per cent. On account of the large number of applications that came in at the instance both of landlords and crofters, the amending Act of 1888 was passed. It enabled the Commissioners to delegate their powers to any one of their number, assisted by two assessors. Thus from the beginning of 1889 the Commissioners were able to hold three separate Courts simultaneously, and to get through a large amount of work. In the first year of the three Courts fair rents were fixed in 3425 cases. The old rents of these amounted to £16,162, and the fair rents were established at £11,453, the reductions in the aggregate averaging over 29 per cent. The arrears dealt with in that year amounted to £36,050, of which £23,063 was cancelled, or nearly 64 per cent. Up to December 31, 1906, the Crofters Commission had fixed fair rents in 20,732 cases, and had conducted revaluations in 3428 cases of enlargement of holdings. They had also considered 412 miscellaneous cases and 1191 appeals under the Act of 1891, making a total of 25,763 cases. The number of inspections before disposing of these various cases was 19,123. They had also to dispose of 102 applications to sist proceedings for removal in respect of non-payment of rent, 706 applications to prohibit the sale of effects on holdings for the same cause, and 244 applications under the Crofter Commission Grazing Regulation Act. The extent of land dealt with in fair rent applications was 204,477 acres in individual occupancy; and 1,420,968 acres in common occupancy."

LONDON LETTER.

Temple, 22*nd January* 1908.

The Court of Appeal has made great progress during the past term in the reduction of the mass of arrears which had accumulated almost to the point of scandal. One heavy species of work which has clogged the machinery of the Court is the Workmen's Compensation business. The scheme of the original Act was to avoid litigation; and to this end, besides euphoniously labelling County Court proceedings "arbitration," the Workmen's Compensation Acts provide that appeals, instead of lying (like those in all other cases) to the King's Bench, and thence to the Court of Appeal and House of Lords, shall go direct to the Court of Appeal. Consequently, the latter Court is thronged with business which would otherwise be left to the numerous Judges of the King's Bench Division, with possible assistance from the Chancery side. The result has been congestion. Drastic steps were needed to meet the case, which was made worse by the illness of Lord-Justice Farwell, and the frequent absences of Lord-Justice V. Williams on his duties as Chairman of the Welsh Church Commission. The remedy of constituting Courts consisting of two judges is now little resorted to, except as an emergency measure. It depends on the consent of litigants, and is not popular. Consequently, for the first time in its history, the Court adopted the expedient of sitting in three full Divisions. As there are only six ordinary judges of the Court (the Master of the Rolls and five Lord-Justices), outside assistance was necessary. Again for the first time in its history, the Court of Appeal presented some approximation to its ideal as Lord Selborne conceived it, when it was to have been a final Court, staffed by the high judicial officers who have actually been mere ornamental members of it. The Lord Chancellor has had enough to do in Parliament and in the House of Lords. The Lord Chief-Justice and the President of the Admiralty Division have sunk into the routine of their Courts of first instance. But last term, all three of these high officers were busy presiding in three branches of the Appeal Court. Towards the end of term, Lord Halsbury found time from his literary labours (your readers will by this time have seen the first volume of his "Encyclopædia of English Law," designed to replace the venerable "Abridgements" of Viner and Bacon) to come to their relief. Since Lord Herschell's lamented death there has been no ex-Chancellor available until now. The most remarkable step, however, was one recommended in these columns some months ago. Judges of first instance can be called upon to sit in the Court of Appeal, provided they are not withdrawn from the Chancery or Admiralty Division, and not from the King's Bench Division during the time of the spring and summer circuits. Under this provision, the Appeal Court was strengthened by the temporary inclusion of Mr Justice Bigham. It is freely stated that this is only the prelude to an elevation which would meet with much general approval. The Admiralty President's place in his own Division was temporarily filled by Mr Justice Bucknill.

Among the causes célèbres of the term was the trial of Wood at the Central Criminal Court, which greatly enhanced the reputation of judge and counsel (Mr Justice Grantham, Sir Charles Mathews, and Mr Marshall Hall, K.C.). The regretted death of the Right Hon. Sir A. Kekewich gave occasion for a suggestion that his successor might be attached to the King's Bench, instead of to the Chancery Division, which has been well abreast of its work ever since it has had six judges instead of five. Nine years ago, its arrears were so considerable that Mr Justice Bigham was requisitioned to reduce them; and the present writer well remembers the flurry which the rapid methods of the new judge caused in the haunts of equity. Cases which the leisurely Chancery lawyer had anticipated would "become active" in a space to be counted by months, suddenly showed signs of an activity which might be called volcanic. This was a temporary measure, which was superseded by the appointment of a sixth judge. Since then it has been possible for the Chancery judges to be grouped in pairs, each pair having a common set of officials, and taking respectively witness cases and other business in turns. The practical convenience of this arrangement is such, that the suggestion to go back to the old system of five judges was received with little or no favour. A Chancery barrister was duly appointed, in the person of Mr Eve, K.C., and it is safe to say that no more popular appointment could have been made. It is probable that no one ever saw Mr Justice Eve out of temper. He is not only placid, but full of abounding vitality and good humour. It was never necessary in a Chancery action which raised keen contests of fact, to "take in" a common lawyer to cross-examine, if Mr Eve had already been retained: he would have made a great reputation with juries if fate had not settled him on the Chancery side.

A remarkable case has been decided by the Privy Council on the obligations of aliens who continue to reside in this country after the outbreak of war with their own. It puts these obligations a great deal higher than has hitherto ever been suggested. Their allegiance to the Crown is, of course, local, and depends solely upon the fact that they are actually within its dominions by their own will and consent. It has been said that such a local allegiance nevertheless binds them, to the extent of preventing them from afterwards going back to help their own country if once they take advantage of the permission (now generally accorded them) to stay. But it seems never to have been imagined that, if their own sovereign actually conquers the territory where they live, displacing the local sovereign, their temporary and local allegiance to the latter still continues. Such a position is, indeed, historically untenable. For under conceptions of warfare not two centuries old, the conqueror became the actual sovereign even of the natural-born subjects of his enemy living in the conquered country. The sovereignty of their old master vanished. Much more did his authority vanish over the conqueror's own subjects. Yet in De Jager v. Attorney-General of Natal (1907, A.C. 326), an unfortunate Boer, living in Natal, was sent to jail for five years and fined £5000 for submitting to the demand of his own country for his services when the Transvaal forces occupied the district of the colony where he was settled. What could he do? one asks. Unless permission to remain after the outbreak of war amounts to naturalisation (and in Lynch's case it was laid down that it is treason to get naturalised in an enemy's state), it seems obvious that when the whole reason of local allegiance (the power of the local sovereign) is gone, the duty of allegiance to the natural sovereign must supersede it. Their Lordships say in their advice that, unless all persons in the country are bound in the same way as natural-born subjects, the modern practice of allowing enemies to remain within its limits would be too dangerous to be continued. It does not appear to have occurred to them that, on the contrary hypothesis, it will become too dangerous and dubious a privilege to be of much advantage to the persons to whom it is so graciously accorded. They will become subject to the liabilities of two conflicting allegiances, and entitled to the benefits of neither. For certainly the local sovereign cannot complain of their ill-treatment by their own state.

The composition of the Court of Criminal Appeal has been made public. Besides the Lord Chief Justice, the list includes the names of Justices Channell, Lawrance, Lawrence, Phillimore, Darling, Ridley, Pickford and Walton. Three will be a quorum, but the number must be odd. It is difficult to predict how far the Court will go in reviewing the decisions of juries who have studied the demeanour of the witnesses at first hand. Much, it may be conjectured, will depend on the view of the judge who tried the case, if it should be disclosed. Otherwise all precedent points to the conclusion that the jury's verdict will be set aside in very few instances.

The Limited Partnerships Act 1907, which introduces the principle, which Sir F. Pollock has so long advocated, of partnerships en commandite does not appear likely to be taken much advantage of Limited partnerships will involve almost as much trouble to form as limited companies, and they will give far less protection. The objects they are designed to subserve can almost as well be attained by loans to the partners, under the protection of Bovill's Act; and altogether, the business community is not attracted by the prospect which the Legislature has kindly spread before them.

The death of Sir J. Lawson Walton, the Attorney-General, is on all hands deeply deplored. With tragic suddenness it deprived the profession of a justly admired and honoured leader. The "silver-tongued" eloquence of the late Attorney was the least factor among the attributes that endeared him to those who knew him. The Solicitor-General who is thus marked out for promotion (for it can hardly be thought that he will relinquish the prospect of the Chancellorship in favour of the Home Office, as has been irresponsibly suggested) is Sir W. S. Robson, K.C. He is Member for South Shields, and the name of the Recorder of that town, Mr Atherley-Jones, K.C., who had a record majority at the General Election, is mentioned as that of a likely successor in the office, Mr R. Isaacs being also a popular favourite for the post in question.

NEW SCOTTISH KING'S COUNSEL.

The King has been pleased, by warrants under His Majesty's Royal Sign Manual, to direct letters patent to be passed under the Seal appointed to be kept and made use of in place of the Great Seal of Scotland, granting the rank and dignity of Counsel to His Majesty to James Clark, Esq., and Edwin Adam, Esq., members of the Scottish Bar.

Mr James Clark was admitted to the Faculty in 1883, and is well known both in the Parliament House and in the City of Edinburgh, where he has devoted much time and energy to various branches of public work. He has taken a great interest in the affairs of the Faculty of Advocates, having served on numerous Committees and acted as a Curator of the Library. Mr Clark has always maintained his reputation as a pleader of conspicuous ability and a well-read lawyer. In 1906 he edited a new edition of Lord Fraser's book on Parent and Child, which has been recognised as an excellent piece of work, and he contributed some of the best articles which appeared in Green's Encyclopædia of Scots Law. Since 1905 he has sat as a member of the Edinburgh School Board. He is Chairman of the Directors of the Royal Hospital for Sick Children, and he is Colonel of the 9th V.B. (Hrs.) R.S., and a member of the recently appointed County Association of the City of Edinburgh under the Territorial Forces Act. A Unionist in politics, he has frequently been asked to stand for Parliament, but has always declined the honour. A portrait and biographical sketch of Mr Clark appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. VII. p. 141.

Mr Edwin Adam, who has also received the honour, is the Principal Clerk of Session in the First Division. His portrait appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. IX. p. 73, and the details of his more recent work and legal appointments were referred to in these columns when his appointment as Principal Clerk was announced at the beginning of the present session.

THE LATE FRANCIS GEORGE, ESQ., SOLICITOR, BANFF.—Our readers will have heard with much regret of the death of Mr Francis George, County Clerk of Banffshire, which occurred on Friday, 17th January, as the result of a cold caught in the last week of 1907. He was born at Monquhitter nearly sixty-five years ago, and spent his youth at Turriff, where he went to the Public School, and had the good fortune to come under the influence of Mr G. Ogilvie, afterwards well known as the headmaster of George Watson's College in Edinburgh. Mr George obtained his legal training in the office of Mr William Barclay, solicitor, Banff, and afterwards at Edinburgh University, where he took a distinguished place in all his classes. Returning to Banff in 1867, he became a member of the Society of Solicitors, and entered upon a career of great public utility which terminated only with his death. He held a very large number of public offices. In 1875 he entered the Town Council, and two years later was appointed Dean of Guild. In 1879 he became a Bailie, retiring a year later on his appointment as Clerk for the Police Commissioners. From 1880 to 1900 he was Procurator-Fiscal; in 1900 he became Town-Clerk of Banff, and for the last seventeen years of his life he acted as County Clerk for the county of Banffshire. In the exercise of his many duties, Mr George inspired, in all who came in contact with him, a great respect for his ability and untiring energy. The municipal work of Banff owes much to him, and it was mainly owing to his efforts that the great improvement of the water supply was carried through. Mr George dies regretted by a large circle of friends, and much sympathy is felt for his widow and family.

JUBILEE OF THE STEWARTRY SHERIFF-CLERK.—On 10th January Mr William Nicholson, Sheriff-Clerk of the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, completed his fiftieth year as Depute and Sheriff Clerk. Mr Nicholson, among his other offices, holds those of Clerk of the Peace, Clerk of the Lieutenancy, and Clerk to the Southern, Northern, and Western District Committees of the County Council. Mr and Mrs Nicholson celebrated their golden wedding recently, and were the recipients of many handsome presents. Before commencing the business of the Court, Sheriff Napier congratulated Mr Nicholson upon the happy circumstance, and said that, as one who had worked along with him there for more than seven years, he sincerely expressed the hope that Mr Nicholson would be long spared to occupy his present position. In the evening Mr Nicholson was entertained to dinner by the members of the Faculty, of whom there was a large attendance.

THE HEARING OF MOTIONS FOR NEW TRIALS.—On Thursday, 22nd January, counsel moved, in Single Bills, on an application for a new trial, that the usual first order be pronounced fixing a day for the hearing in the Summar Roll. The Lord President intimated that in future, on counsel applying for a new trial, a preference would be given to such hearings, and that they would be heard almost at once. His Lordship indicated that counsel would have been heard upon the motion in question upon the following day, but in view of the fact that this was a new regulation, and that counsel were not prepared to proceed on so short notice, the hearing was fixed for early next week.

NEW ACT OF SEDERUNT.

The following Act of Sederunt has been passed providing the manner of advertising petitions for extension of term of Patents under the 18th section of the Patents and Designs Act 1907.

EDINBURGH, 11*th January* 1908.

The Lords of Council and Session, considering that by section 18, sub-section (1) of the Patents and Designs Act 1907 it is provided that a patentee may, after advertising in manner provided by Rules of the Supreme Court his intention to do so, present to the Court a petition praying that his patent may be extended for a further term; that by section 94 of said Act it is, inter alia, provided that in the application of the Act to Scotland the provisions of the Act conferring a special jurisdiction on the Court as defined by the Act shall not, except so far as the jurisdiction extends, affect the jurisdiction of any Court in Scotland in any proceedings relating to patents or to designs, and with reference to any such proceedings the term "the Court" shall mean any Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session, and the term "Court of Appeal" shall mean either Division of that Court; and further, that the expression "the Court" shall, in reference to proceedings in Scotland for the extension of the time of a patent, mean such Lord Ordinary; and further provides that the expression "Rules of the Supreme Court" shall, except in section 92 of the Act, mean Act of Sederunt: and considering that it is expedient to prescribe the manner in which a patentee desirous of presenting a petition for the extension of the term of his patent to the Court in Scotland shall advertise his intention to do so:

THEREFORE the said lords do ENACT and DECLARE that a party intending to apply by petition under section 18 of the said Patents and Designs Act 1907 shall advertise his intention to do so twice in each of the Edinburgh Gazette and the London Gazette, and once in each of the Scotsman and The Times newspapers.

In such advertisements the applicant shall state the object of his petition, the name of the Lord Ordinary to whom the petition is to be presented, and the date on which it is to be so presented. He shall also give notice therein that any person desirous of objecting to the granting of the petition must within fourteen days after said date give written intimation to the Clerk of Court to such Lord Ordinary, that he intends to lodge objections.

And the Lords APPOINT this Act of Sederunt to be entered in the Books of Sederunt, and to be printed and published in common form.

DUNEDIN, I.P.D.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Johnson v. Clark.

PROPERTY — MORTGAGE — LOCAL CUSTOM.—Held that a local custom by which a married woman might, with her husband's consent, mortgage a life interest in lands which she had under her father's will, without being separately examined, was invalid to avoid the contract, as being unreasonable. Observed that "a custom to be valid must be such that, in the opinion of a trained lawyer, it is consistent, or, at any rate, not inconsistent, with those general principles which, quite apart from particular rules or maxims, lie at the root of our legal system. Thus a custom which is for the advantage of an industry or trade may be good, although it bear hardly on the individual; while, on the other hand, a custom which is for the advantage of the individual only and is prejudicial to the public, or a class of the public, is bad; for the common law, in principle, imposes obligations on the individual for the benefit of the public, and not on the public for the benefit of the individual."—Chan. Div. (Parker, J.)—28*th November* 1907.

The "Europa."

SHIP—SEAWORTHINESS.—Held that when a vessel was unseaworthy at the commencement of a voyage, the unseaworthiness, although it was the breach of a condition precedent, did not void the whole contract as in a question with the holder of a bill of lading and render the shipowner a common carrier for that voyage, but that the holder of the bill of lading must shew that any damage he suffered was due to the particular matter in respect of which the vessel was unseaworthy.—Prob., Div. and A. Div. (Bucknill and Bargrave Deane, JJ.).—3*rd December* 1907.

Pickford's Ltd. v. London and North-Western Railway Company.

RAILWAY—RATES.—Decision of the Railway and Canal Commission (supra, p. 40) affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—3*rd December* 1907.

Samuel Brothers Ltd. v. Whetherly.

CONTRACT — LIABILITY — VOLUNTEERS. — Decision of Walton, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 179), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Earl of Halsbury, Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Bigham, J.).—4*th December* 1907.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Acts Relating to the Income Tax. By the late Stephen Dowell, M.A. Sixth Edition, Revised, Altered, and Considerably Enlarged. By John Edwin Piper, LL.B. (Lond.), of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Assistant Solicitor of Inland Revenue. London: Butterworth & Co., 1908. Price 21*s. net.*

It is five years since Mr Piper issued the fifth edition of this work, the first for which he was responsible as editor. Since then there has been made annually a considerable addition to the case law on the subject, and the provisions of the Finance Act of last year, introducing the modified rate on earned income where the total income of the taxpayer does not exceed £2000, have made an important modification on the existing law. A new edition was therefore doubly necessary. Mr Dowell's book has for many years deservedly held the reputation of the most authoritative work on the subject. It is in constant use. Indeed, in Income Tax cases the Court is generally referred to the page in "Dowell" where the sections under discussion are dealt with. Of the new edition it need only be said that great care has been taken to make it completely accurate and up to date. One criticism, however, applicable to Scottish cases, must be mentioned. In cases in the English Courts, references are given to all series of reports. In dealing with the Scotch cases there is frequently a reference to the "Scottish Law Reporter" only. There should of course be a reference to all three series of reports, but at any rate the citation in Rettie, Fraser, or the Session Cases should always be given. The want of this causes serious inconvenience, and we trust that in any future edition the editor will insert the proper citation of decisions in the Scots Courts.

The Law relating to the Transactions of Moneylenders and Borrowers. By G. Grenville Alabaster, of the Inner Temple and Western Circuit, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons, Ltd., 1908. Price 6*s.*

Moneylenders and their ways have of late been much before the public. Mr Labouchere, in a recently issued supplement to "Truth," gave a long list of persons carrying on that trade, adding their real names, with short notes couched in very strong language on their character and methods of doing business. Parliament dealt with the question in 1901, when an Act, following on a report of select committee appointed in 1897, was passed placing moneylenders under certain restrictions and regulations. Besides ordering registration and the filing of certain particulars in regard to all moneylenders, the Act provided that where proceedings were taken in any Court by a moneylender for the recovery of money lent, "and there is evidence which satisfies the Court that the interest charged . . . . is excessive . . . . and that the transaction is harsh and unconscionable, the Court may reopen the transaction and take an account between the moneylender and the person sued . . . . and relieve the person sued from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the Court to be fairly due." The interpretation of the powers conferred on the Court by this section has been found far from easy, and various views have been taken by different judges as to its meaning. In the earlier cases under the Act the tendency of the decisions seemed rather to favour the contentions of the moneylenders. It was argued that, however excessive the interest, there must be something more to render a transaction harsh and unconscionable. A more liberal interpretation was given to the Act in the recent case of Samuel v. Newbold, 1906, A.C. 467, where Lord James said that excessive interest might itself be sufficient to render a contract harsh and unconscionable, and that the burden was upon the moneylender in such a case to justify the transaction. Mr Alabaster has dealt with his subject very fully. He has analysed and quoted from the cases in a most satisfactory way, and so far as the English Courts are concerned his book contains the whole law on the subject. There have been a few cases in the Outer House in Scotland, and these are not referred to, but in none of them has the Act been dealt with in the same detail as in the English cases. We cordially recommend Mr Alabaster's book to our readers.

Principles of Company Law. By Alfred F. Topham, LL.M., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition. London: Butterworth & Co., 1908. Price 7*s.* 6*d.*

In this little book, which is written mainly for the use of students, the leading principles of the law of Joint Stock Companies under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1907 are clearly and shortly explained. The arrangement of the book is logical, the citation of authorities is sufficient and up to date. For instance, in the chapter on Memorandum of Association, we notice a reference to the application by the Cyclists' Touring Club to alter its memorandum ([1907], 1. Ch. 269). In an appendix there is printed the text of Revised Table A, issued in 1906, and of the Companies Act of last year.

Where to Look for your Law, as set out in the latest Legal Text Books, with dates of latest Authorities. London: Stevens & Sons, Ltd., 1907. Price 1*s.*

To get the right book on a subject is often half the battle, and this work will certainly be of great assistance in that direction. It takes the form of a subject catalogue of English Law Books, and extends to over 100 pages. The date of the last edition of each book mentioned is given, and where no special book exists on a subject the reader is referred to a more general work where it is dealt with. So far as England is concerned, the catalogue of law books seems very complete. Scottish, Irish, Colonial and Foreign law are referred to at the end of the book. The list of Scots Law Books is very far from complete, and the omissions are somewhat startling. The Lord Justice-Clerk's Criminal Law, Professor Ranken's Landownership, Mr Mackay's Manual of Practice, Mr Graham Stewart's book on Diligence, Mr Dove Wilson's Sheriff Court Practice, Professor Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, and Lord Stair's Institutions are among the books which are omitted. This criticism, however, is very limited in its application. We think it would add to the usefulness of the work if in any future edition the published price of the books mentioned were given.

Encyclopædia of the Laws of England, with Forms and Precedents by the most eminent Legal Authorities. Second Edition, revised and enlarged. Vol. VIII. Land-man to Maritime Territory. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1907. Price 21*s.*

Very recently we noticed the seventh volume of this Encyclopædia, and the eighth, which brings the work half way to completion, was issued at the end of last month. Among the more important contributions to this volume are the articles on the Land Clauses Acts, by Mr Craies; Licensing, by Mr Woodcock; Life Insurance, by Mr Fitzgerald, K.C.; Local Government, by Mr Blake Odgers, K.C.; Lunacy, by Mr Kerly, revised by Mr Wood Renton; and Marine Insurance and Maritime Lien, by Mr G. G. Phillimore. A large number of the articles have Forms and Precedents appended to them.

Price 7*s.* 6*d.*

This volume aims at giving in concise and simple form the essential principles of the Roman Law as expounded in the Institutes of Gaius and Justinian, along with a certain amount of information from other sources, and an occasional reference to English parallels. Such a book is at once humble and ambitious: humble in that it seeks to provide the beginner with an introduction to the subject; ambitious because of the difficulty of being brief without sacrifice of interest or lucidity. The authors have achieved their end with no small measure of success. Their work is careful and business-like, always to the point, and nearly always clear and unambiguous. Interest, however, has been unduly disregarded in the Introduction, which summarises in twenty short pages the history of Roman law from the earliest times. This is the least useful part of the book, being not only necessarily dogmatic, but rather unnecessarily bald, and too fragmentary to be followed with understanding by a beginner. The epitome of Justinian, and that of Gaius, which follows it, are more successful, albeit capable of improvement here and there. The account of correality and solidarity, for example, is over-concise, and would hardly enable a novice to grasp the somewhat difficult distinction between the two. Again, the subject of "diligentia" is set forth in a manner positively misleading, for the uninitiated would gather that a higher standard was applied to a specially careful man than to one whose usual degree of care was only average. A little expansion in parts would remove blemishes without adding materially to the bulk of the volume. But such shortcomings are only occasional. On the whole, the book is clear and trustworthy, and should prove useful to students.

Law for the Million. By a Practical Lawyer. A Legal Handbook. London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd., 1907. Price 1*s.*

The millions for whom this book is written will be found outside rather than within the legal profession. "Ignorantia juris nemenem excusat," and the information which this handbook contains will doubtless be of use to many citizens. It is not likely, however, seriously to lessen the number of occasions on which the prudent layman will apply to the skilled lawyer for professional advice.

The Juridical Review. Vol. XIX. No. 4. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1908.
Price 3*s.* 6*d.*

Among the contributors to the concluding part of the current volume of the Juridical Review are Lord Guthrie, Mr G. W. Wilton, Mr Louttit Laing, Mr Alexander Taylor, Mr Addison Smith, and Mr David Chapel, advocates, and Mr A. H. Charteris and Mr W. W. Learmonth. The first place in the part is very properly given to Mr Wilton's article on the author of the well-known treatise on the Law of Sale. In the varied and adventurous career of Mr Benjamin, Mr Wilton has chosen a most interesting subject. He has spared no pains either in collecting materials from all available sources, or in the grouping of the interesting facts—many of them never recounted before—which are the result of his investigations. The article attains a very high standard of merit, and will give pleasure to many readers. A portrait of Mr Benjamin forms the frontispiece of the part. Mr Chapel deals in an interesting way with the two recent cases (Lord Polwarth v. North British Railway Co., and Whitehouse v. Pickett) dealing with the liabilities of common carriers and of innkeepers respectively, and Mr Laing discusses the Act setting up a Court of Criminal Appeal in England.

The Late SIR JOHN LAWSON WALTON, K.C., M.P.,

Attorney-General for England.

The subject of our portrait this week is Sir John Lawson Walton, the Attorney-General, whose much regretted death took place at his London residence on Saturday, 18th January. In his death the legal profession, the House of Commons, and the country have sustained a great loss, and one which will be felt all the more keenly because the great lawyer has died before attaining to the high judicial honours in which the career of the official leader of the Bar — either here or in England — usually culminates. No Attorney-General has died in office since Sir William Follett, who died in 1845, and whose statue is to be found in Westminster Abbey. In Scotland the last Lord Advocate who died while holding that position was Sir James Stewart, whose death took place, during his second term of office, in 1713.

John Lawson Walton, who was born in Ceylon in 1852, was the son of a well-known Wesleyan missionary. He was educated in England at the Merchant Taylors' School in Lancashire, and later at London University, where he took high honours in Law though he never became a graduate. After serving his articles in the office of a firm of solicitors in London, he abandoned that branch of the profession and entered as a student at the Inner Temple. There he won the position of first prizeman in Common Law, and devoted the hundred guineas which he so obtained to securing a place as pupil in the chambers of Mr Jeune, afterwards the distinguished President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. He was called to the Bar in 1877, and soon achieved success. In one of his early cases he defended at Newcastle Assizes the King of the Gipsies, who was charged with wilful murder. Mr Justice Manisty, who summed up in favour of the major charge, described the case as the worst he had ever known, and Walton won no little credit when he induced the jury to bring in a verdict of manslaughter. Those interested in the turf may remember the case of Wood v. Cox, in which he distinguished himself as counsel for the defender as junior to Sir Charles Russell.

In 1890 he became a Queen's Counsel. Among others who took silk along with him were two of his colleagues in the present Government—Mr Asquith and Mr Haldane. As a leader he at once took a high place. He was very prominently brought before the public as counsel for the plaintiff in the action for defamation in which Mrs Kitson was awarded £12,000 of damages against Dr Playfair, a distinguished physician. From that time he was in the very front rank, and his name appeared in most of the causes célèbres. The Hartopp, the Constantinidi and the Cowley divorce cases, and the Whittaker Wright trial are among his cases best known to the public; but he was equally eminent as a leader in the more purely legal controversies which are of greater interest to the profession. He was seen at his best in such cases as Allen v. Flood, Janson v. The Driefontein Consolidated Mines, The Queen v. The Justices of Kent, and the recent Revenue cases against the Duke of Richmond and Gordon. A man of fine presence, dignified and courteous in his manner, fair in argument, and with a conspicuous gift of eloquence, he had the essential natural qualifications of a great advocate, and he early earned—and maintained throughout his whole career—the confidence of the Bench and the respect of his brethren at the Bar.

It was in 1892 that Mr Lawson Walton first sought Parliamentary honours. In that year he was adopted as Liberal candidate for Battersea, but retired in favour of Mr John Burns, and contested Central Leeds against Mr Gerald Balfour; but he was unsuccessful. Later in the same year he was elected for South Leeds, a constituency which he continued to represent till his death. He was a successful Parliamentarian, and during last session he gained great credit by the manner in which he piloted the Criminal Appeal Act and the Public Trustee Act through the House of Commons. He was appointed Attorney-General on the formation of the Liberal Government in 1905.

In the course of his remarks in the King's Bench Division on Monday, 20th January, Mr Justice Grantham, referring to the death of the Attorney-General, said: "For many years there was no one more regularly in all the leading cases, and no one in whom the public had such confidence. I am able to speak with singular sincerity and singular knowledge of him as a Queen's Counsel, and subsequently as a King's Counsel, because I happened to be on circuit when he last went circuit as a junior, and again when he went as Queen's Counsel, and, I think, the two circuits prior to his attaining 'silk,' when he was one of what we would call the heavy juniors. He was one of the most respected juniors in the profession, and had a very large practice on the North-Eastern Circuit. The time came when it was thought desirable he should take 'silk.' He took it, and in his first circuit he had a very fair share of the work; rather more than a junior 'silk' obtains as a rule. But he made his name so rapidly as a leader by the judgment he showed in the conduct of his cases that by the next circuit he had obtained the lead on that circuit, and the work from that time rolled in. Whether on circuit or in London, there was no member of the Bar who was more highly respected by his professional brethren and the public and the judges than Sir John Lawson Walton. We trusted him, and that is the great thing, and that is the main element of success in a man. The judges always trusted him, and knew that nothing would preclude him in his professional work and labour from upholding the position and honour of his clients. He never overstepped the boundary which, as a high-minded counsel, he always set before himself as the limit to which he might go in advocating the claim of his client."

The Solicitor-General, Sir William Robson, said: "I have to thank your Lordship for the sympathetic words you have uttered on the death of our leader. The news of his sudden death, as your Lordship says, has been received with sincere and universal sorrow. During the comparatively short time he filled the office of Attorney-General he performed his duties with sincerity and distinction. He maintained his high position, and he will always be remembered by the English Bar as one of its most accomplished chiefs. You have spoken of his great intellectual gifts. We all know them, but perhaps our thoughts are turned more naturally to his unfailing courtesy and charm of manner. He never lost those great characteristics. I think it has been said of him by some writer in the Press that he was always master of himself. Those who went circuit with him knew how complete that mastery was. No doubt during the last few years he felt the strain of a great practice at the Bar. That particular side of his work was not increased, but very substantially diminished, in the office to which he succeeded, but any relief he might have had in that respect was perhaps lost in the great additional strain that fell upon his time and health from the active interest he took both in professional and public affairs. The strain told upon his health, but never seemed to tell upon his temper or control under the most trying conditions. In the most strenuous combat, and under the most trying conditions, he always remained what we at the Bar shall ever remember him as—an artist in speech and a man of courteous and kindly manners to everyone with whom he came into contact, professionally and personally."

The subject of the portrait next week will be:—

The Late Dr John Dove Wilson.

THE ENGLISH LAW OFFICERS.

It is announced that Sir William Snowden Robson, K.C., M.P., has been appointed Attorney-General, and Mr S. T. Evans, K.C., M.P., has been appointed Solicitor-General.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

Sir William S. Robson, who has been Solicitor-General since the formation of the present Government, was born in 1852, and is a son of the late Mr Robert Robson, J.P., Newcastle. He was educated privately and at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Called to the Bar in 1880, at the Inner Temple, he joined the North-Eastern circuit, to which his predecessor, Sir John Lawson Walton, also belonged. He took silk in 1892, and was appointed Recorder of Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1895. In 1900 he became a Bencher of the Inner Temple. At the Bar Sir W. Robson had a distinguished career as a pleader, and was an authority on the law of patents. He entered Parliament as member for the Bow and Bromley division of Tower Hamlets in 1885, but lost the seat in the following year. He was, however, elected member for South Shields in 1895, and has represented that contituency ever since. As a private member he succeeded in getting a measure passed for raising the school age of half-timers. Sir William Robson has established a solid reputation as a Parliamentarian and has rendered valuable service to his party in Parliamentary debate.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

Mr Samuel Thomas Evans is forty-eight years of age, and is the only son of Mr John Evans, of Skewen, near Neath. He was educated at Swansea Collegiate School and Aberystwith University College, and graduated at London University. He became a solicitor in the year 1883, but in 1891 was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple, and became a K.C. in 1901. Mr Evans has represented his present constituency, Mid-Glamorgan, since 1890. He was appointed Recorder of Swansea in 1906, and was returned unopposed at the bye-election caused by this appointment, and also at the General Election of 1905. In the House of Commons Mr Evans early won his spurs as a debater in the days when he and the present President of the Board of Trade made the running for the Welsh party in the House; and both there and at the Bar his nimbleness of mind and ready wit have made him a valuable coadjutor.

THE LAW OF PUBLIC AUDIT AND THE LARGER BURGHS.

By H. Burn Murdoch, B.A., LL.B.,
Advocate and Barrister-at-Law.

In a recent article dealing with the audit of public bodies generally throughout Scotland, reference was made to the uncertain position of the "larger burghs" upon this matter, When the Town Councils Act of 1900 laid down a code of general application, it provided by sect. 109 that "notwithstanding anything in this Act contained it shall be in the power of the Town Council of any of" [Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee and Greenock] "by a resolution passed at any time within twelve months after the passing of this Act, to declare that any sections or subsections of this Act relating to . . . . accounts and corporate property specified in such resolution shall not be applicable to such burgh, and that in lieu thereof the corresponding sections or subsections (if any) of an Act or Acts applying to such burgh repealed by this Act, which section or subsections shall be specified in the resolution, shall, notwithstanding such repeal, remain in force or revive within the burgh."

All the above-mentioned burghs except Greenock have made wide use of the power conferred. Each Town Council passed its own resolution in its own words, and only in the case of Dundee was an attempt made to shew how the old law revived "corresponds" to the rejected sections of the 1900 Act. Although these resolutions when published in the "Edinburgh Gazette" are invested with the force of statute, Glasgow has actually passed and published two resolutions, and it is doubtful whether the second, which purports to revive an additional section by way of afterthought, can derive any force from the words of the Act authorising "a" resolution. The second resolution expressed this further revival to be in lieu of sect. 90, already declared inapplicable, but Aberdeen, which also rejected sect. 90, made no corresponding revival.

There are three notable sections of the 1900 Act unanimously rejected by these four towns, containing important provisions not corresponding to anything that has been revived. These are sections 94 (Appointment of independent Auditor), 95 (Accounts to be delivered to him), and 96 (Procedure open to dissatisfied ratepayers). It may be argued that to this extent the resolutions of the four towns are ultra vires, and that rejection was possible only to the extent that corresponding provisions already existed. This view seems to have been taken in an opinion, published some time ago in the daily press, given by Mr Balfour Browne, K.C., at the instance of certain Glasgow ratepayers, in connection with the recent case of Eadie and Others v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 15 S.L.T. pp. 379, 612.

But the words "if any" in brackets in sect. 109 admit the reading that the authority to reject the 1900 Act was not so limited, but only that a duty was imposed of reviving old corresponding law so far as that did exist. As a matter of fact, the schedule of repealed acts thus made locally revivable contains no provision at all relating to audits or auditors. There is, however, one section (34) of the Burgh Reform Act 1833 that provides a fixed penalty, recoverable by any person aggrieved from magistrates and others wilfully disobeying the provisions of that Act: these prescribe, inter alia, the making up of complete accounts. As the only procedure of complaint actually revived by Glasgow and the other towns apparently relates to the Common Good accounts alone, it would seem that here there is a "corresponding" section which the resolutions have omitted to revive.

Should any part of a resolution be held invalid in future proceedings, there will be further doubt whether the invalidity does not extend to the whole of the resolution, as it would not in that event conform exactly to the description "resolution passed under this section" on which statutory force is bestowed. At all events, the invalidity might affect the whole of that part relating to accounts and corporate property. The result of this would be that the four larger burghs would come under the 1900 Act rules of audit, falling into line in this respect with the general Scottish reform.

This would seem almost desirable. The fragmentary portions of the 1822 and 1833 Acts which were considered in Eadie (supra), on the supposition that they still applied to Glasgow, are neither clear nor effective. Even should the narrow right of complaint reveal any non-justified expenditure, apparently the liability could not be attached to the individuals responsible. In Eadie certain town councillors wished to disclaim the defence, but were refused permission on the ground that they were in Court officially as representing the Corporation and not as individuals.

The questions raised in that case left the legality of the resolutions unconsidered: it is possible that they are invalid in whole or part for the reasons above stated. Further, at least one piece of law commented on in the judgment of the Court, the Glasgow Municipal Act 1879, sect. 10, seems plainly to have been repealed, although this point was not brought out. The Town Councils Act 1903, sect. 8, provided that, subject to 1900, sect. 109, the sections of 1900 "relating to accounts and corporate property shall apply and have effect in all burghs within the meaning of that Act; and subject as aforesaid, all portions of local Acts inconsistent with or dealing with the same matters as the said sections are hereby repealed."

Now the 1879 Act, sect. 10, is a portion of a local Act and deals with accounts; it is not preserved by anything contained in the Act of 1900, sect. 109. This repeal seems to have far-reaching consequences that have been completely overlooked. In these larger burghs much finance is at present administered in terms of local Acts dealing with accounts which were, to all appearance, repealed in 1903. In fact, the position of the larger burghs is made doubly unsatisfactory owing to its total uncertainty. They especially stand in need of an amending Act dealing with accounts and audit.

The Duty of Agents to Return Process.—When a case which was on the Summar Roll of the First Division this week was called for hearing on Wednesday, 29th inst., it appeared that the agent for one of the parties had not returned productions in the case. These had been borrowed by him on 29th December. The agent was not personally present in Court. The Lord President, addressing counsel for the party, said: "Surely it is a dereliction of the first duty of an agent to hold back borrowed productions when the case is on the roll, and these may be required at any moment. Tell your agent he must attend personally and give any explanation he may have to give."

For some years after the order was instituted in 1897 difficulties arose in Scotland as to the recommendations made—or not made—for the dignity of King's Counsel. The matter was the subject of discussion at several meetings of Faculty. Recently, however, little or nothing has been heard on the subject, and the dignity has been conferred practically on all who have applied for it. But at the English Bar the position at present seems to be similar to what was generally felt in the Parliament House at the time referred to. The "Daily Telegraph" says: "Confidently expected before the beginning of term by a large number of aspiring juniors, the list of new 'silks' has not yet appeared. Whether the Lord Chancellor will, in the near future, enable some or any of the parties interested to write K.C. after their names is in doubt. Rumour credits him with on opinion that the number of leaders at the Bar has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. That there are more than enough to do the work, whether common law or Chancery, is sufficiently clear, for there are plenty of unemployed among them; but of late years this consideration has not prevented the conferring of the rank upon worthy applicants. It would be a misfortune if there were a return to the ancient system, under which silk gowns were treated as priceless gifts, to be distributed with jealous nicety at long intervals."

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Rhonnda Urban District Council v. Taff Vale Railway Company.

Railway—Railway Clauses Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. cap. 20), sects. 50, 51.—A railway company's private Act, passed in 1836, prescribed the width of a bridge to be built across their line as not less that fifteen feet. Sects. 50 and 51 of the Railway Clauses Act 1845 made provisions as to the width of bridges, but sect. 1 of that Act stated that the Act was to apply to every railway which should, by an Act which should thereafter be passed, be authorised to be constructed; and all the clauses and provisions of the 1845 Act, save so far as they should be expressly varied or excepted by such Act, should apply to the undertaking thereby authorised. The railway was constructed under an Act passed in 1846, which incorporated the provisions of the Act of 1836 except such as were inconsistent with the Railways Clauses Act, and incorporated the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act except so far as they were inconsistent with the provisions thereinafter mentioned. Held that the provision of the 1836 Act was the provision regulating the width of the bridge in question, and not the different provisions in sects. 50 and 51 of the Railways Clauses Act. Held also that the word "bridge" did not include the approaches to the bridge. — Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, L.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Bigham, J.).—3rd December 1907.

The Late JOHN DOVE WILSON, Esq., LL.D., Advocate.

Though John Dove Wilson had for some years withdrawn from active public and academic life, his interest in legal science was so little abated and his wise counsels remained so available, that his death has impressed the University and the city of Aberdeen, and all branches of the profession which he adorned, with a sense of loss almost as keen as if he had fallen in harness.

A man of strong brain and with a love of study, he became, early in life, an acute and profound lawyer. His powers as an advocate had only begun to develop when, in his fourth year at the Bar, he was appointed Sheriff - Substitute. Stonehaven allowed him the leisure which, as he employed it, made him a great jurist. It is literally true of him that he grew old learning and thinking. Probably no Scottish lawyer excelled him in critical knowledge of leading systems of law, ancient and modern.

The law of Germany he studied in his University days at Berlin, even to the procedure and practice of its courts. When the German Code of 1900 was published, he went through it as carefully as if he were about to begin practice in Berlin. With the Code Napoleon and the Italian Code of 1882 he was scarcely less familiar. In mercantile law he kept his knowledge abreast of statute and case law of the United States, as well as of the United Kingdom, even after he had retired from the Bench and from his chair. He was keenly interested in the beginnings of shipping law, traceable in Khammurabi's recently discovered code—of a venerable antiquity when Moses was in his ark of bulrushes.

Aberdeen has been fortunate in its local judges, but no one occupied the Bench with more dignity and distinction than Sheriff Dove Wilson, or left it amidst so many tributes of respect and honour from the profession and the community. He enjoyed the confidence of the local Bar, of his colleagues, and of the Court of Session; indeed, his judgments stood the test of appeal so successfully that appeals became rare, either on facts or on law. Perhaps his judicial faculty was seen at its strongest in dealing with a confused mass of conflicting authorities. His method was to examine the origin of the conflict, to trace the limits of the theories on which the decisions were severally based, and to find the solution in "redding the marches" between them, by the aid of first principles.

In the University of Aberdeen he will long be remembered and, I hope, commemorated, as the second founder of its Faculty of Law. Roman Law had ceased to be taught from the chair which was established in 1505 to teach it. He revived its best traditions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and gave, by his work and personality, a new standing and importance to the study of law. In many ways, and with all his strength, he wrought for the University both during and after his term of office. He enriched its library by a gift of the most valuable books in his collection of foreign and ancient law. As a teacher he was plain, lucid, and convincing; he taught principles, not details, but principles illustrated by a choice of leading cases. His respect for institutional writers never prevented him from pointing out their errors, with his reasons. His large study of jurisprudence, both analytic and historical, made him an effective critic.

Mr Dove Wilson did much service of the highest kind in many departments—all of it bearing the stamp of his individuality. His "Sheriff Court Practice" is now classic. As a member of Departmental Commissions, particularly in connection with habitual offenders and inebriates, his aid was much appreciated. He had a hand in drafting several of the codifying statutes, particularly the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882. For many years he was a member of the Board of Examiners of Law Agents. As an examiner on that Board, and in the University, he was, notwithstanding his fairness and geniality, rather feared by candidates who depended less on intelligent study than on expert coaching in answers to expected questions. It may be added that he strongly advocated the reform of the degree of B.L. desired by Edinburgh and Aberdeen, and the inclusion of the History of Scots Law among the optional degree subjects. In whatever concerned the city of Aberdeen he took a public-spirited interest. Latterly he became prominent in political associations, and added to his great reasoning powers a fervid eloquence which his legal admirers had scarcely supposed him to possess.

By his contributions to the "Juridical Review," the "Law Quarterly," the "Yale Law Journal," and other legal journals, and by his lectures at Yale University on the Storrs Foundation (a compliment conferred on no other Scots lawyer), he was widely known and renowned as an eminent scholar and jurist. Whatever he did reached the highest standard of excellence, and revealed his capacity. His articles, like his judgments, were models of clear statement, compact reasoning, comprehensive grasp, expressed in felicitous, sometimes pungent, language. In style and perhaps method he was influenced by the study of Ihering. But his work always left the impression of power in reserve, and of abundant knowledge, which, like some veins of gold, became richer as one went deeper.

For one task, yet unattempted, his studies and his inclinations specially fitted him. He often regretted that no one had taken in hand a history of the rise and progress of the law of Scotland. In his view the influence of the Roman law in the early period had been somewhat under-rated, and the Scandinavian sources had been scarcely suggested; certainly, except by himself, not explored. Of the relations between the law of Scotland and the teaching of law in the French Universities, specially Orleans and Bourges, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, he had made an elaborate study. For example, he vindicated the claims of Cujas not merely as the greatest of the Civilians, but as having exercised much influence over the development of feudal law by his lectures and his disciples, many of whom, like Craig, became teachers or advocates in Scotland. The Sheriff Court at Aberdeen, which, partly through its connection with the University, had, in the days before the Union, developed law and procedure on characteristic lines, invited him to historical enquiry. No one was so well equipped for work of this kind, and no one would have more powerfully developed one of his favourite texts—law as the bond of states and the great civiliser of mankind. But of these studies, as of his lectures, it is to be feared that no record remains for publication.

If his academic friends chiefly regret that he left no adequate monument of his strength and accomplishments as an author, others, thinking of his fine judicial mind and unique knowledge of the laws of so many countries, cannot but feel that the judicial sphere in which he moved was too narrow for his powers. Men of smaller abilities have been raised to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—"Time and chance happen to all." But no man, in every circle to which he became known, received more sincere respect and honour, and his reputation may rest on the excellence of his judicial and academical work. No one so fully exemplified the aphorism of Lord Bacon which he used to quote: reading made him a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. N. J. D. K.

In opening the Class of Scots Law at Aberdeen University on Monday, 27th January, Professor Irvine said:—

"As we were leaving this class-room on Friday, we were met by the announcement of the death at San Remo of Dr Dove Wilson, who for a period of ten years occupied the Chair of Law in this University. To the members of the University, to the citizens of Aberdeen, and to many far beyond these limits, the announcement came fraught with a keen sense of personal loss. Before being called to this Chair Dr Dove Wilson had a long experience of judicial work in the Sheriff Court, and in that capacity had gained a high reputation. He had also made notable contributions to Scots legal literature, and in particular his treatise on Sheriff Court Practice had taken its place as a standard work.

"He thus entered on the duties of the Chair equipped with a sound knowledge of legal principles, a familiarity with practical details, and a wide experience of human nature. His work as a teacher of law was very congenial; he had a high conception of the duties of his office; and by universal admission his success as a Professor was not less marked than had been his success as a Judge. He possessed, indeed, many qualities fitted to adorn the Chair. His colleagues with one consent bear witness to his helpfulness and loyalty. His former students testify with a rare unanimity to his power of lucid and accurate exposition, his faculty for illuminating dry details, his scrupulous thoroughness, and his unfailing kindliness. They speak, too, of his constant efforts to keep them in touch with the practical side of law, and to secure that they should never lose sight of the responsibilities which they would have to face in professional life.

"During his occupancy of the Chair his published studies in the development of Scots Law and its relation to Roman Law and modern legal systems won for him wide recognition and made his name known—as the names of few Scots lawyers become known — in England, in the United States, and on the Continent. His investigations in the sources and history of our law—a work to which he gave much time—were always guided by useful ends and directed to illustrate and explain the law of to-day. In his studies there was no unpractical vagueness: his knowledge was always an instrument ready for use.

"His tenure of this Chair will be memorable from the fact that to him was due the revival of the study of Roman Law in the University. This he himself regarded—perhaps rightly—as his most valuable service to the University and to the legal profession. It was characteristic of the man and his methods that, before beginning this work, he went to Leipsic, and there with the aid of two great masters of Roman Law, Windscheid and Sohm, made himself acquainted with the best methods of teaching the subject. In his letter resigning the Chair, he stated that two other objects lay near his heart—the extension of the law curriculum and the provision of more practical teaching in law. As regards the former he has been taken from us at a time when we are not without hope that the extension of our law curriculum is on the eve of being accomplished. As regards the latter, we now have at our disposal in our law library the means of making the teaching more practical, and he would, I think, have approved the effort being made this session to avail ourselves of this equipment and to supplement the system of lectures by less formal but not less profitable instruction in matters of practice. After his retirement his interest in the welfare of our Law Faculty in no wise abated, and was never more conspicuous than on the last occasion I saw him —on the day before he left for San Remo. None of his work was done easily or lightly. Nil sine labore—a favourite maxim of one of England's greatest lawyers—might have been his motto. He leaves a record of strenuous work, of unflinching faithfulness to duty and of high achievement: and it is not unfitting that in this place we, who have entered into the fruits of his labours, should pay him a tribute of respect and affection."

The hearing of two Seven Judge cases took place in the First Division Court Room on Tuesday and part of Wednesday of this week. In the absence of Lord Pearson and of Lord Low, who has been indisposed for a few days, Lord Guthrie attended in the Inner House to complete the Court of Seven Judges. Lord Mackenzie has been absent from Court all this week in consequence of a sitting of the High Court at Aberdeen, where the calendar is a very heavy one. There has thus been this week considerably less business than usual in the Court of Session. The Court adjourns to-day for the February week vacation.

The Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh have resolved to confer the degree of Doctor of Laws upon the Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate, and upon Sir James Balfour Paul, advocate, Lyon King of Arms.

Mr R. F. L. Blackburn, K.C., one of the Advocates Depute under the late administration, has been invited and has consented to contest the county of Forfar in the Unionist interest at the next election.

Mr William Stodart, Dean of the Hamilton Society of Solicitors, and Mr Duncan C. Barr, Chamberlain, Hamilton Estates Offices, have been appointed Honorary Sheriff-Substitutes of the county of Lanark.

The names of Messrs John Neill, Hugh William Walker, and George Macdonald have been added to the list of Honorary Sheriffs-Substitute at Greenock. Mr Macdonald retired a few days ago from the office of Dean of the Faculty of Procurators of Greenock.

Legal Appointment for a Member of the Scottish Bar.—We are informed that Mr James Adamson, M.A., LL.B., advocate, has been appointed Dean of the Faculty of Law at the Victoria College, Wellington, in the Dominion of New Zealand. Mr Adamson, who was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1896, was educated at Forfar and at the University of Edinburgh, where he graduated M.A. (1893) and LL.B., with distinction, 1896. He acted as assistant to the Professor of Scots Law in 1895–96. Mr Adamson was a distinguished law student, gaining first prizes in Public Constitutional History, Civil Law (two), Scots Law (two). The Professor of Scots Law, Mr Rankine, wrote of his class-work: "I beg to congratulate you on the best paper I have ever had the pleasure to examine." Since his admission to the Faculty Mr Adamson has enjoyed a considerable practice, and he is known as a well-read lawyer and sound adviser. He leaves the country early this month, and takes with him to his new appointment the best wishes of his brethren in the Parliament House.

Churches (Scotland) Act Commission.—Mr John Prosser, W.S., has been appointed to act as an Assistant Commissioner for the adjustment of Orders of Allocation.

We regret to learn of the illness of Sheriff Mackenzie, Sheriff-Substitute at Kilmarnock, which has compelled him to apply to the Secretary for Scotland for a month's leave of absence. The first public intimation that Sheriff Mackenzie was indisposed was the announcement made in the newspapers that he was unable to preside at the annual dinner of the Kilmarnock Burns Club on 27th ult. and propose "The Immortal Memory." We understand that he has been suffering from an attack of influenza, from which however he is, we are glad to know, recovering.

The Secretary of State for Scotland has appointed Mr A. J. Louttit-Laing, advocate, to act as interim Sheriff-Substitute at Kilmarnock during Sheriff Mackenzie's absence. Mr Laing has had some previous experience of Sheriff Court work, as last summer he was appointed by Sheriff Reid, K.C., Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty and Sutherland, to act as Sheriff-Substitute at Stornoway during the absence through ill health of Sheriff Squair. Mr Laing's present appointment is of general interest as being the first which has been made under the powers conferred on the Secretary for Scotland by sect. 16 of the Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act 1907. "This section," says Sheriff Fyfe in his recent book on the Act, "was not in any of the older Acts. A Sheriff-Substitute who was laid aside by illness was dependent upon the goodwill of his Sheriff to nominate as an interim or Honorary Substitute a suitable person to temporarily take his place, but the attendant expense had to be borne by the Sheriff-Substitute personally. This section removes this anomaly of thirty years' standing, and places a Scotch Sheriff-Substitute in this matter on the same footing as an English County Court Judge and other Crown officials." The remuneration of the interim Sheriff-Substitute is paid by the Treasury.

The Late William Strachan, Esq., Sheriff-Clerk of Linlithgowshire. — Mr William Strachan, Sheriff-Clerk of Linlithgowshire, died at his residence, Holywood, Bo'ness, on 31st January, after an illness of a day's duration. On Thursday he was at Linlithgow as usual attending to his official duties. After his return to Bo'ness, and while engaged in business with some callers in the evening, he was seized with hæmorrhage of the brain, and never rallied. Mr Strachan was born at Holywood, Dumfriesshire, sixty-one years ago. Apprenticed to the law in Dumfries, he was admitted a law agent in 1873. For some years he devoted his attention to criminal law, and held the appointment of Assistant Procurator-Fiscal at Linlithgow under the late Mr W. H. Henderson. Later he began business in Bo'ness, where he practised for about twelve years, returning in 1890 to Linlithgow, to join Mr Henderson as his partner. He was secretary to the Linlithgowshire Conservative Association, for which he did excellent work as agent and organiser during several elections, and on the death of Mr Ferguson in 1898 he was appointed Sheriff-Clerk of Linlithgowshire, relinquishing at the same time his private practice. He also held at his death the offices of Clerk to the Justices and the Income Tax Commissioners. While in practice in Bo'ness he took an active part in municipal work, being a member of the Burgh Commission for some years. Mr Strachan was of an exceptionally quiet and retiring disposition, and spent a large portion of his time in his grounds at Holywood. He was a member of Bo'ness Parish Church, of which for many years he was session-clerk.

Law Agents' Examination Results. — The results of the half-yearly examinations in general knowledge, which were held lately in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Dundee, have now been intimated to the candidates. For the first examination in general knowledge 108 candidates entered. Forty have passed or been found qualified in all the subjects, and 36 have satisfied the examiners or been found qualified by leaving or other accepted certificates in two subjects. For the second examination in general knowledge 170 candidates presented themselves. Of these 69 have passed in one subject, 28 in two, 14 in three, and 2 in four subjects. The papers of the candidates of this examination were as follows:—Mathematics, 29, passed 11; logic, 58, passed 45; Latin, 82, passed 41; Greek, 4, passed 3; French, 55, passed 27; German, 3, passed 3; Italian, 1, passed 0; book-keeping, 82, passed 52. The quarterly examination in law was held in Edinburgh last week, when 54 candidates presented themselves for examination. Forty-six of these were examined in all the subjects, and 24 passed. Eight graduates in law (LL.B. and B.L.) were examined in Court Procedure, and 8 passed. The following is the official list of those who have passed the examination in law:—John Angus, Herbert Taylor Ballantyne, John Keith Barclay, James Wilson Blyth, Robert Browning, M.A., LL.B.; James Martin Clapperton, B.L.; Percival Humphreys Dunne, William Chapman Forbes, John Donaldson Garvie, junior, Walter Henderson, M.A., LL.B.; James Houston, Walter Hubbard, LL.B.; Robert Andrew Hutchon, Robert Andrew Logan, David Brown Mungo, James Campbell MacGregor, LL.B.; John Mackenzie, John M'Killop, Donald M'Kinnon, junior, James Semple MacKintosh, B.L.; Kenneth Gilbert Maclachlan, Archibald Pow, James Robertson, John Edwards Percival Robertson, John Murray Scrimgeour, M.A., LL.B.; Benjamin Sibbald, Alexander Marshall Stewart, M.A.; James Charles Stewart, John Swan, David Robertson Tod, Alexander Lyle Watt, Alexander Maclean Wilkie.

J. CAMPBELL LORIMER, Esq., K.C.,

SHERIFF OF AYRSHIRE.

Mr Campbell Lorimer has received many hearty congratulations from members of both branches of the legal profession and a warm welcome from his brethren on the bench of the Sheriff Court on his appointment to be Sheriff of Ayrshire. Mr Lorimer has, through the chances of politics, had to wait long for judicial promotion. He was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1866, and though junior Sheriff in order of appointment he has only two seniors at the Bar among his colleagues as Sheriffs - Principal. His sheriffship is, however, by no means his first official appointment. He was Standing Counsel for the Inland Revenue — an appointment which does not change with the Government—from 1882 to 1886, but he resigned that office to become an Advocate - Depute. He was succeeded in the Revenue by Mr Young, who remained in that position for twenty-one years. The Liberal Government went out of office a few months after Mr Lorimer became Depute. He was reappointed in 1892, and held office till 1895. When Lord Balfour of Burleigh carried through the measure establishing Local Provisional Order Enquiries in Scotland he appointed Mr Campbell Lorimer to be his senior Parliamentary Counsel. Mr Lorimer thus shares with the late Lord Kinross and with Lord Guthrie (whom the Conservatives made a Sheriff) the distinction of being selected for legal promotion by his political opponents.

Mr Campbell Lorimer, who is a son of the late Rev. John Gordon Lorimer of Glasgow, was born there in 1841. He was educated at Glasgow Academy and at Glasgow University, where he graduated as M.A. His legal studies were prosecuted at the University of Edinburgh, where he graduated as LL.B. Having served his apprenticeship to the law in the office of Messrs Bannatynes & Kirkwood, writers, Glasgow, he was called to the Scottish Bar in 1866.

Mr Lorimer is known as an accomplished and able counsel, and is well versed in all branches of law. He was junior counsel for the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank, and since then has been pre-eminent as a company lawyer. He was appointed a King's Counsel in 1903. He is the author of an Outline of the Law of Joint Stock Companies, a Commentary on the Finance Act of 1894, and the Introduction and Notes on the Law of Scotland, in Lord Lindley's book on Partnership. He is a member of the Court of the University of Edinburgh, and the Chairman of the Century Insurance Company. A prominent member of the United Free Church, he took an active part in the affairs of that body both before and after the Union.

Mr Campbell Lorimer presented his commission at Ayr Sheriff Court on 13th inst., and was introduced to, and welcomed by, the Bar. Among those present were Sheriff Shairp, Mr W. S. N. Patrick, Sheriff-Clerk; Mr P. Fraser Mackenna, Procurator-Fiscal for the county; Mr Archibald Brakenridge, Dean of the Ayr Faculty of Solicitors, and a large number of members of Faculty; Mr R. A. Oswald of Auchincruive, Convener of Ayrshire; Provost Allan, and many others. After the new Sheriff had presented his commission to Sheriff Shairp, Sheriff Shairp said he had the very pleasing duty to discharge of offering to Sheriff Lorimer a welcome as Sheriff-Principal of that important county. They desired to offer to him their sincere congratulations on his appointment as Sheriff of a county which had so much interest connected with it, historical and otherwise, as the county of Ayr. And they desired to congratulate themselves on receiving as Sheriff a gentleman of established reputation in a profession like theirs, one who had mature experience, a writer of reputation on legal subjects, and one who held important and responsible legal position in past days under the Crown. He was sure from what he knew of him that Sheriff Lorimer might be counted upon to do his utmost to maintain and strengthen the hearty and harmonious relations which were the traditions of Bench and Bar in Ayrshire. Mr Brakenridge said it was his high privilege on behalf of his professional brethren most respectfully to extend to Sheriff Lorimer very cordial welcome, and to offer their hearty congratulations upon the honour that had been conferred upon him—the appointment of Sheriff-Principal of that important county. He might be permitted to say with sincerity that their congratulations were enhanced by the fact that his Lordship's professional learning, and his reputation as a writer of authority, would enable him to discharge the duties of his high office with satisfaction and success. He had been deputed by the members of the Bar to assure his Lordship that he might at all times rely upon receiving their loyal and hearty co-operation and assistance. Mr Mackenna, on behalf of the officials, Mr Oswald on behalf of Ayrshire County Council, and Provost Allan on behalf of Ayr Town Council, also briefly extended a welcome to Sheriff Lorimer. Sheriff Lorimer said he had to return his most hearty thanks to the local Bar, to the County Council, and to Ayr Town Council, for the most cordial reception which they had accorded to him. It would ill become him to take his seat there without referring to the person who had preceded him, his friend Sir David Brand. Sheriff Brand had held the office of Sheriff-Principal for twenty-two years, and they did not need to be told how he had discharged the onerous duties of his office, being a sound lawyer, and versed in all that was necessary to make him a competent judge of that important county. He (Sheriff Lorimer) came among them, not with qualities such as Sheriff Brand had possessed, but with a few shreds of legal knowledge and legal experience which, he trusted, might be of use in the discharge of his duties. He came at an interesting time, when a new Sheriff Courts Act had just come into operation. That Act would require to be studied by him and them. They all started fair, because no one had as yet had any experience of the working of the Act; and they would see how, by their joint industry and wisdom, they could make this Act work so as to be of the greatest benefit to the county.

The Court of Session resumed its sittings on Tuesday after the February blank week. All the Judges were present, except Lord Pearson and Lord Johnston, who is absent on account of indisposition. We regret to learn that it is unlikely that Lord Johnston will be able to be back in Court for a period of at least three weeks. A sitting of the Land Valuation Appeal Court has been held this week. Lord Low and Lord Dundas were the presiding Judges. Lord Low and Lord Dundas will also preside at a sitting of the High Court of Justiciary in Glasgow on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week.

A sitting of the High Court of Justiciary took place in Aberdeen on 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th February. Lord Mackenzie was the presiding Judge, and Mr Anderson, A.-D., assisted by Mr Millar Craig, prosecuted. There were seven cases involving twelve persons, and including three charges of murder. Four full days were required for the disposal of the calendar, which was heavier than on any occasion in Aberdeen during the last fifty years or so. Two of the four days were occupied with what had come to be known as the Lhanbryde murder. In this case Joseph Hume was charged with the murder of John Smith at Lhanbryde, near Elgin, in September last. The prisoner was defended by Mr Moncrieff and Mr Dallas. The jury, after an absence of an hour, returned a unanimous verdict of guilty, and sentence of death followed. This was the first death sentence in Aberdeen since 1865. Of the other two murder charges, one was disposed of by giving effect to a plea of insanity in bar of trial, and the other was, on the conclusion of the evidence, reduced to a charge of culpable homicide, in accordance with which a verdict was returned.

The Lord Chancellor (says the Law Journal), after a delay that has provoked a good deal of criticism, has added fifteen members of the Bar to the ranks of His Majesty's Counsel. Inasmuch as the names of 251 King's Counsel appear in the current "Law List," it cannot be asserted that the number of King's Counsel is so insufficient as to create an urgent demand for an addition to their ranks; but the obvious reluctance of Lord Loreburn to bestow the honour of "silk" is certainly not in keeping with the policy of his predecessors in office, and, in view of the fact that a large proportion of the King's Counsel whose names appear in the "Law List" are not practising members of the profession, is not altogether easy to understand. The new list of King's Counsel will, for the most part, command the approval of the Bar, but the absence of one or two names from it has created not a little surprise. A member of the North-Eastern Circuit, whose application for "silk" has not been granted, had claims to the honour which were certainly not inferior to many of those which have been recognised.

Scottish Legal Appointments.—A vacancy having occurred in the office of Senior Counsel to the Secretary for Scotland for the purposes of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1899, through the appointment of Mr J. Campbell Lorimer, K.C., to be Sheriff of Ayrshire, Mr Sinclair has appointed Mr P. F. Wood, advocate (the present junior counsel), to be senior counsel, and Mr John Harvey, advocate, to be junior counsel under the Act. Mr Wood, who holds the degrees of M.A. and B.C.L. of Oxford, and M.A. and LL.B. of Edinburgh, was called to the Scottish Bar in 1884 and to the English Bar in the same year. He has been junior counsel since 1900, when the Act came into operation. Mr Wood is lecturer on Administrative Law in the University of Edinburgh. Mr Harvey holds the degrees of B.A. Oxford and M.A. LL.B. Edinburgh, and was admitted to the Faculty of Advocates in 1892. He is lecturer on Procedure and Evidence in the University of Edinburgh, and is a reporter on the staff of the "Session Cases."

Age Limit for Scottish Sheriffs. — In the House of Commons on the 13th inst. Mr Watt (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate whether there was any age limit for Sheriffs and Sheriffs-Substitute in Scotland; if so, what was that limit, and how many were there now receiving salaries who had been granted extension; and, if not, will he introduce legislation to put this branch of the service on an equality with others, where compulsory retirement was enforced? The Lord Advocate.—The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative, which supersedes the second branch of my hon. friend's enquiry. The answer to the third part is also in the negative.

Registration of Title.—The Royal Commission on Registration of Title in Scotland met on the 1st inst. in the hall of the S.S.C. Library, Parliament House, Edinburgh. The Commissioners present were:—Lord Dunedin (chairman), Mr W. J. Dundas, C.S.; Mr J. Smith Clark, Keeper of the Register of Sasines, Edinburgh; Sheriff Kennedy, Mr C. F. Brickdale, of the Land Registry, London; Mr John Prosser, W.S.; and Mr F. A. Umpherston, advocate, secretary. The following witnesses were examined:—Mr James Annan, town clerk of Lanark, as representing the town-clerks of royal burghs having burgh registers; Mr James Glen, solicitor, Greenock, representing the Convention of Royal Burghs; Mr Richard Brown, solicitor, Glasgow, also representing the Convention of Royal Burghs.

NEW ENGLISH KING'S COUNSEL.

The dignity of Counsel to His Majesty has been conferred upon fifteen members of the English Bar. Mr Charles Tyrrell Giles was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1874, and is a member of the Western Circuit. He sat in Parliament as a Conservative from 1900 to 1905. He previously practised at the Parliamentary Bar. Sir Thomas Raleigh, K.C.S.I., was born in Edinburgh in 1850, and is a son of the late Mr Samuel Raleigh, manager of the Scottish Widows' Fund. He was Registrar of the Privy Council from 1896 to 1899, and Legal Member of the Viceroy's Council from 1899 to 1904. Mr Arthur William Bairstow was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1878, and has practised at Leeds. Mr Leslie de Gruyther was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1885. For thirteen years he practised at Lucknow, and since his return to this country has been largely engaged in Indian Appeals before the Privy Council. Mr Lewis Thomas was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1885, and has had a large practice on the Common Law side. Mr George Ranken Askwith was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1886. He was a counsel in the Parnell Enquiry and in the Anglo-Venezuelan Boundary Arbitration. He has acted as Crown Counsel in Peerage cases, and has been appointed arbitrator in a large number of trade disputes. Mr Lloyd George recently appointed him Secretary to the Board of Trade. Mr James John Carfitt was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1887, and is a member of the Midland Circuit. He has acted as Junior Counsel for the Post Office, and his name is remembered as a cricketer of some renown. Mr Ernest Wynne Martelli, a member of the Chancery Bar, was called at Lincoln's Inn in 1888, and has been engaged in many leading cases. Mr Clement M. Bailhache, who practises largely in the Commercial Court, was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1889, having previously been a solicitor. The Hon. Frank Russell, the fourth son of Lord Russell of Killowen, was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1893, and has practised on the Chancery side. Mr Edward Alfred Mitchell-Innes, a son of Mr Gilbert Mitchell-Innes, was born at Edinburgh in 1863, and was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1894. He has had a large practice, and has been engaged in many notable criminal trials. Mr Alexander Grant, who was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1874, has been a leading practitioner in the Palatine Court of Lancaster. He unsuccessfully contested a seat in the Liberal interest at last General Election. Mr Edward George Hemmerde, M.P., was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1897. He is a Liberal, and he unsuccessfully contested Winchester in 1900 and Shrewsbury at the last General Election. He was elected for East Denbighshire in August 1906. He has been engaged in many notable cases, and lately was admitted to the Jamaica Bar in order to take part in the recent heavy fire insurance litigation there. Mr John Allsebrook Simon, M.P., is thirty-four years of age, and was admitted to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1899. He has had a large practice at the Common Law Bar and before the Privy Council and the Railway Commission. He was junior counsel for the British Government in the Alaska Boundary Arbitration. He sits as a Liberal for the Walthamstow Division of Essex. Mr Frederick Edwin Smith, M.P., has received the dignity of King's Counsel at an exceptionally early age, having been called to the Bar at the Inner Temple so recently as 1899, some six months later than Mr Simon. With the exception of the late Mr Benjamin and Sir Edward Carson, no member of the Bar has ever obtained silk within so short a period of his call. Mr Smith, who is a Unionist and a Tariff Reformer, was elected for the Waltham Division in 1906, and has obtained a reputation of a high order as a Parliamentarian. He has written on International Law, and has enjoyed an extensive junior practice.

Mr R. Henderson Smith, solicitor, has commenced the practice of his profession at 32 Gray Street, Broughty Ferry. His experience has been gained in the offices of Messrs Young & Kennaway, W.S., Auchterarder; Messrs Hope, Todd & Kirk, W.S., Edinburgh; and Messrs Reid, Johnston & Co., solicitors, Dundee.

Mr Forbes T. Wallace, S.S.C. and notary public, intimates that he has dissolved partnership with Mr John T. Watson and that he will in future carry on business as a law agent and conveyancer at the British Linen Bank Buildings, Leven, in his own name and for his own behoof. He will continue to act as joint agent at Leven of the British Linen Bank in conjunction with Mr William Badger, presently sub-agent at Kirkcaldy, who will in future be associated with him in the bank agency.

Mr John T. Watson, solicitor and notary public, intimates that he has dissolved partnership with Mr Forbes T. Wallace, and that he will in future carry on business as a law agent and conveyancer in his own name, and for his own behoof—in the meantime at Mitchell Street, Leven, where he has secured temporary premises.

The Late Sir William Nicoll.—By the death of Sir William Nicoll, which took place on the 5th inst. at his residence, Roydon, Corstorphine, the Faculty of Advocates has lost one of its members who has brought credit to the Scottish Bar by his services in the field of Colonial judicial work. Sir William Nicoll, who had been Chief Justice of Lagos since 1902, returned to this country in ill health in June of last year. He was advised not to risk a further term of work in the trying climate of Lagos, and resigned his judgeship in December. He appeared to be recovering his health, and was looking forward to returning to the Parliament House, but a chill brought on a relapse which proved fatal. He was born in 1860 in Forfar, and was educated at Forfar Academy, where he was Latin medalist and prize-winner in mathematics. He graduated M.A. at Edinburgh University in 1879 and LL.B. in 1882. He was First Prizeman in Scots Law and Forensic Prizeman in 1882. He was called to the Bar in the same year, and practised in the Parliament House until 1888, when he accepted the appointment of Stipendiary Magistrate for British Guiana. He held other appointments in the colony until 1897, when he was appointed Queen's Advocate for the colony of Lagos. In the same year he became a Puisne Judge of Gold Coast Colony, and from 1902 he was Chief Justice of Lagos. His conscientious hard work, and his many sterling qualities, earned for Sir William Nicoll the high esteem of the communities over which he acted as judge. He gained universel popularity. His death, occurring, as it did, when he had all but completed his full term of Colonial service, is greatly regretted, and much sympathy is expressed with Lady Nicoll in her bereavement. A portrait and biographical notice of Sir William Nicoll appeared in the "Scots Law Times," Vol. XIV. p. 85.

The Late J. D. G. Dalrymple, Esq., of Woodhead, Kirkintilloch.—The death took place, in a nursing home in Glasgow, on the 8th inst., of Mr J. D. G. Dalrymple of Woodhead, Kirkintilloch, and Meiklewood, Stirling. Mr Dalrymple, who was in his 58th year, was a son of a former Kirkintilloch minister, the Rev. Mr Duncan of St David's Parish Church. He succeeded his uncle as laird of Woodhead some six years ago, previous to which time he was a member of the firm of Duncan & Morrison, writers, Glasgow. On coming into the estate he added Dalrymple to his name. He was a devoted archæologist, a member for a long time and President for a term of Glasgow Archæological Society, and the most recent evidence of his interest in the subject was the endowment of an annual Lectureship, the lectures just having been concluded by Professor Bosanquet of Liverpool. He also served on several public bodies in Kirkintilloch and Gargunnock, being at the time of his death chief magistrate of the old Town Council of Kirkintilloch, which body he was endeavouring amicably to get merged in the more modern Town Council.

The Late William Skinner, Esq., Solicitor, Edinburgh.—A familiar figure has been removed from the Parliament House by the death of Mr William Skinner at the age of sixty-nine. Mr Skinner was born at Glen Newton, Falkland, and received his early education and legal training in Cupar, Fife. After spending a few years in Dundee he went north to Elgin, where in 1863 he qualified as a solicitor. Besides carrying on an active private business, he held the appointment of Depute Procurator-Fiscal for Elginshire. From Elgin he removed to Turriff, and after practising there for some time he came to Edinburgh, where he has been settled for the past twenty-five years. On coming to Edinburgh he entered the employment of the firm of Henderson & Clark, W.S., and on the dissolution of that firm in 1898 he remained with Mr Thomas Henderson, W.S. Mr Skinner took a keen interest in politics, and until recently held office in the city of Edinburgh Eastern Division Conservative Association. He was a member of the Church of Scotland, and at one time took an active part in the work of the Church Defence Association.

THE LATE JOHN MACDONALD, ESQ., SOLICITOR AND BANK AGENT, BUCKIE.—We regret to record the death of Mr John Macdonald, agent for the Town and County Bank at Buckie, which took place at the age of sixty-seven, on the 12th inst. Mr Macdonald studied law in Glasgow, and there held an appointment in the City of Glasgow Bank. About forty years ago he was appointed agent of that bank in Buckie, and on its liquidation he received a similar position in the service of the Town and County Bank. In many ways he did much for the town, and was instrumental in gaining for it its present railway and steamboat facilities. The public offices Mr Macdonald filled were numerous. He was Clerk to Rathven School Board, Burgh Collector, Cluny Harbour treasurer, Justice of the Peace Fiscal, and a director of the Gas Company, while latterly he was appointed an Hon. Sheriff-Substitute for Banffshire. Mr Macdonald was a typical Highlander, with a keen love of the Gaelic language, which he could speak with great fluency.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Rhonndha Urban District Council acting by The Rhonndha Tramways Company Ltd. v. Taff Vale Railway Company.

TRAMWAY—TRAMWAYS ACT 1870 (33 & 34 VICT. CAP. 78), SECT. 30.—Held that section 30 of the Tramways Act 1870 authorised a tramway company worked by overhead electric traction to enter upon the lands of a railway company and alter the position of telegraph wires belonging to the railway company in order that the tramway company might comply with the regulations of the Board of Trade with respect to the position of their own wires. — K.B. Div. (Bray, J.).—4th December 1907.

Beswick v. Smith.

SLANDER—INNUENDO.—The former employer of a commercial traveller circulated among his customers cards with the words: "H. B. is no longer in our employ. Please give him no order, or give him any money on our account." Held that the words were not capable of bearing an innuendo which was defamatory. — Court of Appeal (Earl of Halsbury, Gorell Barnes, P., and Bigham, J.).—5th December 1907.

Ponsolle v. Weber.

STOCK EXCHANGE—DEFAULTER.—The plaintiff, who was not a member of the stock exchange, obtained from the defendant, who was a jobber and a member of the stock exchange, a loan on the security of some shares, the contract being made on behalf of the plaintiff by a firm of stockbrokers who were members. It was a condition that the shares should be sold for the next settling day. The defendant made a contract for their sale with another firm of stockbrokers who were members of the stock exchange, and who were also acting, although he did not know this, on behalf of the plaintiff. The defendant only knew that they were acting for an undisclosed principal. The plaintiff failed to repay the loan or to put his agents in funds to purchase according to agreement. On subsequent realisation of the shares, in accordance with power given by the stock exchange rules, the defendant made a large profit. In an action for an accounting, held that the plaintiff was not bound by the rules of the stock exchange with reference to defaulters, and that the defendant must account for his profit.—Chan. Div. (Neville, J.).—5th December 1907.

Williams v. Midland Railway Co.

RAILWAY—CARRIAGE—RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT 1854 (17 & 18 VICT. CAP. 31), SECT. 7.—Decision of Walton, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 162), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Earl of Halsbury, Gorell Barnes, P., and Bigham, J.).—9th December 1907.

New Zealand Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Stephens.

REVENUE—INCOME TAX—INCOME TAX ACT 1853 (17 & 18 VICT. CAP. 34), SECT. 2, SCHED. D.—Decision of Bray, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 158), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.). — 9th December 1907.

Hargreaves v. Spackman.

STATUTE—SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT 1875 (38 & 39 VICT. CAP. 63), SECT. 25.—Held that a warranty, to be valid under the above section, must be from the vendor to the person putting it forward.—K.B. Div. (Channell, Bray and Sutton, JJ.).—9th December 1907.

Glenie v. Tucker & Bruce Smith.

Bill of Exchange — Indorsement.—Decision of A. T. Lawrence, J. (supra, p. 60), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—11*th December* 1907.

Johnston v. Mew, Langton & Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sched. II., sects. 8 and 10.—Decision of the Divisional Court (supra, p. 60) affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—11*th December* 1907.

Curtice v. London City and Midland Bank.

Bank—Cheque—Countermand—Bill of Exchange — Bills of Exchange Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. cap. 61), sect. 75.—Decision of the Divisional Court (supra, p. 60) reversed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—11*th December* 1907.

Spiers v. Hunt.

Contract—Illegal—Public Policy.—Held that a promise by a married man to marry a woman after his wife's death, the woman knowing that he was married, was illegal, as contrary to public policy, and would not be enforced.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore, J.).—12*th December* 1907.

Collins v. Simpson Steamship Company.

Ship—Seaman—Wages—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sect. 158.—Decision of Sutton, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 171), reversed in so far as he found that the seamen were entitled to wages down to the date of judgment, the Court holding that there had been a loss of the ship in the sense of section 158 of the above Act when the ship was destroyed by explosion, and that the seamen were only entitled to wages to that date.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—12*th December* 1907.

Yuill & Company v. Scott-Robson.

Contract—Sale—Construction.—Decision of Channell, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 162), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—13*th December* 1907.

Cremins v. Guest, Keen & Nettlefold.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sect. 1—"In the Course of the Employment."—A large number of the workmen at a colliery lived at a place about six miles distant, and they were conveyed to and from the colliery by a train composed of waggons belonging to the employers, but on a line belonging to and engined by a railway company. The terminus of the train was a platform erected by the employers on ground belonging to the railway company at a distance of a quarter of a mile from the colliery. The workmen were conveyed free of charge. The County Court judge found as a fact that it was an implied term of the contract of service that the workmen should be so conveyed. A workman, on his road home from his work, was killed while on the platform waiting for the train, by being pushed on to the line and run over. Held that the accident occurred "in the course of" the employment.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—13*th December* 1907.

Bennett & Co. v. J. & A. Brown.

Ship — Demurrage. — A charter-party provided that the vessel should sail to Valparaiso and there discharge at a certain rate, "delay by . . . . storms, surf, weather . . . . not to count in the time for . . . . discharging." The cargo was to be taken delivery of "at the average rate of 250 tons per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) with ten days allowed on demurrage." The vessel discharged into lighters which discharged the cargo on the beach. In a claim for demurrage it was proved that there was a custom at the port of Valparaiso by which the port captain declared what were surf days; but it was also proved that the discharge of the vessel had been continued on certain days which had been so declared to be surf days, although on these days the discharge of the lighters on the beach had been delayed by the surf. Held that the custom did not override the provision of the charter-party as to "weather working days," which meant days on which the work of discharge was not prevented by bad weather, but that the delay occasioned by the surf must be deducted from the time for which demurrage was payable.—K.B. Div. (Walton, J.)—13*th December* 1907.

Perry v. Wright.

Cain v. Leyland & Co.

Bailey v. Kenworthy Ltd.

Gough v. Crawshay Bros., Cyfartha, Ltd.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), Sched. I. (1), (2)—Average Weekly Earnings.—A casual dock labourer was injured after working for two days for his then employers; he had no regular employment, but worked some days for one firm and some days for another. The County Court judge found that among dock labourers there were no definite grades, but that the men formed themselves into grades of good and bad, the former earning double the amount of the latter; that the applicant was a man of poor physique and did not stick to his work. He therefore placed him in the lower of these two classes, and awarded compensation on the basis of the earnings of that class. Held that he had misdirected himself; that he ought to decide whether dock labourers formed a distinct grade, and if so, what were the average wages in the grade; that he was not bound to take those average wages as the basis of his award, though he must have regard thereto.

A casual shipwright met with an accident on the day on which he began work with the respondents. The County Court judge found that a casual shipwright was not in the same grade as a regular shipwright, and that the earnings of the former were much less than those of the latter; and he awarded compensation based on the average earnings of a casual shipwright. Held that he had not misdirected himself.

An operative cottonspinner had been in the same employment for more than twelve months prior to his accident. During those twelve months there were stoppages (a) by reason of a canal having burst its banks, (b) during a week when all the mills in the town were closed, (c) by reason of accidents to machinery, and (d) on bank holidays. The County Court judge divided the earnings for the twelve months by 52, to find the average weekly wages. Held that he ought to have divided by the number of weeks or portion of weeks during which the applicant was not unavoidably absent from work.

A collier was injured, and an agreement was entered into with his employers as to compensation, under which he returned to work, having partially recovered. He was then employed in light work carrying batteries, and he was paid compensation in proportion to the difference between his wages so earned and his former wages as a collier. While employed at this light work he was fatally injured. Held that the grade in which he was employed must be taken as that in which he was at the time of his death, viz. carrying batteries, and that the compensation paid to him while so employed was no part of his earnings.

Observed (per Cozens-Hardy, M.R.) that the grade in which a workman is employed at the time of his death "refers to the particular rank in the industrial hierarchy occupied by the workman, and not to his greater or less excellence in that rank. It is a question of fact whether there is any grade to which the workman belongs, and it is likewise a question of fact what is the average weekly amount earned in any particular grade. If there is no grade, an estimate must nevertheless be made. . . . Having found that the man has a particular grade, and what are the average wages in that grade, there is no obligation to adopt those average wages as the basis of compensation. The personal element then comes in. It will still be open to consider whether the individual workman is an average man, or is above or below an average man."—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—13*th December* 1907.

Electromobile Co. Ltd. v. British Electromobile Co. Ltd. and Others.

Trade Name—Company—Name.—Decision of Warrington, J. (supra, p. 73), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Earl of Halsbury, Vaughan Williams, L.J., and Bigham, J.).—16*th December* 1907.

Parkin v. South Hetton Coal Co. Ltd.

Master and Servant—Wages.—Decision of the Divisional Court (supra, p. 24) affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Buckley, L.J.).—16*th December* 1907.

National Phonograph Co. Ltd. v. Edison-Bell Consolidated Phonograph Co. Ltd.

Contract—Inducing Breach—Remedy.—Decision of Joyce, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 158), reversed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—18*th December* 1907.

Andersen v. Marten.

Insurance—Marine.—Decision of Channell, J. (supra, p. 40), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ.).—18*th December* 1907.

Cairn Line of Steamships Ltd. v. Corporation of Trinity House.

Ship—Light Dues—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sect. 85.—Decision of Bray, J. (supra, p. 11), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Buckley, L.J.).—18*th December* 1907.

LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Law and Practice relating to the Formation of Companies (Limited by Shares) under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1907, with an Appendix of Forms and Precedents. Third Edition. By Vale Nicolas, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, and W. F. Lawrence, M.A., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworth & Co., 1908. Price 17*s.* 6*d. net.*

This is already the third edition of Mr Vale Nicolas' book upon the formation of companies limited by shares, which was first published in 1903. This is in itself a tribute to the excellence of the work, which is well written, admirably arranged, and exhaustive of the phase of company law with which it deals. The selection of a particular stage in a company's history for treatment was a happy idea, the more so from the fact that company law has become so cumbrous and complicated; and the stage selected, i.e. from the inception of the company to its commencement of business, is one of peculiar importance. Although this edition has been completed before the Companies Act of last year has come fully into operation, that statute has been printed with comments in Part II. of the book, so that the work is quite up to date in the law relating to company formation. This is all the more important as several of the provisions of last year's Company Act have special relation to the inception stage, e.g. the requirement of a statement in lieu of prospectus from all companies other than private companies, which are therein defined for the first time. The collection of forms and precedents in the third part of the book is sure to prove useful to practitioners; and the citation of case law throughout the book is full, every case being cited with its date. The book is got up in a handsome form worthy of the excellent work of its authors.

The Annual Digest of all the Reported Decisions of the Superior Courts, including a Selection from the Scottish and Irish, with a Collection of Cases Followed, Distinguished, Explained, Commented on, Overruled, or Questioned, and References to the Statutes passed during the year 1907. By John Mews, Barrister-at-Law. London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd.; Stevens & Sons Ltd., 1908. Price 15*s.*

Not the least of the merits of this most excellent of digests is the punctuality with which it is published. The part for 1907 was issued in the end of January 1908. As usual, Mr Mews has been eminently successful in formulating the clear and sufficient statements of the import of decisions which his rubrics contain. The classification of subjects and the arrangement of the book is on the lines which Mr Mews has made familiar to the profession. The present volume makes the tenth annual edition which has appeared since the publication of Mr Mews' great "Digest of English Case Law," and we venture to express the hope that from these ten volumes there may be compiled a digest for the period 1898 to 1907, which would be a welcome supplement to those who use the larger work.

The Yearly County Court Practice 1908, founded on Archbold's County Court Practice and Pitt Lewis's County Court Practice. By the late G. Pitt Lewis, K.C., and Sir C. Arnold White, Chief Justice of Madras. 1908 Edition. By His Honour Judge Woodfall and E. H. Tindal Atkinson, B.A., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworth & Co.; Shaw & Sons, 1908. Price 25*s.*

This work is designed to provide for the practitioner in the County Courts of England what the "Yearly Practice of the Supreme Court" provides for barristers and solicitors practising in the High Court. One part of the work contains the same class of information as is supplied in Scotland in the Parliament House Book, but its scope is wider, and in the annotations to the County Court Rules the book becomes to all intents a Manual of Practice in these Courts. The book is issued in two volumes, which are bound together. Volume I. deals with the general practice of the County Courts and Volume II. with the enactments which confer jurisdiction on these Courts in special matters. The Workmen's Compensation Acts occupy, as is natural, a good deal of space in the book. There is a special section devoted to the subject of costs and fees, and another which contains forms, statutory and otherwise, in use in County Courts.

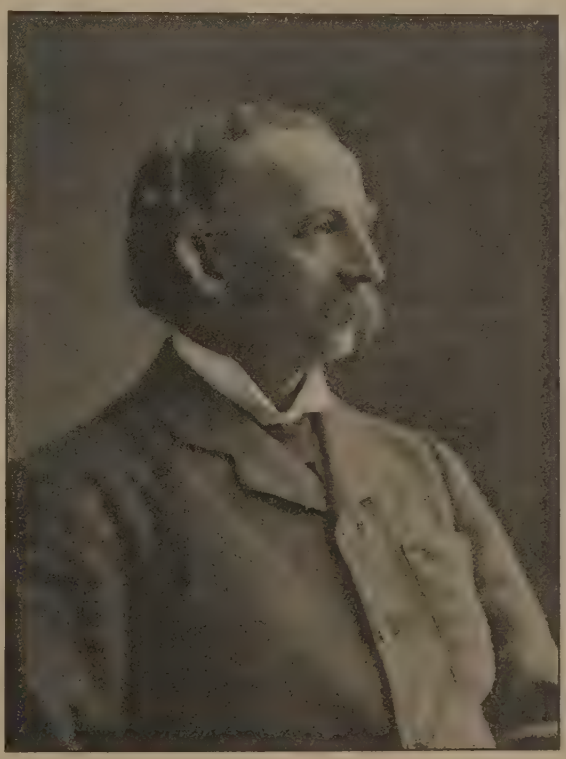
Manual of Small Debt Procedure. By Alfred A. Hurry, LL.B. Edinburgh: William Green & Sons, 1908. Price 4*s. net.*

Mr Hurry has produced an eminently useful little book on the procedure in the Small Debt Court. He expresses the view that a codification of the various Acts dealing with the Court would be an advantage, and with that view we agree. To find all the provisions which now regulate the procedure in the Court, one must refer to the Acts of 1837, 1853, 1889, and to the Sheriff Courts Act of last year. Mr Hurry has not attempted to quote in full the various clauses of the Acts which he mentions. He gives the gist, and in the essential parts follows the sections in ipsissimis verbis. We find his narration of the effect of the sections very accurate, and his citation of authorities is sufficient both as to details and in the number of cases cited. The extension of the limit in the Small Debt Court from £12 to £20 will add largely to the number of cases which will be tried in it, and a general and well-arranged view of the procedure of the Court will accordingly be very welcome at this time. Though it is not a code, Mr Hurry's book might well form the groundwork on which a codification of the whole system might be based.

GEORGE SMYTHE DUNDAS, Esq.,

Sheriff-Substitute of Berwickshire.

For twenty-two years Mr G. S. Dundas has acted as the local Sheriff of Berwickshire. During that long period he has built up for himself the repute of a sound and painstaking judge, and has earned the confidence and esteem of the community. He is noted for a sturdy independence of thought and opinion; in the words of his oath, he has certainly shewn neither "fear nor favour, affection nor ill-will." And in his district he is, besides, a useful citizen, a popular man; and, be it added, a keen and capable sportsman.



Not only twenty-two, but thirty-two years have elapsed since Mr Dundas shook the dust of Parliament House from off his feet. He was born in 1842, and educated at Trinity College, Glenalmond, and at Exeter College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1865. In 1867 he was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates. In that year also were admitted Lord Robertson, Lord Stormonth-Darling, Sir James Gibson Craig, and Sheriff Lees. In 1876 Mr Dundas obtained an appointment in the legal department of the Inland Revenue. This post he resigned in 1880, on being appointed Sheriff-Substitute of Argyllshire at Campbeltown. From Argyll he was transferred to Berwickshire in 1886.

Mr Dundas married, in 1876, Georgina Lockhart, daughter of Professor George Ross, who occupied the Scots Law Chair in Edinburgh University.

The Lord Justice-General received the members of the Bar at his residence in Rothesay Terrace on the evening of Wednesday, 20th inst. There was a large attendance.

This week has been a very quiet week in the Court of Session. The First Division has been engaged in the hearing of one case—the litigation as to the office of Standard Bearer to His Majesty,—and on Tuesday and Wednesday there were only three Judges sitting in the Outer House. Lord Dundas was in Glasgow and Lord Johnston is unable to be in Court.

We are glad to learn that the health of Lord Johnston has considerably improved. His Lordship will not, we understand, return to Court till the Summer Session, but will proceed, as soon as his doctors allow him, to an English or foreign watering-place.

A sitting of the High Court took place in Glasgow on Tuesday and Wednesday. Lord Low and Lord Dundas were the presiding Judges. Mr William Thomson, assisted by Mr Harper Orr, prosecuted in the Old Court, and Mr Grainger Stewart, assisted by Mr A. Maitland, in the New Court. There were in all eleven cases involving thirteen prisoners. In the Old Court there was a charge of murder, but the jury returned a verdict of not proven. Mr Scott Brown and Mr Graham Robertson defended the accused. In the New Court the principal case was that in which two prisoners were charged with theft of money from a safe and an assault, by stabbing to the danger of life, on a young lady engaged as a typewriter in an office in Bath Street, Glasgow. The circumstances of the assault and the mystery in which the whole affair was involved excited great interest in Glasgow, and the progress of the trial was watched by a large audience which completely filled the Court-room. The prisoners were defended by Mr Paton and Mr Carmont, and after a trial lasting over nine hours the jury returned a verdict of guilty against both prisoners. Lord Dundas sentenced the prisoners to periods of ten and twelve years' penal servitude respectively.

Court of Session Notices.—The sittings of the First and Second Divisions of the Court of Session for the trial of civil causes by jury in the ensuing vacation will commence on Saturday, 21st March, and notice of trial must be given on or before Monday, 2nd March. 2nd and 30th April have been appointed to be the Box-days in the ensuing vacation. The Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills will sit in Court on Wednesday, 8th April, and Wednesday, 6th May, for the disposal of motions and other business falling under the 93rd section of The Court of Session Act, 1868, and the 10th section of the Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907; and rolls will be taken up on Monday, 6th April, and Monday, 4th May.

The Late Ebenezer Morrison, Esq., Town Clerk of Bridge of Allan.—The death of Mr Ebenezer Morrison, town clerk of Bridge of Allan, and the oldest member of the local Faculty of solicitors, took place at Allan Park, Stirling, on Monday night. When Bridge of Allan was formed into a burgh in 1870, Mr Morrison was appointed Town Clerk, and from that time he has held the position. On the completion of thirty-five years' service two years ago he was made the recipient of an illuminated address from the Town Council, in recognition of his untiring labours in the interests of the burgh and of the community generally. Mr Morrison, who was a most capable lawyer, acted as factor for the Westerton estate, and he was also a partner of the firm of Messrs Morrison & Taylor, solicitors, Stirling. Mr Morrison in his younger days was a prominent cricketer with the Stirling County Club, and was also an enthusiastic Volunteer, being one of the first to join the local corps when formed, and he was a keen golfer and curler. In politics he was a Conservative, and he was a member of the Episcopal Church. Mr Morrison was in his eightieth year, and was admitted a solicitor in 1853.

The Late Alex. Cumming, Esq., Town Clerk of Nairn.—Mr Alex. Cumming, solicitor and town clerk of Nairn, a partner of the firm of Messrs Laing & Cumming, solicitors, died suddenly on Wednesday at Nairn, after an illness of a few days. He was a native of Forfar, being a son of the Rev. Alex. Cumming, senior minister of the West U.F. Church, Forfar. After serving his apprenticeship in Forfar, he entered the office of Messrs Philip Laing & Co., S.S.C., Edinburgh For several years he was assistant to the town clerk of Dunfermline, and prior to his appointment as town clerk in June 1904 he acted as depute town clerk to the late Mr Laing. Though Mr Cumming was still a young man, his legal services were much sought after. He was agent of the Aberdeen Town and County Bank, and in that and other capacities he was recognised as an able and trustworthy official, and his death in the prime of life is much regretted.

Among the reports issued this week is the case of Montgomerie & Co. v. The Burgh of Haddington, which was decided in the House of Lords on the 21st inst. So far as we are aware there is at present no Scotch Appeal standing for hearing in the House, and the history of the Haddington case well illustrates how thoroughly Lord Loreburn has dealt with the question of arrears in the Court over which he presides. There are now no arrears, and appeals are heard practically as soon as the cases for the appellants and respondents are completed and lodged. In the recent case of Barclay Curle & Co. the appeal was heard within three weeks of the date of the decision in the First Division, but that case was given special facilities. In the Haddington case, however, the appeal has been taken in its ordinary order, and a judgment pronounced by the Second Division on 13th November has now been affirmed.

Another notable feature of recent decisions in the House of Lords is the brevity of the opinions delivered by the learned and noble Lords. The volume of the Session Cases for 1907 which has just been concluded is the largest which has appeared for many years, and the Court of Session Reports extend to 1369 pages. Eight House of Lords Appeals are reported in the volume, and these occupy only 19 pages of print. In "VIII. Fraser" there were eleven Scotch appeals reported in 47 pages of print. In "VII. Fraser" thirteen appeals in 134 pages of print, but this included a report of the Free Church case, which extended to 76 pages. In "VI. Fraser" eight appeals were reported, covering 38 pages, and in "V. Fraser" six, extending to 30 pages. In the period 1888 to 1898, covered by volumes 16 to 25 of Rettie, there was an average of 10·9 Scottish appeals in each year, and an average of 79 pages of House of Lords reports in each volume. While recently the opinions in the House of Lords have been exceedingly brief, the tendency of opinions in the Court of Session is rather the other way. The present volume of the "Scots Law Times" promises to be larger than any of its predecessors. It covers part of the period dealt with in "1907 Session Cases," which, as already stated, is a very large volume, and the sittings of the Extra Division has no doubt added slightly to the number of cases reported. But the main cause of the increased bulk of the volume is the number of lengthy opinions delivered both in the Inner and in the Outer House.

BOOK NOTICES.

Principles and Practice of the Law of Libel and Slander. By Hugh Fraser, M.A., LL.D., of the Inner Temple and Northern Circuit, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworth & Co. Price 15*s.*

This is the fourth edition of a work which is recognised in England as the stand-by of common law practitioners on the subject with which it deals. The suggestions on the conduct of civil actions and the forms and precedents have been considerably enlarged, and the reputation which the book has acquired will certainly be enhanced by the thorough revision which it has undergone. Of course it is an English work, and therefore it can hardly be recommended to Scots lawyers except as furnishing contrasts with the law of Scotland in the departments of criminal libel, damages, etc. But where the Scots lawyer has to find out the difference between the laws of the two countries and illustrations of the English rules, the treatise is an excellent one, sound in its propositions and clear in its deductions as well as exhaustive in its quotations of judicial dicta, and on the whole preferable, on account of its brevity, to Dr Odgers' masterly work. While it is naturally of slender utility to the Scots lawyer, we cannot help thinking that even the English lawyer might have had his knowledge of principles enriched by a judicious citation of Scots authorities on the subjects, inter alia, of privilege, malice, and justifiable comment; but so far as we can find, the reference to Scots cases is confined to the very few slander cases which have found their way from the Court of Session to the House of Lords. The arrangement of the book has not been altered in any essential particular, and it remains a good example of what type and printing can do to help the workaday lawyer in his business.

Handbook on the Formation, Management and Winding-Up of Joint Stock Companies. By F. Gore Brown, M.A., K.C., and William Jordan, Company Registration and Parliamentary Agent. 28th Edition. London: Jordan & Sons Ltd., 1908.

Price 7*s.* 6*d. net.*

As a practical guide to those interested in the formation and management of Joint Stock Companies this handbook (which now extends to over six hundred pages) has acquired great and well-deserved popularity. The 27th edition, published in February of last year, was twice reprinted, and this, the 28th edition, appeared last month. The book has been translated into French and published in Paris, and an edition with notes on South African Company Law has been published in Cape Town. The special feature of this edition is, of course, an incorporation of the provisions of the Companies Act of 1907. The definite recognition of Private Companies, the creation of many new rules giving greater publicity to the financial position of Public Companies, the compulsory registration of certain particulars by foreign companies, the new provisions in regard to Debentures, and the new rights conferred upon creditors in cases of voluntary liquidation, are among the important amendments of Company Law effected by the present Act. Mr Gore Brown expresses a view, with which all company lawyers will cordially agree, in favour of the consolidation of the Companies Acts into one statute. Till that is done, the practitioner cannot afford to be without some reliable guide, like the present, to the labyrinth of statutory provisions affecting Joint Stock Companies.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Horton v. Colwyn Bay Urban District Council.

LANDS CLAUSES ACT — COMPENSATION — PUBLIC HEALTH ACT 1875 (38 & 39 VICT. CAP. 55), SECT. 308.—Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, Vol. XIV. p. 128), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Buckley and Kennedy, L.JJ.).—18*th December* 1907.

The "Bruxellesville."

SHIP—COLLISION.—A vessel injured by collision with another through the fault of the latter put into a near port and was temporarily repaired, there being no facilities there for making a complete repair. She then set out for her port of destination; but the temporary repairs had been insufficient, and she foundered. Held that the vessel in fault was not liable for the foundering of the damaged vessel.—P. D. and A. Div. (Bucknill, J.).—18*th December* 1907.

The Anglo-Algerian Steamship Co. (1906) Ltd. v. The Houlder Line Ltd.

REPARATION — DAMAGES — REMOTENESS.—The defendants' ship when entering a dock collided with and damaged the dock gate owing to negligence on the part of those in charge of her. On the three following days the dock gates were open as usual for the passage of ships, but for three days thereafter they were closed for repairs. When they were closed, a ship belonging to the plaintiffs arrived to take on board a cargo which was lying ready to load, and could not get in. There was no other place in the harbour where she could load her cargo, and the dock was one which any vessel was entitled to enter on payment of the dues. The ship was delayed for two and a half days. Held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to damages from the defendants in respect of the loss caused by the delay, such loss not being directly due to the negligent injury to the dock gate.—K.B. Div. (Walton, J.).—18*th December* 1907.

In the matter of an Arbitration between the Rhondda Tramways Co. and the Taff Vale Railway Co.

Tramway—Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. cap. 78), sect. 30.—Decision of Bray, J. (supra, p. 157), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Buckley, L.JJ.).—19*th December* 1907.

Anglo-American Oil Co. v. Manning.

Master and Servant—Criminal Offence of Servant—Master's Liability.—A servant employed to sell oil from a cart, and supplied by his employers with correct measures, fraudulently substituted an incorrect measure for his own purposes. Held that the employers were not liable for an offence under sect. 25 of the Weights and Measures Act 1878 in respect they had an incorrect measure in their possession.—K.B. Div. (Channell, Bray and Sutton, JJ.).—19*th December* 1907.

In the Matter of an Arbitration between Lucas and the Chesterfield Gas and Water Board.

Lands Clauses Act — Compensation. — A Water Board took land compulsorily for laying their pipes. Held that in assessing compensation the arbiter was entitled to take into consideration the fact that the land taken was part of lands which were naturally peculiarly adapted for the construction of a reservoir, although no person could construct a reservoir there without obtaining Parliamentary powers and compulsorily interfering with the line of pipes belonging to the Water Board. — K.B. Div. (Bray, J.). — 20*th December* 1907.

Millar & Lang Ltd. v. Polak.

Copyright—"Drawings."—An art publisher designed drawings which were pictorial, or pictorial with words added, or words alone in a distinctive form. Dies of these were engraved, from which were struck reproductions, principally in gold leaf, which were then gummed on cards. Held that they were "drawings" capable of registration under the Fine Arts Copyright Act 1862.

Assignation—Validity. — A company was formed to take over the business of M., which was that of a fine art publisher. The company was called M. & L. Ltd., and was registered on 3rd March. On 1st March M. executed an assignment of copyright to M. & L. Ltd. in accordance with an agreement to that effect with a trustee for the company. After incorporation the company adopted the agreement which was followed by the assignment. Held that the right in the copyright had been validly transferred to the company.—Chan. Div. (Neville, J.). —20*th December* 1907.

Kettlewell v. Refuge Assurance Co. Ltd.

Principal and Agent—Fraud of Agent—Liability of Principal. — Decision of the Divisional Court (supra, p. 36), affirmed.—Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Buckley, L.J.).—20*th December* 1907.

In re Beard.

The Reversionary and General Securities Co. Ltd. v. Hall.

Beard v. Hall.

Will — Condition — Validity — Public Policy.—Held that a condition to a bequest in a will forfeiting the gift in the event of the devisee entering the naval or military service of the country was invalid as contrary to public policy. —Chan. Div. (Swinfen Eady, J.).—21*st December* 1907.

Scarpy v. Holland.

Copyright—Musical Composition.—Held that the owner under international copyright of the exclusive right of public performance of musical compositions must, in order to retain his right in this country, print in the English language on the title-page of every published copy the notice required by sect. 1 of the Copyright (Musical Compositions) Act 1882.—Chan. Div. (Neville, J.)—21*st December* 1907.

Bond v. Wilson & Sons.

Master and Servant—Master's Duty to Servant.—A cab-driver in the employment of a firm of cab-hirers took out his master's cab on a Saturday night in the usual course. The horse returned with the cab to the stable at a later hour, but it had previously returned alone when it had been left unattended, and there was nothing about it or the cab or harness to suggest that an accident had occurred. One of the employers went to a public-house to see if the driver was there, but found the house shut, and made no further enquiry. Next day the cab-driver was found in a position which suggested that he had fallen off the cab, and he subsequently died without having sufficiently recovered to give an account of what had happened. In an action for damages against the employers, held that they had not neglected any duty incumbent on them to institute enquiries.—K.B. Div. (Phillimore and Walton, JJ.). —11*th January* 1908.

THOMAS CALLANDER WADE, Esq.,

M.A., LL.B., Solicitor, Falkirk.

The Sheriffs at Falkirk have always been fortunate in having a local Bar above the average in capacity, hard-headedness and industry; and Mr Wade, whose portrait we publish this week, is one of the most forcible and successful pleaders among its members. Born some forty years ago at Falkirk, where his father, the late Rev. George Wade, was a United Presbyterian minister, Mr Wade was educated at the Royal High School and University of Edinburgh. He had a distinguished academical career, and was a Vans Dunlop scholar. His professional training was acquired in the offices of Messrs Russell & Aitken, Falkirk, and a number of well-known Edinburgh firms. In 1898 he joined Messrs Gibson at Falkirk, when their two businesses were amalgamated, and the present partnership of T. & T. Gibson & Wade, W.S., was formed. In an increasing business he finds ample scope for absorbing interest, and his logical mind and retentive memory could not well find a more fitting and congenial sphere.

He was lately appointed one of the examiners for the LL.B. degree in Civil Law, Public Law, and Constitutional Law and History in the University of Edinburgh—an appointment which is rarely given to country practitioners.

Mr Wade has had many and various hobbies. The study of Britain's command of the sea has given place to a keen ardour for German language and literature, and that to a craving for knowledge of the dialects of lowland Scotland. And to each in turn he has applied himself with that thoroughness which those who only know him in business would expect. He may not be a dungeon of learning on any of the subjects which he attacks, but one finds in him a great fund of information on many subjects.

In his recreation Mr Wade has been more versatile than successful. He loves to scan the world from a bicycle; and it is immaterial whether the road takes him by the cliffs of Moher or the banks of the Rhine. What he craves is to be always moving onwards. In his youth he was a footballer by no means to be despised, but his golf is not above reproach.

The Late Henry Cairns, Esq., W.S.

We regret to announce the death of Mr Henry Cairns, W.S., senior partner of Messrs Cairns, M'Intosh & Morton, W.S., a highly respected member of the profession, who died at 27 Buckingham Terrace, Edinburgh, on Saturday, 29th ult. His health had been failing for some time, but he was able to be at business ten days before his death. A son of the late Mr George Cairns, solicitor at law, he was born in Edinburgh in 1831. After serving his apprenticeship with Mr Walter Jollie, W.S., of the firm of Jollie, Strong & Henry, W.S., and attending the law classes at Edinburgh University, he was admitted a member of the W.S. Society in 1854. He then became a partner of the firm of G. & H. Cairns, and since that time has been actively engaged in business. In 1876 he assumed as partners Mr James M'Intosh, S.S.C., now Auditor of the Court of Session, and Mr William Morton, W.S. He was a Commissioner of the W.S. Society. He is survived by his widow, his son, Mr George Morton Cairns, B.A. Oxon, and a daughter.

ACTIONS OF SEPARATION AND ALIMENT IN THE SHERIFF COURT.

The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1907, with modesty and truth, does not describe itself as a code. Its self-chosen designation is "an Act to regulate and amend the laws and practice relating to the civil procedure in Sheriff Courts in Scotland, and for other purposes." Some of its admirers, however, make a higher claim for it. The learned author of the only work which hitherto has appeared on the subject has (with something akin to maternal partiality, perhaps) described it as "The Sheriff Courts Code—Civil." We fear that the popular conception of a code will certainly not be satisfied with any compilation so incomplete that one must consult extraneous enactments and many decisions in order to make good its omissions. Such a code at least is not what your Parliamentary candidate means when he promises you the whole of the law of Scotland in a code which may be carried in your waistcoat pocket, with the accompanying extinction of all lawyers. And beyond doubt this statute is not "self-contained."

The fifth section of the Act extends the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs to, inter alia, "(2) Actions of aliment or of separation and aliment, and for regulating the custody of children." Then the Act provides (in a Schedule) Rules of Procedure, and requires (sect. 39) procedure in all civil causes to be conform to these—"subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament in force after the passing of this Act."

Until the passing of the Act the actions affecting status, and known as consistorial (including "Actions of Separation a mensa et thoro") could be brought only in the Court of Session (11 Geo. IV. and 1 W. IV. c. 69, sect. 33). Actions of aliment could be brought in the Sheriff Court (ibid., sect. 32). The Sheriff might entertain actions arising out of rights incident to status, where an interim arrangement was necessary but where the right itself was not in question (or even in a few cases where it was), as in actions for aliment by a wife where she was living apart; but where there was no contract of separation and no legal separation, the Sheriff could only award interim aliment. Also as regards the custody of children, the Sheriff's jurisdiction extended only to an order ad interim.

In the Court of Session it is not competent to pronounce a decree in favour of the pursuer in any consistorial action, whether or not appearance is entered for the defender, "until the grounds of action shall be substantiated by sufficient evidence" (11 Geo. IV. and Will. IV. c. 69). The question has arisen whether, in extending to the Sheriff Courts jurisdiction in actions of separation and aliment, the Legislature intended that this requirement as to proof even in undefended actions should apply. The statute itself is silent on the subject. Moreover, the only procedure provided for by its rules for undefended cases does not admit of proof being led. In all other respects, presumably, an action of this class will follow Sheriff Court procedure, and not that of the Court of Session. Why should it differ in this respect? Does the provision of sect. 36 of the Act of 1830 (referred to), requiring a proof in all these cases, now apply to the Sheriff Court? It begins by laying a duty on "the Lord Ordinary" to administer the oath of calumny in all actions of divorce; and continues, in the same sentence, to require proof in all consistorial actions even when undefended. Possibly the proviso at the beginning of sect. 39 of the new Act quoted above may be intended to provide for just such a case: the procedure rules are to apply, "subject to the provision of any Act of Parliament in force after the passing" of the Act. Rightly or wrongly, it has already been held in several cases, arising in different Sheriff Courts throughout the country, that proof is required even where the action is undefended. So far as we know, there has not as yet been a case in which the contrary view has been taken.

The point, however, justifies the modest title of the Act, and is an illustration of the truth of the criticism that, as it stands, the statute falls far short of a code. It may approach somewhat nearer to such a character when the Court of Session has had time to rectify by Act of Sederunt some of the inevitable omissions and errors of the rules. J. C.

THE SOCIETY OF SOLICITORS IN THE SUPREME COURT AND THE REGISTRATION OF TITLE.

The Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts of Scotland at a meeting on Tuesday discussed a report by the Council on the question of registration of title, into which a Royal Commission, under the presidency of Lord Dunedin, is enquiring.

The report stated that in any system of registration of title which might be introduced into Scotland it would be necessary to see, first, that it was limited to what the name imported, namely, a registration of title, and that it did not upset our law of land rights; second, that adequate provision was made for identifying the property easily and readily; and third, that adequate provision was made for easily and readily ascertaining (a) the pecuniary or other burdens affecting the subjects, and (b) the conditions, restrictions, and limitations which affected them. Keeping these requirements in view, the Council were of opinion that the methods of registration of title in use in other countries so far as known to them were unsuitable for Scotland. The Council were also of opinion that the introduction of the Australian or English methods would introduce confusion and uncertainty into their system of land rights, that it would seriously interfere with and impair the existing laws regulating these, and that it would seriously and injuriously affect the feeling of security which the public had in regard to the disclosure of burdens, conditions, and restrictions affecting the land, and also thereby operate to diminish the value of land. The Council were informed that certain experiments had been made in the office of the Register of Sasines with the view of seeing whether it would be practicable to institute a satisfactory system of registration of title in Scotland. Through the courtesy of Lord Dunedin, a deputation had had an opportunity of inspecting the experiments. The Council regarded these experiments as of great interest, and likely to be of value as removing the question of the practicability and usefulness of a system of registration of title in Scotland from the region of speculation merely, and subjecting it to a practical test by a specially skilled staff. The direction in which these experiments pointed was that of a development of the Search Sheet system—the institution of a new register founded on the principle of the Search Sheet, which it would supersede. In the sheet of this new register relating to each property, would be entered the writs affecting it, deleting in red ink the entry of any deeds therein which might cease to affect it, and making also a cross reference to the entry therein of the deed affecting the change. Under the register to be instituted the sheet or special register of each property would therefore contain three things, namely—the description of the property, the statement of the burdens, conditions, and restrictions, if any, affecting it, with a reference to a recorded deed containing these, and an entry of the different deeds affecting the subjects. The certificate would consist of a transcript of the register. When a sale took place the transfer would be lodged at the office along with the certificate, and after being examined would be entered in the sheet or register, and a copy of the entry put on the certificate and authenticated and the certificate handed back to the purchaser, and the purchaser's title would then be guaranteed by the State. In the case of a lender a similar but separate certificate would be given to the bondholder. So far as could be gathered, the experiments pointed to the change, if any, being made in the direction merely of a register of title, leaving questions of boundaries, mutual walls, etc., and powers of owners to be settled when they arose just as had been done under the present system.

The meeting adopted the recommendation of the Council, which was that the Society should express its disapproval of the idea of introducing into Scotland the methods of registration of title at present existing in Australia and in some parts of England, and should reserve its opinion as to introducing any system of registration of title into Scotland until full details of the scheme or method proposed were furnished.

PARLIAMENTARY.

The Age of Scottish Sheriffs.

In the House of Commons on 26th February, Mr Watt (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate if, in future appointments of Sheriffs and Sheriff-Substitutes in Scotland, he would make it a condition that retirement should take place at a certain age, and if he would say how many Sheriffs and Sheriff-Substitutes there were in Scotland at present administering justice who were over seventy years of age?

The Lord Advocate said that the tenure of office of Sheriff and Sheriff-Substitute was regulated by statute, and any change in the terms of appointment would require legislative sanction. He had no power to impose the condition mentioned in the question, and he had no official knowledge of the age of these Sheriffs.

Mr Watt.—Is the right hon. gentleman ready to bring in legislation to remedy this evil?

The Lord Advocate.—No.

Scottish Solicitors' and Advocates' Taxes.

Mr Watt (L., Glasgow College), on the 4th inst., asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he was aware that an annual exaction of £6, 6s. was imposed by the Government on solicitors in Scotland, while advocates at the Scottish Bar had the privilege of compounding by a single payment; and whether he would allow the advantage of a single payment to solicitors, or have the annual fee abrogated or substantially reduced.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr Asquith).—There is no analogy between the two duties referred to. The solicitors' certificate duty was imposed upon the certificate which a solicitor is required by law to take out for each year that he continued to practise. The duty paid by the advocates was not a composition for an annual payment, but was a tax upon the admission of a person as an advocate at the Bar. The duty charged on a solicitor's certificate was the same in Scotland as in the other parts of the United Kingdom—viz. £9 for a person practising in the capital, and £6 in other cases. These charges did not appear to him to be excessive.

Scots Law Society.—At a meeting of the Scots Law Society held on Monday evening the following office-bearers were elected for the ensuing session:—Presidents, Mr David Chapel, M.A., LL.B., advocate, Mr R. S. Brown, solicitor, and Mr John Richardson, solicitor; secretary, Mr Richard A. Spaven, solicitor, 29 Queen Street, Edinburgh; treasurer, Mr A. E. S. Thomson, M.A., LL.B., solicitor, 50 George Street, Edinburgh.

Mr Norman Stewart Main, M.A., LL.B., Greenpark, Linlithgow, has been admitted a law agent by the Lords of Council and Session.

An Old Custom at Peebleshire Fiars Court. —At the Fiars Court at Peebles it has been the custom to ballot for six guineas allowed towards the expenses of witnesses, of whom there are a score, six successful witnesses getting a guinea each. At the Court on Monday, Mr William Gibson, West Bold, objected, and asked if the custom did not savour of gambling, and whether it would not be better to divide the six guineas equally among the witnesses. He had been a witness for eight-and-twenty years, and never a guinea had come to him. He was supported by Mr Laidlaw, another witness. Sheriff Orphoot, who presided, said the system of dividing the six guineas among the witnesses was of very old standing, and while he gave no opinion upon the objection raised, he would adhere to the system on the simple ground that it had been a continuous practice for sixty or eighty years. He was not, of his own hand, going to alter it; but if Mr Gibson thought fit to lay the matter before the Sheriff-Principal, it was quite possible he might consider it, and introduce another system.

Town-Clerkship of Wick. — A meeting of Wick Town Council was held on Wednesday to appoint a town-clerk, the office having been rendered vacant by the death of Mr Hector Sutherland. Provost Ross presided. There were twenty-three applications for the office, including two local men. Treasurer Mackenzie moved the appointment of Alexander Bruce, solicitor, Wick, and Mr Nicholson seconded. Bailie Harper proposed Mr Green, solicitor, Wick, and Mr Geddes seconded. On a vote being taken, eight voted for Bruce and six for Green. Mr Bruce is a partner of the firm of Leith & Bruce, and is Depute Procurator-Fiscal. Mr Green was, for several years prior to the amalgamation of Wick and Pulteneytown, town-clerk of Pulteneytown.

Zick v. London United Tramways Ltd.

Lands Clauses Act—Compensation.—The mortgagees in possession of a property received notice to treat from the defendants after they had granted a lease of the property to S for three years. During the currency of the lease an arrangement was entered into by which S surrendered the lease and the mortgagees granted a new lease to the plaintiff for three years. The defendants entered on possession of the property under their notice two years after the lease to S had been granted, S and the plaintiff being all along ignorant of the fact that a notice to treat had been served. Held that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation in respect of the un expired period of the original lease.—K.B. LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Scottish Law List and Legal Directory for 1908. Edinburgh: T. C. & E. C. Jack, 1908. Price 9*s.*

This is the sixty-first annual issue of the "Scottish Index Juridicus," better known as the "Scottish Law List," which is compiled from official sources. It contains lists of the judges and officers of the various Courts of Justice in Scotland, lists of the Faculty of Advocates, of the various Societies of the Solicitor branch of the profession, along with a complete list of the certificated practitioners in Scotland, arranged according to the towns in which they practise. Other useful features of the work are the list of landowners' agents, the list of liquidators of companies, and an insurance directory. The accuracy of the information contained in the book is beyond doubt, and the various lists are printed in large, clear type.

The Law of Private Trading Partnership, Including the Limited Partnership Act 1907. By James Walter Small, Esq., LL.D., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. New and Revised Edition. London: Effingham Wilson, 1908. Price 1*s.* 6*d.*

The general principles of the law of Partnership are, within moderate compass, very clearly set forth in Mr Smith's little book. It is one of the most popular of the "Legal Handy Books" issued by Effingham Wilson, and is now in its thirtieth thousand. The chapter explaining the Limited Partnership Act of last year is the most important part of the new matter in the present edition.

The Court of Session will rise on Friday next for the Spring vacation. The number of jury trials outstanding for the sittings is not large in either Division, and the sittings will probably be concluded within a week of the rising of the Court. A considerable portion of the time of the Divisions this week has been occupied in the hearing of two Seven Judge cases and in advisings which included advisings in two other Seven Judge cases in which the hearings took place recently. The arrears of work in both Divisions have to some extent been decreased since October.

The trial of Alexander B. Forrester and William Forrester in what is known as a "long-firm" fraud case, which had been heard before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury in the High Court, was concluded on Monday last. The trial, which commenced on the 2nd March, lasted seven days and is one of the longest in the modern records of the High Court. The trial of the Pattisons for fraud in 1901 lasted nine days, that of Monson lasted ten days, and that of the City of Glasgow Bank Directors twelve days. In the Forrester case the Solicitor-General, who had with him Mr Orr and Mr William Thomson, advocates-depute, conducted the prosecution, while the prisoners were defended by Mr John Wilson, K.C., and Mr Aitcheson. The indictment, with the schedules, list of productions and witnesses, extended to thirty-seven pages of print, and the figures and details of the evidence were very complicated. There were over a hundred witnesses on the Crown list, and a large number were called for the defence. The Solicitor-General, in addressing the jury on Monday, spoke for almost two hours, and dealt in detail with the complicated evidence, including a large number of dates and figures, without referring to a single note. At the end of his speech there was applause in Court, which was of course instantly suppressed. Applause of that sort is not infrequently heard when the counsel for the prisoner sits down, but it is almost unprecedented in the case of the prosecutor. The jury, after a short absence, found both the prisoners guilty, and sentences of four and three years' penal servitude respectively were pronounced. The result of the prosecution and the sentences imposed will have a very salutary effect. The starting of a limited liability company to facilitate the frauds, and the carefully kept business books which made their detection difficult, were among the notable features of the methods employed by the Forresters.

Lord Johnston, who is, we are glad to know, progressing favourably, left Edinburgh for Bath on Friday of last week.

Lectureship on Commercial Law in the University of Edinburgh. — We understand that the University Court of the University of Edinburgh has decided to found a lectureship on Commercial Law. This, it is expected, may ultimately lead to the establishment of a Chair of Commercial Law, but meantime the lectureship will be in the same position as the other lectureships in the Faculty of Law, except that the proposed remuneration is £400 as against £150, which is the salary attached to the other lectureships. The position is one of great importance, and already the names of several eminently suitable candidates are mentioned. The Court has not yet issued any advertisement intimating the foundation of the lectureship and inviting applications, but as the lectures will commence next winter session the announcement will probably not be long delayed.

THE REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LIGHTHOUSE ADMINISTRATION.

That the cost of lighting our coasts should be defrayed out of dues levied on shipping and not out of national funds, has long been a grievance with shipowners, and in their endeavour to bring about a happier state of affairs they have not been sparing in denunciation of the Lighthouse Boards and most of their works. No Government hitherto has seen its way to abolish the light dues, but Departmental and other inquiries into the constitution and methods of the General Lighthouse Authorities have been numerous, the results of the latest being embodied in the Report of the Royal Commission on Lighthouse Administration which was appointed in August 1906. In view of the intimate connection which has always existed between the Scottish Lighthouse Board and the Parliament House, it may be of interest to notice shortly the conclusions arrived at in the Report.

The Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses were first constituted by Act of Parliament in 1786, and were established in their present form in 1854. The Board is composed of the following twenty-five members:—The Lord Advocate; the Solicitor-General; the Lord Provosts of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Dundee; the Provosts of Inverness, Campbeltown, Greenock and Leith; the Eldest Bailies of Edinburgh and Glasgow; and the Sheriffs of the Lothians, Lanark, Renfrew, Argyll, Inverness, Ross, Caithness, Aberdeen, Ayr, Fife, Forfar, Dumfries, and Berwick. As the Board meets frequently, the active members are of necessity residents in or near Edinburgh, and as the municipal members have as a rule but a short term of office, the administrative responsibility practically rests on the Sheriffs.

In England the lighthouses are administered by the thirteen acting Elder Brethren of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, who are all retired officers of the Royal Navy or Mercantile Marine; and in Ireland by the Commissioners of Irish Lights, consisting of five ex officio members belonging to the Corporation of Dublin, and of seventeen others who are co-opted and who require no special qualifications.

The Scottish and Irish Commissioners give their services gratuitously, while a sum of £7000 is distributed annually in salaries among the Elder Brethren.

In financial matters the three Boards are strictly controlled by the Board of Trade as trustees of the General Lighthouse Fund, and with that Department also rests the ultimate decision respecting all proposals for new seamarks. In the discharge of the latter duty the Board of Trade has had the assistance since 1900 of an advisory committee of shipowners and others, with whom the Lighthouse Authorities meet in conference once a year in London. In certain matters the Scottish and Irish Boards are subject to the control of the Trinity House, to which all proposals for new works must be submitted for approval—an appeal, however, lying to the Board of Trade.

In all other respects, the entire responsibility of administering their respective services rests with the general authorities, and the difference in their methods is thus described in the Report:

"The paid Board of Experts, the Trinity House, identify themselves much more closely and much more continuously with the daily details of the lighthouse service, both ashore and afloat, than do the other two authorities, whose members are unpaid and are seldom experts. Moreover, on the Scottish and Irish Boards only a relatively small proportion of the whole number of Commissioners can be said to take a continuously active share in the work. The regular attendants at Board and Committee meetings are all residents in the immediate neighbourhood of Edinburgh and Dublin. It belongs to the very nature of the case that the position of the Scottish and Irish Commissioners is practically that of a Board of Directors which entrusts the whole of the routine work of administration to a General Manager, reserving to itself only a financial supervision, the decisions on matters of policy, and an ultimate general control. Such a system may be highly efficient. It certainly has proved efficient in the case of the Scottish Board, most of whose active members form a homogeneous body of trained professional men, occupying important posts under the Crown. But its success must depend in very large measure on the character and competence of the chief official of the Board, in particular of the Secretary, on whom the duties of General Manager devolve."

To pass to the results of the enquiry, it may be stated generally that no radical defect has been disclosed in either the constitution or administration of the three authorities. It is not pretended that, if a system of lighthouse administration for the United Kingdom were being constructed for the first time, the present lines would be followed, but it appeared to the Royal Commission to be "injudicious to cast into the melting-pot of legislation authorities which, venerable though they be, have done, and are still doing, good service to the country, and a system which, albeit evolved many years ago, has yet, in the main, worked reasonably well." The want of an expert nautical element on the Scottish and Irish Boards is thought to be a weakness, but it is considered that the undue size of these Boards, which had also been commented on, is neutralised by the fact that the members who do attend are those who take a genuine interest and pleasure in their work.

On the question of efficiency the result of the evidence is that the lighting of our coasts is at least as good as that of any other country, and with reference to the charges of extravagance, the Report states:

"On the whole, the conclusion we have come to is that the kind of criticisms to which the Lighthouse Authorities may be open on the score of defective economy in administration are such as would probably apply to any public body undertaking similar duties. There was certainly no clear evidence of any specific extravagance which was either material or continuous; and we are disposed to believe that the three Boards are alive to the importance of economy, and sincerely anxious to study it in every way, though in some cases long-established custom and routine may constitute an obstacle and danger to rigid economy. If any distinction is to be made between the different authorities in this matter, we think the superiority lies with the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses."

As regards two of the authorities the following footnote on the same page has a more dubious sound:

"An exhaustive analysis, prepared by Admiral Henderson and appended to this Report, of the detailed particulars furnished by each General Lighthouse Authority respecting the lighthouses under its charge, yields results which certainly appear to require the most serious examination alike by the Trinity House and the Commissioners of Irish Lights of their administrative system, services and appliances."

The Report concludes with certain recommendations, the most important of which are thus summarised:

(1) The institution of a system of retirement with pension for the Acting Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

(2) The assignment of an Elder Brother of the Trinity House to act as Assessor to the Scottish and Irish Boards respectively.

(3) The setting up of a new Lighthouse Committee for the United Kingdom in place of the existing Advisory Committee, but with a more established position and a wider scope of activity, to be composed of representatives of the Board of Trade, the Admiralty, the three General Lighthouse Authorities, shipowners, underwriters and cargo-owners.

The Report states that it would be an understood thing that no proposal for a new sea-mark which had failed to obtain the approval of a majority of this Committee should receive the sanction of the Board of Trade.

(4) Abolition or disuse of the statutory control exercised by the Trinity House over the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses and the Commissioners of Irish Lights.

The Report is signed by all the members of the Commission, but the Irish representative, Mr M. A. Ennis, appends some interesting reservations. He considers that the standard of efficiency reached by the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses compares favourably with that of the other two Boards, and while agreeing that the absence of an expert nautical element is a disadvantage, is of opinion that the absence of a commercial element may be a source of weakness to a highly expert nautical body such as the Trinity House, "whose business methods do not appear to me to be quite as efficient as those of the sister authorities, especially of the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses." To the proposal to set up a new Committee devoid of statutory powers Mr Ennis is strongly opposed, and forecasts the probable results by reference to the Advisory Committee's method of dealing with the proposals of the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, "who are probably the most practical and efficient of the lighthouse authorities. . . . The creation of a Lighthouse Committee on the basis suggested in the Report appears to me to be calculated to deprive the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses and the Commissioners of Irish Lights of the semi-independent position which they have hitherto enjoyed, and by depriving them of right of appeal to the Board of Trade, to reduce them to a condition of absolute dependence upon the Lighthouse Committee, which would become in effect a new supreme authority."

On the whole, the Report is interesting, but hardly convincing. In view of the seemingly admitted superiority of the Scottish Board there is an apparent lack of logic in the suggested method of strengthening it, while the hard things Mr Ennis has to say of the proposed Lighthouse Committee are not improbably well deserved.

THE SCOTS LAW SOCIETY.

The ninety-third annual dinner of the Scots Law Society was held on the evening of Saturday last, in the Princes Street Station Hotel, Edinburgh, Lord Dunedin, Lord Justice-General, presiding over a company of about one hundred. The croupiers were Mr J. Bayne, solicitor, and Mr G. D. Valentine, advocate; and among others present were Lord Guthrie, Mr C. Scott Dickson, K.C.; Sheriff Chisholm, K.C.; Sheriff M'Lennan, K.C.; Mr J. B. Sutherland, S.S.C.; Mr J. M'Intosh, Auditor of the Court of Session; Mr E. P. Thomson, Extractor of the Court of Session, and others.

After the loyal toasts were given by the Chairman—

Mr Scott Dickson proposed "The Imperial Forces." He said they all quite recognised that at this time one part of our forces was passing through a very great change, but he was convinced they were all agreed that it was a happy omen that all parties in the State had determined to give that change their loyal support, to secure if possible that we should have the best return for our money and for the services which those engaged in the Imperial Forces were called on to give us. He coupled with the toast the name of their militant brother the Admiral of the Pentland Firth.

Sheriff M'Lennan, K.C., in reply, said that as Vice-Admiral of the Northern Seas he could assure them he had had no communication whatever, private or otherwise, from the German Emperor. He could further assure them there was no risk whatever of the Pentland squadron being reduced by a single ship. Mentioning that the new territorial force came into being on 1st April, Sheriff M'Lennan said they must give to Mr Haldane the credit of having the first qualification of a great soldier—unlimited courage—otherwise he would never have chosen such a day for the creation of his new force.

Lord Dunedin then submitted the toast of "The Scots Law Society." He said the Society as such in its everyday life was a society of young men, and he did not know he could wish it anything better than it should keep its characteristic by remembering that it was the Scots Law Society. There was a time not so very long ago when Scots law was rather at a discount. He did not know if they remembered—probably it was brought to his own mind by the impending oppression of the jury trials—that there was a time when it was not thought they could even conduct a jury trial in Scotland, and that accordingly when civil jury trial was introduced it was not supposed there was a single judge on the bench could manage it, and an English lawyer was appointed in order to be Chief Commissioner. That was a period of great decadence in the first, second, third, and fourth decades of the last century. As he found out during the last week, even the Standard-Bearer did not go to the Coronation, and he had also a sad remembrance of some youthful experience of Glasgow conveyancing, when everything began, "This indenture witnesses." He was pleased to say these days were past. If the pendulum was swinging, it might swing a little far the other way. He certainly had not at present been convinced by the Gaelic magazine which was sent to him, and which proposed that no official should be hereafter elected who did not know Gaelic. It was well to remember that they were present that evening as a body of people who represented the Scots law, and he was bound to say such experience as he had shewed him they had nothing to fear in comparison with any other system. In other words, he thought the great merit of our system had been to shew a capacity for elasticity which, he believed, was not shared by any other system in the world. He did not think they got full measure of that elasticity or the power of applying it in future developments, if they should rise to such places as needed the power, if they were not well grounded in what after all was our own system. He hoped they would always keep before them the fair fame of Scots law and Scots legal establishment, because he was not sure that in these latter days it might not from some unexpected quarters be threatened.

Mr G. D. Valentine replied.

Sheriff Chisholm, in proposing the health of the extraordinary and honorary members of the Society, said he was sure these members would all hasten to acknowledge their indebtedness to the Society, and to express their appreciation of the usefulness in their career of the training they got in the Society. The present members, on their part, had every reason to be proud of those who had gone before them in the fighting ranks.

Lord Guthrie, in replying, said the Society ought to be doing something very shortly in connection with the recording of their own history. He wished to make a suggestion for their consideration. A Society of this kind ought to have a written history, and why should not the centenary be celebrated by the publication of a history of the Society? Such a history would contain a list of the members, an account of the Society, and other interesting details, with, he hoped, portraits — including, of course, extraordinary and honorary members. In connection with the portraits they might have to consider a very serious question that was suggested to him the previous day. He read not only the "Record" of the United Free Church, but also that of the Free Church, and he read in this month's Free Church "Record"—and he sent it to Lord Ardwall for his edification and Sunday reading—a letter which objected to ministers wearing gowns. The letter stated: "There is neither good taste nor common-sense about it. Surely it is more comely to appear in the pulpit as formed by the Creator?" They might apply the same argument to judges and their gowns, so that the question might have to be considerd in connection with the portraits in the Society's history.

Mr J. B. Sutherland proposed the toast of "Kindred Societies." He spoke of the usefulness of such societies in training young men, in the mimic controversies which they fought in the societies, for the more important controversies and warfare which they had to wage when they entered into the wider sphere of action.

Mr John Maxwell acknowledged the toast on behalf of the Glasgow Legal and Speculative Society.

Mr C. Maitland Smith, President of the Edinburgh Chartered Accountant Student Society, who also replied, said he trusted the two Societies would continue to aid one another by such methods as their joint debates and mock trials.

The health of the Chairman was afterwards proposed by Mr J. Kinmont, S.S.C.

In the course of the evening a number of songs were given by members of the company.

EDINBURGH LEGAL DISPENSARY.

The ninth annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Edinburgh Legal Dispensary was held in the Goold Hall on Tuesday afternoon—Mr G. M. Paul, D.K.S., presiding. Mr J. P. Coldstream, W.S., submitted the annual Report, which set forth that during the year the number of clients attending the Dispensary was 920, as against 848 in the previous year, while there were 1381 consultations, as against 1194. The average attendance for each night was 26·57, as against 23·41. The largest attendance for the year on a single night was 38, as against 40. In addition to the consultations, the advising lawyers had written about 500 letters and held about 200 outside interviews. Of the clients during the year 339 were men and 581 were women. There were 920 clients, and the cases embraced 203 relating to husband and wife, 170 to parent and child, 31 to master and servant, 116 to landlord and tenant, 135 to debt, 49 to succession, and 56 to damages for personal injury. There were 293 cases remitted to the agents for the poor during the year, as against 206. The Police Court defensor had appeared for 170 accused persons, as against 278 in the previous year. Viewed from every standpoint, the report, said Mr Coldstream, was a very encouraging one. It had been a record year with them. So large had the attendance become they had been obliged to open another room. Their Police Court defensor was the first official of the kind. Other municipalities seemed inclined to take that matter up, and Dundee had appointed their defensor a permanent official. He urged upon the Lord Provost of Edinburgh the advisability of seeing that Edinburgh in this matter might follow the example of Dundee, and appoint their officer a permanent official of the Town Council. He believed it would pay. Ladies, though they had been allowed to study law at the Universities and take degrees, were unfortunately still debarred from practising for remuneration, but he was glad to think that in the near future the Courts would see their way, and legal bodies also, to admit ladies to their ranks. Until that was done he hoped ladies who were now studying law in the University would go down to help them in the Canongate. It was work peculiarly well fitted for ladies, as they had a very large number of women as clients. The chairman moved, and the Rev. George Laing seconded, the adoption of the report. The Lord Provost, in submitting a motion commending the Society to the sympathy and support of the citizens, said he had learned that the services of the Society's defensor were of the greatest service to the poor, and even to the Magistrates. Mr David Paulin, F.F.A., seconded, and the motion was carried, as was also another submitted by Sheriff Gillespie, by which the directors and office-bearers were reappointed.

The firms of Marshall & Inglis, 145 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, and Carrick & Glen, 194 St Vincent Street, Glasgow, of which Mr David Inglis and Mr James Glen have respectively been, for a number of years, the sole partners, have been amalgamated. Messrs Inglis & Glen will in future carry on business together as Writers, at 26 Bothwell Street, Glasgow, under the style of Inglis, Glen & Co.

Faculty of Advocates.—A meeting of the Faculty of Advocates was held on 5th inst., the Dean of Faculty, Mr William Campbell, K.C., in the chair. A Committee was appointed to consider and report on the Children's Bill 1908. Mr N. J. K. Cochran-Patrick was appointed as representative of the Faculty on the Council of the Scottish Branch of Queen Victoria's Jubilee Institute for Nurses, in room of Lord Guthrie, who has resigned.

DECISIONS IN THE ENGLISH COURTS.

Cooper v. Ogden.

Election Law—Vote—Validity.—On a voting paper a cross was placed opposite the words "ballot paper" and immediately above the spaces left blank for voting. The cross extended to a small degree into the blank space opposite the name of the candidate which was first on the paper. Held that it was a good vote in favour of that candidate.

On a voting paper containing the names of two candidates a cross was placed opposite the name of one and a diagonal line opposite the name of another. Held that it was a good vote in favour of the candidate opposite whose name the cross was placed.

In the space opposite the name of a candidate on a voting paper was a mark apparently made by a pencil of which the lead had broken, leaving only an impression. Held that it was a good vote.—K.B. Div. (Bigham and Phillimore, JJ.)—13*th January* 1908.

Oettinger and Others v. Cohn.

Revenue—Stamp Duty—Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. cap. 39), sect. 33.—Held that a promissory note written in the United Kingdom and payable at sight was liable to an ad valorem duty.—K.B. Div. (Channell, J.).—16*th January* 1908.

Husband and Wife—Nullity of Marriage—Evidence.—Where a wife repelled all advances towards consummating the marriage, insisted on always occuping a separate bed, about eighteen months after the marriage left her husband and declined to return to him, and refused to permit a medical examination, held that the Court ought to draw an inference of impotency.—P.D. and A. Div. (Gorell Barnes, P.).—16*th January* 1908.

ACT OF SEDERUNT Regulating the Fees Payable in the Sheriff Courts of Scotland, and Prescribing the Form of Books of Account to be Kept by Sheriff Clerks.

Edinburgh, 7th March 1908.

The Lords of Council and Session, in pursuance of the power vested in them by sect. 2 of the Courts of Law Fees (Scotland) Act 1895, and sect. 40 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1907, do enact that on and after the first day of April 1908 the Act of Sederunt of 20th December 1898, and so much of the two Acts of Sederunt of 7th July 1904, and of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, as relates to fees payable in the Sheriff Courts of Scotland, shall be and are by this Act repealed; and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted:

1. On and after the first day of April 1908 Sheriff Clerks shall be entitled to charge the fees specified in the tables hereto annexed in place of the fees hitherto chargeable by them, and no other or higher fees shall be charged by them, nor shall any addition be made thereto in respect of postage or otherwise.

2. Sheriff Clerks shall be responsible for the collection of all fees specified in the tables, and it shall be their duty to refuse to receive any paper chargeable with a fee, or to transmit any service or petition for completion of title for extract, or to allow any marking of an appeal, or other marking to be made in respect of which a fee is payable, unless the appropriate fee has been paid; and it shall further be their duty, when a fee is declared payable prior to any particular step being taken in a process, and such fee has not been paid by either party, to call the attention of the Sheriff to the matter; and the Sheriff, unless the fee is thereupon paid, shall proceed with the case as if the party by whom the unpaid fee is payable were absent or in default.

3. The fee in sect. 1 of Part I. shall cover extract. The ad valorem fees in sect. 3 of Part I. shall cover all proceedings, including correspondence, but not including petitions for appointment of executor, for restriction of caution, or for special warrants. The fee in sect. 6 of Part II. shall cover all proceedings including extract, but not including appeal. The fees in sects. 7 to 18 inclusive and 27 to 32 inclusive of Part II. shall cover all proceedings including, in bankruptcy cases, the necessary extracts and abbreviates for the Accountant of Court and other Government Departments. The fees in sects. 19 and 20 of Part II. shall cover all proceedings including extract, but not including stated case. The fees in sects. 21 to 26 inclusive of Part II. shall cover all proceedings, except appeal or stated case, in any action or proceeding for which special fees are not provided elsewhere. In criminal cases at the instance of a private prosecutor, when more persons than one are proceeded against in one complaint, the fee shall cover one extract conviction of order in respect of each person.

Any subsequent extracts or copies required shall be charged under sect. 4 of Part I., or sect. 1 of Part II. In litigated commissary, service of heirs, and bankruptcy cases, the same fees shall be charged as for similar business in the ordinary Sheriff Court.

When a small debt case is remitted to the ordinary roll, the parties shall pay fees as for an ordinary action, under deduction of any fees already paid.

4. No fees shall be payable in the first instance by any officer of the Crown in proceedings the expenses of which are payable by the Crown. When, however, such officer is found entitled to expenses, the Court fees shall be included and decerned for.

5. No fees shall be payable in cases of cessio bonorum; in cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, except stated cases or applications for reference to a medical referee; on applications under sect. 5 of the Dogs Act 1906; on applications for relief under the Poor Laws; on petition for leave to sue in forma pauperis; or on applications under the Acts for Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages, except those for registration of irregular marriages, or for warrant to record legitimation per subsequens matrimonium.

Parties allowed to sue or defend in forma pauperis shall be exempted from payment of fees in the first instance; but when they are found entitled to expenses, the Court fees shall be included and decerned for. Any party or agent recovering any of the said expenses shall be bound to account therefor pro rata to the Sheriff Clerk.

At any time not exceeding six months after the close of the year of office of an agent for the poor, he shall prepare a list of the "Poor" cases in which he acted, showing the amount recovered by him, or by the parties represented by him, in each case. He shall then sign said list as a certificate of its correctness, and shall send the same to the Sheriff Clerk, along with a remittance for the Court fees recovered by him. From time to time thereafter he shall remit to the Sheriff Clerk the proper proportion of any further expenses recovered by him.

6. The Books of Account to be kept by Sheriff Clerks shall be in the form of the schedules hereto annexed.

7. Bar Officers and the Macer of the Sheriff Court of Chancery shall be entitled to charge for their services the fees specified as "Bar Officers' Fees" in the tables hereto annexed.

8. In this Act and relative tables the following words shall include the meanings undermentioned:—

"Defender," "Compearer," and "Party," shall, respectively, include a set of Defenders, Compearers, and Parties with the same interest, for whom one First Paper has been lodged.

"Writ" and "Paper" shall include Inventory of Personal Estate, Summons, Petition, Application, Appeal bringing an Action into the Sheriff Court, Precept of Arrestment on a Liquid Document of Debt, Note of Objections, Notice of Appearance, Answers, Defences, Statement in writing, or other written Pleading, in a cause or proceeding.

"Decree" in sect. 26 of Part II. shall include Licence, Appointment, Discharge, Certificate of Registration of a Club, or other written statement of the Sheriff's decision in any proceeding under sect. 21 of Part II.

"Appeal" shall include the transfer of an action to the Court of Session at the instance of a party.

"Sheet" shall mean 250 words or part thereof.

"Sheriff" shall include Sheriff-Substitute.

"Sheriff Clerk" shall include Commissary Clerk of Edinburgh, Sheriff Clerk of Chancery, and Sheriff Clerk Depute.

And the Lords APPOINT this Act and the annexed Tables and Schedules to be inserted in the Books of Sederunt, and to be printed and published in common form.

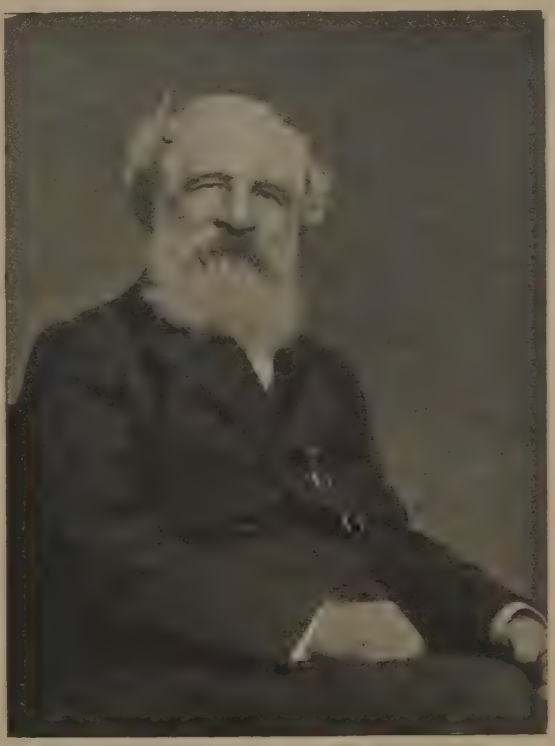
The Late Sir JAMES MARWICK, LL.D.

We much regret to record the death of Sir James Marwick, which took place at his residence in Glasgow on Tuesday evening. Sir James, who was in his eighty-second year, retired from the position of Town-Clerk of Glasgow, which he had held for over thirty-one years, in December 1903. Before taking office in Glasgow he occupied for thirteen years the position of Town-Clerk of Edinburgh. He was one of the senior members of the S.S.C. Society, having been admitted in 1858.



A sketch of Sir James Marwick's career appeared in our issue of 7th June 1902, and it is unnecessary here to recapitulate his great services to the municipality of Glasgow, or his excellent work in historical research in the records of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and in many other fields of antiquarian interest.

On his resignation he received many public manifestations of the high esteem in which he was held by all classes of the community in the second city of the Empire. His bust was placed, by public subscription, in the Art Galleries in Kelvingrove Museum, and a replica was presented to Lady Marwick. Sir John Ure Primrose, in making the presentation, fittingly referred to the common desire to testify admiration, love, and attachment to one who had served Glasgow so long, and who in his every act had commanded the confidence and respect of his fellows.

Sir James Marwick has died full of years and honours. His work as a public servant will long be remembered. In private life the charm of his manner, the variety of his interests, and his upright, manly, and genial character, made him many friends who now mourn his loss.

The Court of Session rose on Friday for the spring vacation, and the last of the jury trials at the sittings was concluded on Tuesday. A group of Provisional Order Inquiries are to be held in one of the Court Rooms at the end of this month, but otherwise there will practically be no business in the Parliament House till the meeting of the Court in May. During the vacation—when they can make as much noise as they please without disturbing the Court—the contractors employed by the Board of Works will make special efforts to complete certain sections of the new buildings. It is not, however, proposed to make any alterations on the existing Bars of the Lords Ordinary till the rising of the Court in July.

Faculty of Advocates.—Mr William Harrison Kirkland, LL.B. Edin., has been admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates.

The late J. P. Campbell, Esq., Solicitor, Edinburgh.—The death took place on 21st inst. of Mr James Paterson Campbell, solicitor, at his residence in Mayfield Road, Edinburgh. Mr Campbell was only about a week ill, and the end came very suddenly. He was the elder son of the Rev. John Campbell, long a well-known missionary of the United Presbyterian Church at Lucea, Jamaica. He was sent to this country early in life, and educated for the legal profession, serving for a considerable time in the office of Messrs Millar, Robson & Innes, W.S. On passing as law agent, he was for some time a partner with Mr J. Stewart Galletly, S.S.C. When Lord M'Laren was raised to the Bench, Mr Campbell was made his clerk, an office which he has held ever since. Mr Campbell was of a very genial nature, and remarkable for his courtesy and kindness to all with whom he was brought in contact. He was a keen golfer, and was seen at his best on the golf links. Mr Campbell was in his fifty-sixth year, and will be very much missed, both in the Parliament House and by a wide circle of friends, to whom his personal qualities very much endeared him.

LONDON LETTER.

Temple, 20*th March* 1908.

International lawyers in London are anxious to know whether Glasgow supports Liverpool in its desire to abolish the right of capture of enemies' property at sea. The principle which would add to the rule established by the Declaration of Paris, "Free ships, free goods," the sweeping addendum, "Enemy ships, free goods," is not usually regarded as a particularly conservative doctrine. It has generally been advocated by pacificists and politicians of the Manchester school. Among its conspicuous advocates at the present day is the Lord Chancellor, who, shortly before assuming office, addressed an exhaustive letter to the London "Times," in which he strongly recommended the change. Opinions vary very much as to the precise utility of the liberty of capture to a belligerent. If, as seems desirable, his rights of capturing contraband are severely cut down to objects which are obviously warlike, it may be of supreme value to him to possess the power of at any rate capturing his enemies' own floating goods which he wishes to intercept, without being bound by such restrictions. But this object might be attained by conceding to him the power of capturing his enemy's goods if he can prove that they were really intended for warlike purposes (much as he can, under certain circumstances, capture neutral goods of particular categories now). At the same time, there is no doubt that the new principle would cut down a strong belligerent's powers. On the other hand, it would prevent all interference with our trade if we were at war, and would render convoy, patrol, and national insurance unnecessary. Our ships could come and go without fear of predatory Alabamas; whilst, if we lost for a time, or altogether, the command of the sea, the difference to commerce would be incalculable. The last argument is not so strong as it looks: for an enemy who had command of the sea would inevitably institute a blockade; and it is not proposed to do away with that process. On the whole, the Foreign Secretary did not smile on the proposal; and the House of Commons appeared to assent to his cautious attitude.

Probably you have noted the curious decision in the Lords, by which a transfer by a French document executed in Paris of goods situate there from one English company to another, was held to require a British stamp as on a conveyance (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Maple & Co. (Paris) Ltd., L.R. [1908] A.C. 22). This decision of Lord Macnaghten's (in which Lords Ashbourne, James and Atkinson concurred) reversed the finding of Lords Justices Farwell and Moulton (Lord Collins dissenting). It seems to proceed on the ground that the consideration for the transfer was the allotment of shares in the vendee company, and that to enable this purpose to be carried out the conveyance had to be filed with the registrar of companies in London. The Stamps Act 1891 (sect. 14, sub-sect. 4) says that an instrument "relating to" something to be done in the United Kingdom "shall not be available for any purpose" unless stamped. "The reckless breadth of this definition," said Lord Justice Moulton, L.R. [1907] 2 K.B. 846, must not be read as extending the requirements of the statute, but only as imposing an additional disability on the documents which are carefully particularised, as requiring to be stamped, in other sections of the Act. "The whole world," said his Lordship, "would every hour be drawing up invalid documents and incurring penalties by tens of thousands," because in some way they "related to" things to be done in England, unless the fundamental principle is observed, that in construing fiscal acts they must be read as applying to the country itself and not to the world outside. The Lords, however, adhered to the wider construction, and held that the duty was payable.

It is announced that the International Law Association has been invited by various influential legal bodies in Hungary to hold its 25th conference from 22nd to 25th September next in Buda-Pesth, and that the invitation has been accepted. His Excellency Dr Anton Günther, Royal Minister of State for Justice, has expressed his willingness to accept the position of Honorary President, and the President of the Association (Mr Justice Phillimore) is also expected to be present at the meeting. Great interest is excited in Hungary by the proposed gathering, and extensive preparations are being made for the function by a Reception Committee, of which the British consul, Dr Ignaz Brüll, C.M.G., who has so long been a prominent figure in the life of Buda-Pesth, is an active member. The subjects for discussion will include the topics of the Unification of the Law of Bills of Exchange, the Sale of Goods in its international aspect, Double Taxation, Court Procedure, Extradition, and other interesting problems.

Parliament has before this been the scene of personal hostilities between its members. The memorable fracas which marked the progress through the House of Commons of the Home Rule Bill was not so many years ago. The chronicler has now to record a regrettable incident of the same sort between two of His Majesty's Counsel, in the Court where the Railway and Canal Commission was engaged in hearing the important application for the virtual amalgamation of the Great Central and Great Northern Railways. Whether the same reason as was alleged for the Parliamentary scuffle—the crowding necessitated by the inadequate seating accommodation—was the cause of the recent incident or not is not stated. Had the members of the tribunal been actually present in Court, the affair would have worn a much more serious aspect; but, like a good Scotsman, Sir Robert Finlay meanwhile intervened and restored peace. The Commission is clearly a Court, having (in England) the powers of the old Court of Common Pleas; and since 1888 it has had by statute the position of a Court of Record, which carries with it the power to commit for contempt. It is a contempt to strike anyone in a superior Court of Record, and the Commission answers this description, for although it used to be subject to "prohibition" by the High Court (South-Eastern Railway v. Railway Commissioners, 1881, L.R. 6 Q.B. 586), this liability has now been removed by the statute of 1888 (sect. 17, sub-sect. 6), and the Court has in terms been invested with all the powers of a superior Court.

The Vinerian scholarship (the blue ribbon of the legal world at Oxford) has just been awarded to Mr W. F. Greene. Mr Greene is a fellow of All Souls, a Craven and Hertford scholar. Like many other promising lawyers, he never took the Jurisprudence B.A., but secured a first class in Literæ Humaniores.

Lands Clauses Act—Deposited Money—Brokerage.—When two sums of unequal amount which had been deposited under the Lands Clauses Act by two different railway companies had to be paid out, held that the broker's commission on selling these two funds before payment out of Court should be borne by the two companies equally.—Chan. Burgis and Others v. Constantine.

Ship—Shares.—The plaintiffs transferred their shares in a ship, of which Hine Brothers were managers, to Wilfrid Hine in order that he might transfer them to a company to be formed. Wilfrid Hine was registered as owner of the shares. He then signed at the request of his son, who was in the employment of Hine Brothers, a blank form of mortgage, his son having undertaken to mortgage the shares to the defendant for a loan to the firm. The defendant's agent filled in the blank form, the advance was given, and the defendant registered his mortgage. In an action to have the register rectified by expunging the mortgage, held that, the mortgage form having been signed blank, the mortgage was a nullity; but that, the plaintiffs having transferred their shares to Wilfrid Hine that he might deal with them, and Wilfrid Hine having dealt with them, the plaintiffs were entitled to an equitable charge on the shares to the extent of the unpaid balance of the advance. —K.B. LAW LIBRARY.

BOOK NOTICES.

Criminal Appeal and Evidence. By N. W. Sibley, LL.M., Trin. H. Camb. and B.A. Lond., Barrister-at-Law of Lincoln's Inn. London: T. Fisher Unwin. Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1908. Price 15*s. net.*

This book contains a wealth of information on the subject of Criminal Appeal. Mr Sibley has made most exhaustive researches into the history of English Criminal Law, and has noticed, explained, and commented on almost all the cases in which controversies have arisen as to the correctness of the verdict or the inclusion of improper and the exclusion of proper evidence. Convictions obtained on purely circumstancial evidence, cases of mistaken identity, conflict of evidence of different sets of witnesses, are exemplified in many of the cases cited. The author has also collected, from charges to grand juries, speeches in Parliament, evidence before Royal Commissions, and many other miscellaneous sources, the views on the subject of Criminal Appeal of many of the great English lawyers of the last two centuries. Chapters are devoted to the Royal Prerogative of Mercy, to compensation in cases of wrongful conviction, and to the recent case of George Edalji. There is a critical essay on the Criminal Appeal Act of last year, in which the views of those who opposed as well as of those in favour of the Act are very fairly set forth. The Act itself is printed in an Appendix, and there are notes in which the criminal systems of other countries are explained. The success of the new system of criminal appeal will largely rest on the way in which the Act is administered. The number of appeals will depend upon whether the new Court takes the view that appeals should only be allowed as an exceptional remedy, or shews a general willingness to reconsider questions of fact or law arising in the course of criminal trials. The Act does not apply to Scotland, and the Scottish system is therefore left as it is. There is no appeal from the decision of a jury in the High Court or from a ruling on evidence of a single Justiciary judge presiding at a criminal case. In the old days two or more judges sat together at criminal trials and considered jointly any questions as to admissibility of evidence that might arise. Though there is no appeal from the ruling of a Justiciary judge, it is thought that it would still be open to counsel to request a judge presiding alone at a criminal trial to reserve any question of law arising for the decision of a fuller Bench of the High Court. That procedure, even if it be competent, would not afford any remedy in cases where the jury had taken a wrong view of the evidence, and the majority of cases where criminal appeal is required are not cases turning on the ruling of a judge.

The Master Mariner's Legal Guide. By Albert Saunders, Solicitor, of the Supreme Court. Second Edition. London: Effingham Wilson, 1908. Price 10*s.* 6*d. net.*

This is a handy volume for the shipmaster's use, giving him, under headings alphabetically arranged, a précis of the law as it stands. The first edition of the work was published in 1903, and a new edition has been necessitated, principally by the amendments made by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906 on the Act of 1894. The author has, however, taken the opportunity to incorporate in his Guide the effects on the master mariner's province of the Aliens Act of 1905, and the maritime extension in the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. The matter of the book is well arranged, and its information concisely put; and we have no doubt that Mr Saunders' work will be of great assistance to those for whom he has written it. At the same time, we are not prepared to go the whole way with the author when he says that it will be quite impossible for the master to understand the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906 without the aid of this Guide!

A Treatise on the Law relating to the Devolution of Real Estate on Death, under Part I. of the Land Transfer Act 1897, and the Administration of Assets, Real and Personal. By the late Leopold George Gordon Robbins (late Reader in Equity to the Inns of Court), and Frederic Trentham Maw, both of Lincoln's Inn, Barristers-at-Law. Fourth Edition. By Frederic Trentham Maw. London: Butterworth & Co., 1908. Price 15*s. net.*

It is now seven years since Mr Maw issued the third edition of this work in its enlarged form, incorporating the subject of the devolution of real estate, which had been previously separately treated by the late Mr L. G. G. Robbins, in a work embracing the whole law relating to real and personal assets. The general arrangement of the subject-matter adopted in the previous edition remains unchanged, but in several chapters considerable alterations and additions have been made by the author. Chapter IV., "Of the Devolution of Real Estate," has been almost entirely rewritten, and Chapter IX., which treats of the payments of debts by the personal representatives, has been remodelled in keeping with the latest decisions upon the construction of Hinde Palmer's Act (32 & 33 Vict. cap. 46), and particularly the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Samson, Robbins v. Alexander (1906), 2 Ch. 584, in which it was held that the Act was intended to abolish the distinction between specialty creditors and simple contract creditors claiming upon the estate, and to produce equality of distribution in the administration of the estate by the personal representative.

During the interval which has elapsed since the previous edition was issued a number of important decisions have been given by the Courts upon the construction of Part I. of the Land Transfer Act 1897, and sect. 10 of the Judicature Act 1875, and these, along with the recent decisions on the incidence of the various death duties, are discussed by the author and incorporated into the text.

The work deals with a very intricate and difficult branch of the law, and the author, by the arrangement and treatment adopted by him, has done much to simplify the subject for the ordinary practitioner. The present edition shows traces of great care and industry in its preparation, and will be welcomed by the profession as a most useful addition to the text books dealing with this branch of the law. An exhaustive table of the numerous cases and statutes bearing upon the subject is included in the volume.

Murray's Trustees appealed.

The House, without calling on counsel for the Respondents, dismissed the appeal with expenses.

The Earl of Halsbury.—My Lords, the question in this case is certainly reduced to a very simple one, and that is whether your Lordships are able to give a definite legal meaning to the restrictive words of this covenant. I confess I have been looking in vain for some definite guide as to what is suggested to be the real meaning. Both the learned counsel who have addressed your Lordships have, I think, failed to give any definite meaning to the words. What may reasonably be "seemly" appears to be a question rather of the personal conduct of the individuals engaged than any characteristic of the building which is supposed to be itself an infraction of the covenant that has been entered into.

I really do not feel it necessary to say any more about the matter except that I concur with the judgment of the Court of Session, and I think the appeal should be dismissed. I am wholly unable to follow the reasoning which alters the applicability of such words as are used here into some definite meaning which a Court can enforce. I am not aware of anything which will give in the ordinary use of language such an effect to these words as to render that meaning capable of being enforced.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord James of Hereford.—My Lords, I concur.

Lord Robertson.—My Lords, I think this is a very clear case, but the law on this subject of servitudes affecting real property is one which requires delicacy of statement, and I shall most usefully express my opinion by saying that I entirely concur in the whole of the judgment of Lord Kinnear.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords, I concur. I think the judgment of the Court of Session was right. —13*th May* 1907.

Right in Security—Heritable—Ex Facie Absolute Disposition — Amount of Indebtedness in Dispute—Counter-claim the Subject of a Pending Action—Sale of Security Subjects by Creditor—Interdict of Sale—Circumstances where Interdict Refused.

The facts and circumstances of this case are sufficiently set forth in the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Salvesen.—In this case the complainer, who is the trustee on the insolvent estates of William Jamieson, junior, architect and surveyor in Lerwick, seeks interdict against the respondent selling a plot of ground on which the complainer's author has erected some unfinished villas. Interim interdict was granted on caution, but answers have now been lodged, and the respondent maintains that he is entitled to have the Note refused de plano.

The circumstances are these. The respondent is the ex facie absolute owner of the subjects in question. He admits, however, that they were disponed to him in security of repayment of all advances and other debts due by the said William Jamieson to him. The amount of indebtedness is in dispute; but there is no doubt that sums to the extent of over £800 were advanced by the respondent, and the main difference between the parties relates to a counter-claim which is now the subject of an action at the complainer's instance against the respondent. To the extent of £25 the respondent admits his indebtedness to the complainer. If the amount of the indebtedness could be agreed upon, the complainer would apparently be quite willing to pay the amount due, on the respondent conveying to him the security subjects. The parties have, however, failed to adjust the amount; and the two offers which the complainer makes in Stat. 8 have not been accepted. On the other hand, the respondent is perfectly willing to re-convey the subjects if the amount at which he states Jamieson's indebtedness to him is paid, leaving over for settlement in the pending litigation any counter-claims for which he may be liable.

The first plea in law for the complainer implies that the threatened sale is wrongous and unwarrantable, but I find no statement to support the plea, nor do I see anything to suggest that the complainer is exceeding his rights. The owner of property has the right to sell it when and to whom he pleases. If the respondent holds it only in security, he is of course liable to account for any surplus; and he must also see that the property is adequately advertised before a public sale takes place, so that it may not be sold below its value. It is not said, however, that the respondent is proceeding in any unwarrantable fashion; and although the complainer says that he apprehends loss if the property is sold by the respondent, he does not state how that loss apprehended will arise. The complainer's counsel maintained that the respondent had only right to sell the subjects for the sum that was actually due, and had no right of sale until that sum had been ascertained. Their argument is plainly fallacious. The respondent's right to sell is absolute, just as his right of property is ex facie absolute; and it appears to me absurd to say that a man cannot realise a security subject until he has agreed with the debtor as to the precise state of accounts between them.

The complainer further argued that, in respect of the offers which he had made, it was oppressive on the part of the respondent to persist in his intention to sell. I do not agree. The respondent is entitled to payment of his debt out of the proceeds of the property he holds, and is not bound to accept security, however good, that it will be paid. If the complainer wishes to stop the sale, all he has got to do is to pay the respondent the amount of his claim, under deduction of the admitted set-off. If this constitutes an overpayment, the respondent will of course have to refund the surplus when the complainer's claim is liquidated in the pending action.

I shall accordingly recal the interim interdict already granted, and refuse the Note, with expenses to the respondent.—11*th May* 1907.

I. DILIGENCE—ARRESTMENTS JURISDICTIONIS FUNDANDÆ CAUSA—ERROR IN DESIGNATION OF DEFENDERS IN WARRANT, EXECUTION AND SCHEDULE OF ARRESTMENT—CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH ARRESTMENT WAS HELD VALID.

II. DILIGENCE — ARRESTMENT JURISDICTIONIS FUNDANDÆ CAUSA—SUBJECT ARRESTED THE PROCEEDS OF A CHEQUE HANDED BY PURSUERS' AGENT TO DEFENDERS' AGENTS IN DISCHARGE OF CLAIMS UNDER FORMER ACTION BETWEEN THE PARTIES—ARRESTMENT USED IN HANDS OF DEFENDERS' AGENTS AFTER CHEQUE HAD BEEN HONOURED BY DRAWERS' BANK, BUT BEFORE INTIMATION OF ITS ACCEPTANCE HAD BEEN MADE TO PAYEES' BANK OR TO PAYEE—PERSONAL BAR TO PURSUERS FROM USING ARRESTMENTS — CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH ARRESTMENT WAS HELD VALID.

In this action the pursuers, engineers in Paisley, sued the Old Park Forge Ltd., registered under the Companies Acts and carrying on business in Sheffield, for the sum of £30, 12s. 6d. in name of damage alleged to have been suffered by the pursuers in consequence of the defenders' breach of contract. Arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa were used by the pursuers in the hands of Messrs T. & W. Walker & Laird, a firm of writers in Paisley, who were acting for the defenders in a litigation between the present parties in the Debts Recovery Court there, in which litigation the present pursuers had been unsuccessful. The warrant, execution and schedule of the said arrestment purported to arrest in the hands of the said firm the sum of £60, more or less, due and addebted by them to the "Old Park Forge Company Limited."

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Pollock, Whyte & Waddell v. The Old Park Forge Limited.

The defenders challenged the validity of these arrestments to found jurisdiction against them upon two grounds, and made averments to the effect that (1) the defenders' Company was designated in the schedule of arrestment as "The Old Park Forge Company Limited," whereas their proper designation was "The Old Park Forge Limited." (2) The only sums due to the defenders in the hands of the arrestees were the proceeds of a cheque for £43, 8s. 6d., which had been handed to the arrestees by the pursuers' agent in discharge of defenders' claims under the said debts recovery action; and the arrestments had been used by the pursuers' agent after the said cheque had been honoured by the drawers' bank but before intimation of its acceptance had been made either to the arrestees' bank, through which it had been passed, or to the arrestees. The details of this transaction are fully set forth in the Lord Ordinary's note infra.

The defenders pleaded:—

1. The defenders being domiciled in England, and the arrestments founded on by the pursuers being ineffectual to arrest funds belonging to the defenders in respect that they are not named in the warrant, execution or schedule thereof, the action should be dismissed.

2. The pursuers being personally barred from arresting the proceeds of their cheque for £43, 8s. 6d. for the purpose of founding jurisdiction against the defenders, and T. & W. Walker & Laird being otherwise unindebted to the defenders at the date when the arrestments were used, the action should be dismissed.

An argument upon these preliminary pleas was heard in the Procedure Roll on 21st January 1907, before the Lord Probationer (Guthrie), and on 22nd January the Lord Ordinary issued an interlocutor repelling the first plea in law for the defenders, and allowing the parties a proof of their averments as to the alleged arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

Lord Dundas.—The pursuers here maintain that the defenders, the Old Park Forge Ltd., carrying on business at Sheffield, have been duly subjected to the jurisdiction of this Court by an arrestment laid on by the pursuers, jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. The defenders state two pleas as against the validity of the arrestment. The first of these is based upon the fact that in the schedule of arrestment and execution thereof the defenders are designed as "The Old Park Forge Company Limited," their true designation being "The Old Park Forge Limited." My opinion, agreeing with that which was expressed by the Lord Probationer (Guthrie) yesterday, is that this plea is ill-founded, and must be repelled. It is a purely technical one. It is admitted that no Company exists bearing the designation of "The Old Park Forge Company Limited"; and indeed it would be scarcely possible that that should have been the case, looking to the provisions of sect. 20 of the Companies Act 1862. Nor is it suggested that there was any risk of misapprehension in the matter, or that any one was, or could have been, misled by the technical error in description. But Mr Cowan very properly made reference to authorities, of which the case of Henderson's Trs., 1831, 9 S. 618, was probably the most favourable to his contention. The blundered description there was "Sibbalds Brothers," which should have been "Sibbalds Brothers & Co." I do not, however, think that this case is an authority for Mr Cowan's contention. Henderson's case was commented on and distinguished by Lord Kincairney in a decision—Hannan, 1897—which is not contained in the reports, but is set forth in Mr Graham Stewart's work on the Law of Diligence at p. 849. I am content to adopt Lord Kincairney's reasoning in that case, and his distinction of Henderson, particularly upon the ground that the error there occurred in the description of the names of the arrestees. The second plea for the defenders cannot, as counsel were agreed in admitting, be safely disposed of without some enquiry into the facts, and I must therefore allow a proof as regards these. I was reluctant to run the risk of having hereafter to allow a second proof upon the merits of the case, looking to the small amount which is at stake in the action. But counsel for both parties declined to consent to an allowance of proof which should include the whole matters raised upon the Record; and I must follow the well-established rule that "it is only in very exceptional circumstances"—which I cannot say here exist—"that the proof on the question of jurisdiction should be reserved until the proof on the merits is taken" (Tancred, Arrol & Co., 1890, 17 R. 514).—22*nd January* 1907.

Proof was led on 15th March 1907.

A summary of the evidence and of the argument and authorities quoted for the defenders is given in the Lord Ordinary's Note infra.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the second plea in law for the defenders.

Lord Dundas.—The foundation of jurisdiction in these Courts against a foreigner by arrestments used for that purpose is a recognised part of our legal system. But the doctrine is not viewed with favour by the Court. In a recent case it was characterised by Lord-Justice Clerk (Moncreiff) as "a fiction which ought not to be stretched" (Baines v. Tait, 1879, 6 R. 846 at p. 850). I confess that it is with some reluctance that I find myself constrained to sustain the jurisdiction in this case.

The pursuers are a firm of engineers at Johnstone. The defenders are a limited company, carrying on business at Sheffield. It appears that on 24th October 1905 the pursuers ordered certain forgings from the defenders, the price of which became due on 10th December 1905. The pursuers did not then pay the price, and the defenders, on 8th May 1906, proceeded to sue them for it in the Debts Recovery Court at Paisley; and on 14th June 1906 obtained decree for the amount, £32, 9s. 4d., with £9, 1s. 10d. of expenses. The pursuers still failed to make payment, and the defenders gave them a charge on 4th July 1906, which was followed by an execution of poinding on 23rd July 1906 (No. 31 of process). The agents employed by the defenders in connection with these proceedings—and with these only—were Messrs T. & W. Walker & Laird, Writers, Paisley. On 25th July 1906, the pursuers' agent, Mr Cameron, called upon Mr Laird, adjusted with him the amount due,—viz. £43, 8s. 6d.,—and tendered in payment thereof a cheque drawn by the pursuers upon the Gallowgate branch in Glasgow of the Royal Bank of Scotland. Mr Laird declined to withdraw his diligence, or to give a receipt for the money, until the cheque should be duly honoured, and instructed that no entries in regard to it should be made in his firm's books. Subject to these safeguards, he sent the cheque next day through his bank—the National Bank at Paisley—for collection. The cheque was "specially presented" by the Head Office in Glasgow of the National Bank to the bank in Gallowgate between one and two o'clock on the 27th. The effect of this was, as is explained by Mr Waddell, the accountant of the latter bank, that "the National Bank would at once get credit for the amount." Mr Smith, the accountant in the Paisley branch of the National Bank, further explains that "directly the head office of our bank is apprised of the fact that a cheque has been met in Glasgow, our branch will be credited at the head office with the amount of the cheque, but we would not receive information till the following day. They would credit us in what we call our Sundries Account. That would be done directly the head office had been informed that the cheque had been met at the head office in Glasgow during business hours." In point of fact, neither the Paisley branch of the National Bank nor Messrs Walker & Laird knew the fate of the cheque until the 28th. But the pursuers' agent, Mr Cameron, acted with extraordinary vigilance and promptitude. He telephoned on 27th July to the Gallowgate branch bank; ascertained that the cheque had been honoured; and immediately sent a messenger-at-arms to Paisley, who arrested, in Walker & Laird's hands, "the sum of £60, more or less, due and addebted by them to the 'Old Park Forge Co. Ltd.'" It was argued for the defenders that this arrestment truly attached nothing; because on the afternoon of July 27th, neither the Paisley bank nor Walker & Laird knew the fate of the cheque; and if the said bank had, on that day, given cash to Walker & Laird, they would have done so, not as against the cheque, but upon the faith of their customers' credit; and it was further maintained that the defenders could not have insisted upon payment from Walker & Laird until the money had been actually received by the latter, or by their bank —i.e. the 28th. I am afraid that one must go rather by the facts of the case than by the parties' knowledge of these at the time. Now, when the arrestment was used, it appears that the Paisley branch was already duly credited in the Sundries Account at head office in Glasgow with the cheque for Walker & Laird, and that the latter had a fund of credit for behoof of the defenders. Mr Smith says: "Supposing we had been informed by wire or telephone that the cheque had been met, we would at once on demand have paid Walker & Laird the amount of the cheque or credited them with the amount, and that quite apart from their being in good credit with us as customers." Now, before four o'clock on the afternoon of the 27th—when the arrestment was used—the National Bank, who had been charged by Messrs Walker & Laird with the duty of collecting this cheque for them, had in fact collected it, and did, as I think, hold the money for Messrs Walker & Laird. In these circumstances, though the case is a narrow one, I consider that the arrestment was—(apart from any question of personal bar)—validly laid on. But Mr Cowan for the defenders pressed upon me, with ability and force, a further argument to the effect that assuming that any other creditor of the defenders could validly have used arrestment as was here done, the pursuers were personally barred from doing so. There is, I take it, no doubt that a particular creditor may —in special circumstances, or by his own actings —be so barred (see, e.g., Campbell, 1858, 21 D. 63—Lord Wood's opinion).

Thus, where an arrestment was used in mala fide, and so as to be of the nature of a "trick," the Court refused to allow the arrester to take benefit from it (Rintoul, 1862, 1 Macp. 137). Similarly, when a vessel had been illegally and forcibly brought into Greenock Harbour, and arrestments were then used by the persons who had so brought her, it was held that the latter could not be permitted to derive advantage from their own illegal actings (Carlberg, 1877, 5 R. 390, affd. 1878, ib. [H.L.] 217, and 3 App. Cas. 1322). Again, in the case of Graeme's Trs., 1888, 15 R. 691, the antenuptial marriage contract of a Scots lady who married a German conveyed all her estate, including acquirenda, to trustees of whom her brother was one. In 1886 a testatrix died, leaving a legacy to the lady. The trustees, including the brother, failed to intimate the marriage contract to the testamentary trustee of the testatrix. In 1887 the brother was sequestrated, and his trustee arrested the legacy in the hands of the said testamentary trustee in respect of a debt alleged to be due by the brother to his sister. The arrestment was held to be invalid, because the brother would not have been entitled to take advantage of his own negligence in failing to intimate the marriage contract; and his trustee had no higher right in the matter than the bankrupt. The defenders' counsel also founded upon Trowsdale's Tr., 1870, 9 Macp. 88, where an unsuccessful attempt was made to arrest documents belonging to the foreign defenders, which had been brought to Scotland for the special purpose of being examined by the arrester; who, after having been ordered by the Sheriff to return them to the defenders in England, placed them in the hands of the defenders' Scots agents, and arrested them in their hands, jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. Mr Cowan strove hard to bring the present case within the doctrine of which the decisions to which I have referred are well-known illustrations. He urged that the situation was one of the pursuers' own making; that the pursuers having refused payment of a debt justly due by them to the defenders, the latter were obliged to resort to the Scots Court at Paisley, and to employ Scots agents to conduct their action; and that the pursuers, having, even after decree and diligence, failed to pay their debt, tendered a cheque at the last hour, with the intention of arresting its proceeds immediately afterwards, so as to found jurisdiction against the defender. This course of conduct was, Mr Cowan maintained, whether illegal or not, of a tricky and vexatious character, and such as the Court would not permit the pursuers to take benefit by. He pointed in this connection to the pursuers' Answer 2 to the defenders' Statement of Facts, where it is "admitted that the pursuers did not pay, as they intended to raise the present action." The pursuers' counsel, however, say that the answer quoted, when fairly read in connection with the answer to the immediately preceding article, is deprived of any sinister suggestion. However this may be, I do not see my way to holding that the arrestment in question was illegally used, or that the pursuers are barred by their actings from maintaining its validity. I cannot avoid the impression that Mr Cameron, when he tendered the cheque on July 25th, had it in view to arrest the money, if he could do so, in Walker & Laird's hands, as he succeeded in doing. But though the point is not without difficulty, and though such action savours, to my mind, of sharpness, I can hardly say that it amounts to such mala fides or "trickery" as to operate as a bar. I must therefore repel the second plea in law for the defenders, and allow the parties a proof before answer upon the merits of this unfortunate dispute. The defenders' first plea was repelled on 23rd January 1907, for the reasons explained in my opinion relative to the interlocutor of that date. As the present interlocutor is pronounced in vacation, I shall reserve all questions of expenses.—21*st March* 1907.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Pollock, Whyte & Waddell v. The Old Park Forge Limited.

5. The Lord Advocate v. Balfour.

Crown—Salmon Fishing—Salmon and Sea Trout Fishing in Orkney — Udal Law—Salmon Fishing not a Separate Tenement in Orkney, and Held not to be Inter Regalia.

This was an action at the instance of the Lord Advocate on behalf of the Crown and the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, against Colonel James William Balfour of Balfour and Trenabie in the county of Orkney, to have it declared "that the whole salmon trout fishings, sea trout fishings, and the fishings for all other migratory salmonidæ in the loch and burn of Kirbister, in the parish of Orphir," Orkney, belonged to the Crown "jure coronæ, and form part of the hereditary revenues of the Crown in Scotland," and that the defender had no right to take the same, and should be interdicted from so doing.

After a statement of the law under which the defender and his authors had acquired and held their land, viz., the udal law applicable to the Orkney islands, the defender pleaded: (1) All parties not called; (2) No title to sue; (3) Pursuer's averments irrelevant; (4) The right of fishing for sea trout not being inter regalia, the defender should be assoilzied from the conclusion of the Summons relating to sea trout . . . .; (6) Separatim, in any event the defender is entitled to absolvitor in respect that his lands are expressly declared in the infeftments thereof to be udal lands.

After the case was first argued the Lord Ordinary appointed the case to be further heard on the question whether salmon fishings in Orkney are inter regalia, and ordained the defender to lodge in process his titles to the land abutting on the Kirbister Burn.

Lord Johnston.—This action has been avowedly raised to test the question of the Crown's general right to the sea trout fishings of Orkney as inter regalia.

It is brought against Colonel Balfour of Balfour and Trenabie, and the particular fishings attacked are those of the loch and burn of Kirbister. The plea was taken that as there were other proprietors interested in the lands ex adverso of the loch of Kirbister, all parties were not called. I understand that it was admitted that this was the case, and as the Crown did not think it necessary for the trial of the question at issue to call the other proprietors, the Summons has been dismissed so far as regards the loch, so as to confine it to the burn fishings.

Now in order that the Crown should succeed, these three questions must be answered, the first two in the affirmative and the third in the negative.

First. Are the salmon fishings in Orkney inter regalia as they are on the mainland of Scotland?

Second. Are salmon trout, sea trout, and the other smaller migratory salmonidæ, salmon in the eye of the common law of Scotland to the effect that they, as salmon, are inter regalia?

Third. Has Colonel Balfour an express title to salmon fishings or a title on which to prescribe clothed with possession, which would defeat the Crown's claim, assuming it otherwise good?

The first two of these questions really arise on the defender's plea of no title to sue. That plea the defender is entitled to have disposed of before going into the question of his own right, whether express or by prescription.

The question is a perfectly legitimate one for the Crown to raise, and I have no concern with the particular value of the individual fishings. But as it is a test question, and Colonel Balfour has been selected as the champion of Orcadian fishing rights, I am bound, in fairness to him, to consider the matter of expense and of convenience in the conduct of the case.

Having directed my attention to these matters, I have come to the conclusion that the question whether "sea trout" are "salmon" in the eye of the common law is not one which could be satisfactorily determined without proof. Admittedly the question is novel. As a matter of impression I am inclined to think that "sea trout" are "salmon" in the eye of the common law. But before I could judicially so determine, I must have a judicial knowledge of points of natural history, and of custom, which I could only obtain by proof. That the whole migratory salmonidæ are protected by statute (if, as I think, this is the case) is not conclusive, but would be only an element in the proof. I have a strong impression that the general practice has been, both by inclusive and exclusive possession, to interpret the Crown's direct and the subject's derivative right of salmon fishing as a right also of sea trout fishing. But I may be wrong. And anyway I could not reach this result judicially except on proof. This proof would be a difficult and expensive one, and I would not feel justified in saddling Colonel Balfour with the trouble and expense, and neither would the Crown wish to do so, unless I thought the proof essential to the determination of the question at issue—which, so far as we are presently concerned, is limited to the title to sue. Now, while I am aware that there is a generally well founded objection to taking up questions piecemeal, I think that the circumstances here override that objection. If the commom law of Scotland in the matter of salmon fishings does not apply to Orkney, it is evidently immaterial to Colonel Balfour whether in the eye of the common law of Scotland salmon is equivalent to salmonidæ or not. Accordingly I think I am justified in dividing the case in the matter of the title to sue into two, and requiring the Crown to show, first, that salmon fishings in Orkney are inter regalia, as they are in the mainland of Scotland, leaving out the question whether the term salmon in the common law of Scotland is restrictive or general and equivalent to salmonidæ.

Outer House.

Lord Johnston.

Lord Advocate v. Balfour.

On the former of these questions I have had substantially no argument. In the debate before me, attention was directed entirely, or almost entirely, to the second question whether "salmon" included "salmonidæ," which it was maintained (contrary to my opinion) that I could determine on authority without proof. I propose, therefore, to direct the case to be put out for further argument on the question which I have indicated.

But the Crown concluded by a demand that Colonel Balfour should produce his titles. In Answer 2 he makes such reference to them that I should have expected them to be produced. Apparently that has not been so. Now until the pursuer has established his title to sue, the defender cannot, as a rule, be called on to produce his titles. Were the object of the call to ascertain what his right by title to fishings or to prescribe fishings was, I would sustain this position on the part of Colonel Balfour. But in the special circumstances of the case I do not think that the question on which I desiderate argument could be satisfactorily or exhaustively dealt with without an examination of Colonel Balfour's titles as evidencing, in his particular case, as an instance, the nature of the original title, and the history of its progress, whether as udal or feudal.

Modern lawyers are not familiar with Orkney titles, and I feel that it would probably aid me to appreciate the general argument on the salmon fishing rights of Orkney if I saw the form in which Colonel Balfour's title stood and could trace its passage from udal to feudal so far as it has undergone that change. It is quite possible that something may turn upon the terms of the feudalisation. And it must be remembered that so far as feudalised the Crown is the superior, and that it is therefore the superior who is calling for the titles.—17*th October* 1905.

A further hearing and argument having taken place, the Lord Ordinary sustained the defender's second and fourth pleas, and assoilzied him from the conclusions of the Summons.

Lord Johnston.—Referring to my judgment of 17th October 1905, I have had a further and learned and interesting argument on the question whether salmon fishings in Orkney are inter regalia. If they are not, then a fortiori sea trout fishing is not inter regalia, and the defender's second and fourth pleas fall to be sustained.

In the present aspect of it the case is practically a supplement to Commissioners of Woods and Forests v. Gammell, 1851, 13 D. 854 and 1859, 3 Macq. App. 419. Prior to Gammell's case it was settled law that the right of salmon fishing in the rivers of Scotland was a separate heritable tenement, which was vested in the Crown as a patrimonial and beneficial right, and remained with the Crown unless expressly or constructively granted out to the subject. The Court in Gammell's case, accepting this as the law applicable to the rivers of Scotland, found that it extended also to the shores of the open sea round the coasts of Scotland. In the present case the Crown seeks to extend the doctrine merely to the rivers of Orkney, for though a particular river is selected, the case is admittedly a test case. But I think that I am justified in saying that the case is practically a supplement of Gammell's, because there it was demonstrated that there can be no distinction maintained in principle between the rivers and sea shores of Scotland in the matter of salmon fishings. If, therefore, the Crown can extend the doctrine to the rivers of Orkney, it must, pari ratione, extend to the seashore also.

It aids, I think, in forming a judgment in this case to consider the reasoning, historical and otherwise, on which the judgment in Gammell's case proceeds.

The established doctrine as to the Crown's rights in salmon fishings is part of the feudal law of Scotland. Neither the feudal law in general nor the law of salmon fishings in particular came to us as a systematic code. The Court in Gammell's case, 13 D. at page 863, refer to a date "when the law was more completely matured," which necessarily implies that the law had been developed or matured gradually. And the difficulty of tracing the steps and dates of this development or maturing, forms one of the difficulties of applying the common law of Scotland to Orkney. One thing is certain, that the general feudal system and law were applied to Scotland before the special and incidental branch of it which dealt with salmon fishings was developed. It is also certain that the application of the feudal law, even to Scotland, was a gradual process—that it held sway in the Lowlands long before it was fully recognised in the Highlands—that the exchange of the broadsword for the sheepskin as the title to land was not completely effected even on the mainland of Scotland, except by a gradual process, and within historic, and, personally I believe, within comparatively recent times. And if the development and application of the Scottish feudal system was gradual, the "maturing" of the law of salmon fishings was so also.

Further, while the feudal system was introduced into most European countries about the same time as into Scotland, nowhere except in Scotland has there been this peculiar incident of rights in salmon fishings engrafted on it. It is not essential to the feudal law, but a peculiarity of the Scottish feudal law.

The steps in the development of the law seem to have been these. Traces of the introduction of the feudal system are to be found apparently before the Norman conquest of England. At any rate by the time of Bruce and the English Wars, or the end of the thirteenth century, it was the law of that part of Scotland which had come under the domain of anything like systematic law; and the great feature of the system, "that it invested the sovereign with the character of original and supreme proprietor of all land subject to his dominion" (Menzies, 1st edition, p. 490), was necessarily adopted with it. On that fiction the whole feudal land law of Scotland rests, and has been developed, even to the days of modern statutory conveyancing.

Next in course of development of the feudal land law came the principle that "no right in lands which is by our feudal customs appropriated to the sovereign, and therefore goes by the name of regale, is presumed to be conveyed by the charter unless it is expressed" (Erskine, II. 6, 13). These "are truly parts and pertinents of lands, and as such would naturally go to the vassal by his charter, if they had not been by our feudal customs appropriated to the sovereign, and so understood to be excepted from the grant" (Erskine, II. 6, 13).

And, lastly, the right of salmon fishing is one of those heritable rights which, though naturally a pertinent, our feudal customs have recognised as appropriated to the Crown, and not to pass by Crown grant unless contained therein expressly or constructively—in other words, it is a separatum tenementum.

The first of these steps is a fictio juris; the second and third are customary developments in the course of the maturing of the law. When they were fully accepted I cannot say. And why the last of them was accepted, authorities differ. But from the series of statutes of the Scots Parliament, referred to, e.g., in Earl of Kintore v. Forbes, 1826, 4 S. 641, it is clear that salmon fishing was at a very early date, even so early as William the Lion, regarded in Scotland as of exceptional value; and though these statutes are concerned with the regulation and protection of, and not the property in, salmon fishings, I think that it must be accepted that the law as affecting the property in salmon fishings was during the same period maturing. When the right of salmon fishing definitely received the attribute of a separate tenement I cannot tell. I can only say that by 1606 the law had so completely matured that Craig, who published his "Jus Feudale" in that year, wrote (I. 16, 24): "Salmonum piscatio apud nos inter regalia numeratur, neque cuiquam hodie concessa videtur, nisi specialis ejus in concessione mentio fiat." The use of the word "hodie" is noticeable. But from titles which have come under my notice, I cannot but think that the law had reached that point a considerable time before Craig wrote.

Now in Orkney we have the same thing in miniature, with this difference, that we know that Orkney had a system of law which preceded the advent of the feudal system, and know what that system of law was, which is more than can be said of Scotland. In Orkney we have every stage of the growth of the law, but more recent in date, and even so not yet complete and matured. We have the Orcadian land law, which preceded the feudal, not indeed in viridi observantia, but still maintaining itself against the encroachment of the feudal. We have, in fact, the history of Scotland repeated, but not completed. The feudal system in matter of title is only in course of supplanting the Orcadian land law. It applies to many estates and parts of estates, but it does not apply universally over the islands.

Accordingly, the questions which I have to solve are these:

What is the law of Orkney in the matter of salmon fishing, irrespective of feudal considerations?

How has that law been affected by the connection of the islands with Scotland?

Has the gradual feudalisation of titles drawn with it as an incident the Scots law of salmon fishing?

It is, however, I think, necessary, before attempting to dispose of these particular questions, to consider first the history of Orkney as it bears upon them.

The history of Orkney, as it affects the relation of the Crown to the islands of Orkney, and the position of the Crown as the fountain of feudal right, is rendered obscure by the many changes and transactions which have taken place between 1468 and the present day. Orkney was, prior to 1468, part of the kingdom of Norway. But the law of Norway was not feudal. The lands of the islands were not held on feudal, but on udal tenure. Title did not emanate from the Crown, and there was no room for the fiction that the Crown was the original proprietor of all land subject to its dominion. The scat was of the nature of a land tax, and not of a reddendo. Besides the Crown, which possibly had some lands in property, as well as rights to scat and other dues, there were three sets of proprietors, the earl, the bishop, and the udallers. Both earl and bishop had lands as well as rights to dues out of lands. But neither the Crown, nor the earl, nor the bishop had any rights as feudal superior, except, it may be, by convention, for it is not certain that the earls, latterly of Norman stock, may not have, even before 1468, commenced the introduction of the feudal system of title by inducing udallers, for security and protection's sake, to take quasi feudal titles from them in some cases. In 1468 King James III. of Scotland married Margaret, daughter of King Christian I. of Norway, and received with her a dowry of 60,000 florins, and in security of 50,000 thereof not paid down, received in pledge "omnes et singulas, terras nostras insularum Orcadensium cum omnibus et singulis juribus, servicis, et justis suis pertinentiis" (Peterkin's Rentals, App. p. 11 foot, and Scots Acts, 1471, c. 4, Th. II. 187). This hypothecation, never redeemed, is the source of the Crown rights in Orkney. Its nature and circumstances preclude recourse to the feudal fiction. Shortly after the impignoration the Crown acquired the earldom and all that went with it from William Sinclair, the last Norwegian earl, by the Contract of Excambion of 1471, giving therefor lands on the mainland of Scotland; and on 20th February 1471 the Earldom of Orkney and Lordship of Shetland was united to the Crown with parliamentary sanction (Th. II. 102). But this only placed the Crown in the shoes of the earl, as it was already, so long as the hypothecation continued, in those of the King of Norway. Yet so early as 1490 the Crown is found granting a charter in feudal form with a tenendas, and with a reddendo in masses, etc., erecting the bishopric into a free regality (Peterkin, App. p. 14). Among the pertinents are included piscationibus.

Outer House. Lord Johnston.

What happened between 1471 and 1540 I do not know, but in the latter year, 1540, cap. 19, Th. II. 360, "the lands and lordship of Orkney and Shetland and the isles pertaining thereto and their pertinents" are contained in a general Act of Annexation to the Crown. But from 1562 to the beginning of the seventeenth century the earldom was held by Earls Robert and Patrick Stewart, an illegitimate branch of the Stewart family, and if they did not also hold the bishopric, they held some rights relating to it.

Between 1612 and 1615 a series of transactions took place which bring things nearer to modern times. The family of Arnot of Berswick appear to have acquired the right of Earl Patrick, probably by wadset, and, in September 1612, King James VI. acquired from Sir John Arnot and his sons for 300,000 pounds Scots "Sundry lands, isles, and others specified in the same contract, lying within the bounds of Orkney and Zetland." See the ratification of this contract, 1612, cap. 14, Th. IV. 480. Following on this was the annexation of the same year, found in 1612, cap. 15, Th. IV. 481. The subjects annexed were "the lands, isles, skerries, holms, mylns, multures, fishings, annual rents, and others whatsomever as well specified as generally after mentioned," and then followed an enumeration of lands and isles within the Sheriffdom of Orkney said to be held by Sir John Arnot of the Crown, and to have been resigned in the hands of the Crown ad perpetuam remanentium. But there followed a general clause, "together with all and whatsomever other lands, &c. . . . fishings as well in fresh as salt water and other rights and duties whatsomever pertaining to the said earldom of Orkney and lordship of Zetland," with pertinents and heritable jurisdictions, "together also with all and sundry other privileges, immunities and liberties whatsomever contained and expressed in the infeftment made and given to Patrick, Earl of Orkney, of the said Earldom and lordship." The Act further provided for the annexation in advance of similar lands and rights, should the King acquire them, from James, Bishop of Orkney. This Act was followed by 1612, cap. 16, Th. IV. 482, which appointed a commission to transact with the bishop. This appointment apparently resulted in a disentanglement, by way of excambion or otherwise, of the earldom and the bishopric. For in Peterkin's Rentals, App. p. 31, there is found a charter of mortification, of date October 4th, 1614, giving, mortifying, and confirming to the bishop certain definite property. I believe that if the defender's titles require to be examined, the definitions in this writ are of importance; but at present it is only necessary to note that one set of lands, in the parishes of Holme, Orphir, Stromness, South Sandwrek, North Sandwrek, Schapinsay, Walls and Hoy, are conveyed without reference to fishings, while another set of lands, in the parish of St Olav, are conveyed cum piscariis salmonum aliorumque piscium. Then follows a tenendas and a blench reddendo.

Now this transaction does not appear to me to indicate a vesting in the Crown of the whole lands of Orkney, even nomine superioritatis, but only what was formerly in Earl William Sinclair, afterwards in the Crown, afterwards in Earls Robert and Patrick Stewart, and finally in the Arnots, with what change in detail may have been made by arrangement with the bishop. But it does indicate that the Crown assumed to deal feudally, not only with what came into its hands patrimonially, but in such a transaction as that with the bishop, and in doing so applied the feudal conveyancing of Scotland to Orkney estates, and even dealt with salmon fishings as they would have been dealt with in Scotland.

There are only three other episodes which need be mentioned.

First, the wadset of the earldom and all that it carried to the Earl of Morton in 1643, confirmed 1644, cap. 246, Th. VI., Part I. 228, and renewed to Viscount Grandison, a trustee for the Morton family, by 1662, cap. 46, Th. VII. 398, by both of which Acts, the one during the Commonwealth, the other after the Restoration, the earldom was dissolved from the Crown.

Second, the reduction of the Grandison-Morton title, at the instance of the King's Advocate, in 1669, M. 7857, and the confirmation by Parliament of the reduction, 1669, cap. 19, Th. VII. 566.

Third, the rehabilitation of the Morton Grant by charter of 12th February 1707, accompanied by the Acts 1707, cap. 9 and 46, Th. XI. 429 and 471, dissolving the earldom from the Crown, and ratifying the charter. The Morton rights passed to the Zetland family in 1766, with whom they remain.

I believe that I should add that at the abolition of Episcopacy, anything that remained of the bishopric and its lands devolved on the Crown, and that certain of these lands have since been given out to be held in feu of the Crown, but I cannot lay my hands on authority for this statement.

Returning now to the three questions which I think require to be considered.

In the first place, by the udal law, or law of Orkney, as it stood in 1468, and as it stands now, except so far as innovated upon, the Crown was not presumed by any fictio juris to have been the original proprietor of the whole territory of the islands. Therefore, even if salmon fishing is to be regarded as a separate tenement by udal law, of which there is not the slightest suggestion, there is no room for the presumption that the property in salmon fishings belongs to the Crown unless specially or constructively granted out. The reasoning regarding foreshores on which the judgment of the Court rests in Smith v. Lerwick Harbour Trs., 1903, 5 F. 680, applies with equal force to the present question. Hence if this Summons had commenced with a general declarator, as did Gammell's, that all the salmon fishings in the rivers and round the coasts of Orkney, so far as not granted out, belong to the Crown jure coronæ, and form part of its hereditary revenues, it must have failed.

But the present action is limited to the fishings in the Kirbister burn in the parish of Orphir, and these particular fishings are said to belong to the Crown jure coronæ, and to be part of its hereditary revenues. The conception of jus coronæ involves, I think, general and not special considerations, and when the general proposition cannot be maintained, it is difficult at first sight to conceive of any good ground for the particular. But the position is not, I imagine, so simple as it looks.

In the second place, how has the Orcadian law in the matter of salmon fishings been affected by the connection of the islands with Scotland? I have examined the history of that connection with perhaps too great minuteness, and I think that the examination shows that the Crown derived its rights in Orkney in a definite and historic manner, which precludes the idea or fiction that the Crown is the fountain of all land rights and the paramount superior, that it has dealt with the earldom and the bishopric in feudal form, and that, as the earldom and the bishopric comprised not merely customary duties from lands, but the property of certain lands, these have been held for a very long period on feudal tenure, and under titles which sometimes make mention of fishings.

It may be added that for the convenience of transmission, and probably at first with a view to greater security of title, certain lands and estates in Orkney, which pertained neither to earldom nor to bishopric, have been feudalised in matter of title by their udal owners. Although it is necessary carefully to distinguish between proper feudalisation by acceptance of a Crown grant, which involves at least the fiction of a prior vesting in the Crown to admit of the re-grant, and the mere use of feudal forms when there has been no real interposition of the Crown (Beatton v. Gaudie, 1832, 10 S. 286; Rendall v. Robertson, 1836, 15 S. 265).

The results of the enquiry sufficiently demonstrate that nothing has occurred since 1468 which amounts to a general acceptance in Orkney of the Scots feudal system, and still less of its customary incidents.

But, in the third place, has the gradual feudalisation of estates in the matter of title, whether this has occurred through the medium of earldom or bishopric, or in particular instances of private udal properties, drawn with it as an incident the Scots law of salmon fishing? It certainly cannot be maintained that the partial adoption of the feudal system in matter of tenure has so affected the whole of the Orkneys as to bring those parts which have not yet been feudalised under the Scots law of salmon fishing rights. Can it, then, apply to all estates now held on feudal tenure, while it does not apply to those still held as udal? Looking to the origin of the Scots law of salmon fishing, there is something anomalous in the idea that it could apply runrig over the islands, according as the title to lands has or has not been feudalised. And I do not think that this is a necessary consequence of such feudalisation as has taken place in Orkney. I think that the tenure may be adopted without the adoption of an incident of Scots feudal law, not essential to the tenure and peculiar to the particular feudal system of Scotland. It must, I think, be admitted that the feudal system was first adopted in Scotland, and that the particular law of salmon fishings was afterwards engrafted on it, and necessarily so, for it is peculiar to Scotland. I do not find it difficult in the circumstances to reach the conclusion that the Scots feudal system has been adopted sparsim in Orkney, in matter of tenure, or as a means of conveyancing, but that the peculiar Scots law of salmon fishings has not been thereby made applicable to those parts of Orkney only which have been feudalised.

If in Scotland it required feudal custom to render that regale, and to appropriate it to the sovereign, which is naturally a part and pertinent of land, and as such would naturally go to the vassal by his charter (Erskine, II. 6, 13 and 15), where there is no such feudal custom such natural part and pertinent must, I think, remain a part and pertinent, as apparently it does in other countries than Scotland.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Lord Advocate v. Balfour.

I do not ignore the fact that in some grants the Crown has expressly included fishings. But I cannot in this, which was doubtless the act of the Scottish conveyancer, find proof that the feudal customs of Orkney had raised these fishings into a separate tenement and jus regale, or that had these words not occurred in the charters the Crown could have prevented, by process of law, its vassals taking salmon, within the bounds of their lands.

It is, I think, sufficient proof that no such custom has arisen, even in those parts of Orkney where title has been feudalised, that no instance has been given by the Crown, where during the four centuries and a half that Orkney has been under its sway the Crown has vindicated its alleged right. The Crown does not allege that it has fished or let fishings, or has interfered to prevent those not deriving right from it from fishing. It is in vain, therefore, I think, to contend that the feudal custom of Scotland has become that of Orkney.

In fact one, and probably the most potent, reason for the growth of the custom in Scotland, viz., the value of the fishings, has not existed in Orkney. The fishings have been of little or no value hitherto, and the present is the first known assertion of the alleged right on the part of the Crown.

I have abstained from referring to the defender's titles, though they illustrate the situation, as to do so is unnecessary for my judgment.

I shall sustain the second and fourth pleas for the defender and assoilzie him from the conclusions of the Summons, with expenses.—8th April 1907.

6. Love v. Love.

JURISDICTION—QUESTION RELATING TO HERITABLE ESTATE IN SCOTLAND—HUSBAND'S RIGHT OF ADMINISTRATION—CLAIM BY WIFE THAT HERITABLE SECURITIES BELONG TO HER EXCLUSIVE OF HUSBAND'S RIGHT OF ADMINISTRATION—SCOTS COURTS HAVE JURISDICTION IN RESPECT QUESTION RELATES TO SCOTS HERITAGE.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

This action was brought by Mrs Margaret Marshall or Love against Andrew Love, her husband, for declarator that the sums of money contained in three bonds and dispositions in security over Scots heritage belonged, to the extent of one-half, to the pursuer, exclusive of the defender's jus mariti and right of administration.

The bonds in question were dated 9th July 1883, 4th March 1889, and 14th May 1902, and stood in the names of the pursuer and her sister jointly. The pursuer had succeeded under her father's trust disposition and settlement to a legacy of £1000 from which her husband's jus mariti and right of administration were expressly excluded. It was admitted that the two earlier of the three bonds in question were to the extent of one-half investments of the pursuer's legacy. The pursuer averred that the third bond to the extent of one-half was an investment of part of her legacy; the defender averred that this half of the sum in the bond represented money which he had remitted to his wife for investment on his own behalf.

The defender averred that he was resident in India. He pleaded, inter alia: "(1) No jurisdiction."

The arguments and the authorities referred to sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

On 2nd March 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor whereby he, inter alia, repelled the plea of "No jurisdiction."

Lord Dundas.—The pursuer, a married woman, seeks declarator that certain bonds and dispositions in security, described in the Summons, so far as she has right thereto, belong to her, exclusive of the right of administration of her husband, who is the compearing defender; and that she is entitled, without his consent, "to discharge or assign and to grant all necessary deeds in connection with the said bonds and dispositions in security, sums of money therein contained, and lands therein described." The compearing defender maintains the negative of these propositions. But he states a preliminary defence which requires consideration. It appears from the pursuer's pleadings that the parties were married on 6th August 1902; that on 17th October 1902 the defender "returned to India, to a situation which he had held previous to the marriage"; and that, "with the exception of the two months after the marriage, and the six months in 1906 when he was home on leave of absence, the pursuer's husband had been continuously resident in India since the date of the marriage." The defender is described in the Summons as "chief engineer, s.s. Hassara, B.I.E. Club, 4A Ravelin Street, Bombay, India." He explains (Ans. 1) that he is "resident in India. He is a marine engineer, sailing from and to various ports in India, and has his headquarters at Bombay." The defender pleads—"1. No jurisdiction." His counsel argued that, in this state of the pleadings, I ought to sustain this plea de plano, and dismiss the action. The plea, as stated—though it has passed muster in various reported cases—is not, I think, in point of form a plea in law at all, because it does not amount to a proposition in law. But the defender's counsel contended that his client, being resident in India, was eo ipso outwith the jurisdiction of this Court. He referred to the dicta of Lord Kyllachy in Buchan, 1905, 7 F. 917, at p. 922—that "apart from the ownership of heritage in Scotland, or arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, residence, and not domicile, is what in ordinary actions determines the jurisdiction"; and in Tasker, 1905, 8 F. 45, at p. 51—that "the only domicile to be regarded in ordinary civil actions is the ordinary forensic domicile—the domicile held to be constituted by forty days' residence,—and so held, as Erskine explains, 'by custom, and in order to prevent disputes.'" I do not think that the wide general question which was the subject of Lord Kyllachy's observations in these cases is here raised for consideration or decision. In the first place, the defender's averments are not, in my judgment, sufficiently specific to raise it, even if the pursuer's somewhat gratuitous contributions on the subject are prayed in aid. The defender's Record contains no substantive averment that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court; nor any definite statement as to the character or quality of his residence in India, or other facts from which an inference might be drawn that the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts is ousted. I would have given the defender's counsel an opportunity of amending his Record, if I had not formed an opinion adverse to his plea upon grounds other than want of specification in his averments upon this matter. It appears to me that the questions in dispute in this case relate essentially to Scots heritage. The bonds and dispositions in security are heritable; and there is a dispute as to the title necessary for their discharge, or for the transfer of the lands contained in them. The pursuer claims that she is entitled to deal with these heritable subjects apart from her husband's curatorial right of administration. The defender, on the other hand, maintains that he is entitled to exercise this right. The question so raised is admittedly one of Scots law; and it can, in my opinion, be determined only by the Court in Scotland. I am not aware of any decision expressly determining the point under consideration. The case of Ashburton, 1892, 20 R. 187, is instructive but not conclusive. It was there decided that the defender, a foreigner, being infeft in Scotland, Scots land under a bond and disposition in security, was subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Court in all actions relating to the lands contained in the security; and also that, being a trustee in a Scots trust including Scots heritage, he was subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts in all actions relating to the trust and the trust estate, and therefore in an action in which this Court had to determine whether the trust still subsisted or had been brought to an end. In the present case, the defender is not infeft in Scots heritage. But that fact is not, in my judgment, material. The dispute is none the less one as to the right of administration and transference of Scots heritage, and must therefore, as I think, be determined by the Scots Courts, and by them only. If these views are correct, they afford sufficient ground for repelling the defender's plea of "no jurisdiction." The pursuer's counsel referred to the correspondence, which is produced, as providing a further basis for this decision. It appears from the letters—see especially that of the defender's law agent dated 31st July 1906 — that the defender, when he was in Scotland in that year, took up the firm position of declining "to sign any documents until fully advised as to the reasons for changes in said investments," and of withholding his consent "to the money being invested in such a way that it will be placed beyond his right of administration." At the same time, the defender's agent stated, with reference to Mrs Love's intention of raising an action in this Court to have it found that her husband's consent to such deeds was unnecessary, that "my client instructs me to accept service on his behalf of any such action, and to defend it. He is about to leave this country for India, but has left his address with me, where I can communicate with him." It is not necessary for me to pronounce a decided opinion as to the effect of the letters. It is sufficient to say that the actings of the defender and his authorised law agent seem to me to come very near, if they do not amount, to a prorogation of the jurisdiction of this Court. No separate argument was submitted in support of the defender's second plea in law, and I shall therefore repel it.

Love v. Love.

When one comes to the merits of the case, the course is plain enough. The pursuer avers that her father, Mr Marshall, who died in 1890, by his trust settlement left a legacy to her of £1000, payable on her attaining the age of twenty-five, which should be expressly exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband she might marry; that, at the date of his death, her father held the bonds (first) and (second) respectively described in the Summons; and that his trustees did not realise these bonds, but by arrangement with the pursuer, who was then unmarried, made up title to them, and assigned them to her, in pro tanto satisfaction of her legacy. In regard to these bonds, the defender's counsel frankly, and I think properly, admitted that upon the merits of the case he could state no defence to the pursuer's demand; and I shall therefore grant decree of declarator as concluded for, so far as they are concerned. The pursuer further avers that, when the balance of her legacy was paid over to her by her father's trustees, she invested it in a share, viz. £200, of the bond (third) described in the Summons. This statement is denied by the defender; and he goes on to aver that the £200 so invested by the pursuer was money which he had remitted to her before the marriage to be invested by her on his behalf. Counsel for the parties were agreed that there must be a proof upon this part of the case, and I shall allow one accordingly.

The defender reclaimed.

The Court, without calling on counsel for the respondent, adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord M'Laren said that the possession of heritable estate in Scotland was a good ground for subjecting a party to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts even in cases where the question did not relate to the heritage. Here the question related to Scots heritage—the right to the proceeds of a heritable bond. Such bonds were still heritable except quoad succession. The Courts of Scotland therefore had jurisdiction because they alone could effectually determine the question raised.

Lord Kinnear and Lord Pearson concurred.—19*th March* 1907.

Ness (1903, 6 F. 168) Followed.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 808.)

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The Respondent (Alexander Fisher) reclaimed, and argued: Under the registered agreement the respondent was entitled to receive compensation at the agreed on rate, (13s. 3d. per week) until the weekly payment was reviewed by the Sheriff (Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Sched. 1 (12), and 2 (14); Steel, 1902, 5 F. 244; Pumpherston Oil Co., 1903, 5 F. 963). He was accordingly entitled to payment at this rate up till 18th October 1906, which was the amount charged for. The judgment of the Sheriff, which took effect from 18th October 1906, made the question of the amount of compensation payable prior to that date res judicata.

Argued for the Complainers: The judgment of the Sheriff decided nothing as to the amount of the compensation payable prior to its date. The workman was only entitled to compensation "during incapacity," and could never claim such sum as, together with the wages which he was earning, amounted to more than the wage which he was earning at the time of the accident (Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, Sched. 1 (b) and 2; Beath & Keay, 1903, 6 F. 168).

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor: ". . . . Find that the compensation due to the respondent was payable only during his incapacity; and further, in respect of his refusal to accept the complainers' offer of £5, 18s. 9d., adhere to the said interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern."

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The Lord Ordinary has sustained the reasons of suspension, and has suspended the charge on the ground, as explained in his opinion, that the principle of Beath & Keay v. Ness, 6 F. 168, decided in this Division, applies to and rules this case. In that I agree with him. I think it impossible to read that judgment without seeing that the principle upon which it proceeds is that compensation is only payable during incapacity, and in respect of incapacity. If there is a practical admission on the part of the workman that incapacity has ceased, then he cannot claim compensation in respect of incapacity. It is not necessary to say more. But I think it would be desirable to vary the interlocutor reclaimed against by laying our judgment partly on the offer of the employers referred to in Article 5 of the Complainers' Statement of Facts, and the workman's refusal of that offer. With that alteration I am in favour of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case is ruled by the judgment in Beath & Keay v. Ness, 6 F. 168, which, I may be allowed to say, seems to me to have been a very well considered and sound judgment. The only difference which was suggested was that here there had been an application to the Sheriff for review. I do not think that is any real distinction, for all that the Sheriff did was to find that the workman's incapacity had partially ceased, and to reduce his compensation to 1s. per week. The reduction only took effect as from the date of the Sheriff's judgment, and the question as to what was due prior to that date was not affected by the judgment. I therefore think that, with the alterations suggested by Lord Stormonth-Darling, the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I agree. I think that the present case is ruled by the decision in Beath & Keay v. Ness, 6 F. 168, with which I entirely concur.—14*th May* 1907.

Education — School Board — Election—Nomination — Returning Officer — Rejection by Returning Officer of Nomination Papers — Action to Reduce Decision of Returning Officer.

I. Jurisdiction of Court of Session—Finality of Returning Officer's Decision—General Order of Scottish Education Department ultra vires Quoad

Finality of Decision — Education (Scotland) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. cap. 78), sect. 27, and Schedule.

II. Competency of Action of Reduction—Elections (Scotland) Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. cap. 55), sect. 30.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 823.)

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The Defenders reclaimed, and argued: (1) Under the Order of the Education Department, the decision of the returning officer was final and not subject to review at all. This Order was passed under and in virtue of the Education (Scotland) Act 1872, sects. 3, 14, and Sched. B, and the Education (Scotland) Act 1878, sects. 26, 27, and Schedule (Bone, 1886, 13 R. 768; Hodge, 1897, 35 S.L.R. 634). (2) In any event this was not the proper process in which to review the decision of the returning officer. The only method was a petition to the Sheriff under the Corrupt Practices Act 1890, sects. 30 and 53.

Argued for the Pursuer: (1) The Order of the Education Department did not exclude the jurisdiction of the Court, and if intended to have that effect, it was ultra vires: cf. Duncan, 1892, 19 R. 594; Corrupt Practices Act 1890, sect. 44. (2) An action of reduction was a competent method of review. The Corrupt Practices Act 1890, sect. 30, provided for an appeal to the Sheriff only on certain specified grounds, and was not applicable to the present case.

No argument was offered by either party on the pleas of "no title to sue" and "all parties not called," or on the question of the relevancy of the averments of malice.

The Court adhered.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think this case has been exceedingly well argued, but after having listened carefully to the arguments placed before us I am unable to say that the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong in the decision at which he arrived.

It is merely a decision affecting preliminary pleas. In the first place, the argument of the reclaimer is that there is no jurisdiction in this Court. Now I think it will be agreed on all hands that the jurisdiction of this Court can only be excluded by statutory enactment, and that words to exclude the jurisdiction of this Court and the ordinary Courts of the country, whatever they may be, must be clear and unambiguous. Now we have been referred to no such words in any Act of Parliament. The whole argument of the Dean of Faculty and Mr Chree has been that no definite words exclusive of the Court's jurisdiction having been used in any Act of Parliament, such an exclusion was to be inferred. In the first place, it is said that there is no jurisdiction because the returning officer has been made final on the question whether a nomination is, or is not, valid. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that that is not a deliverance or regulation that the Education Department were entitled to make if thereby it was intended to exclude the ordinary jurisdiction of the Courts of the country, and therefore, when the defenders found on the words that the decision of the returning officer shall be final, I should hold that these words were of no effect whatever. I can hardly believe that the Education Department intended anything of the kind. I think it perfectly possible that what was intended to be done was simply to declare that the returning officer's decision should be final on such a matter as this in the sense that nothing should be done by anyone to stop the election during its course. Whether the Department had power to do that or not I do not say, but I say that would be a reasonable exercise of their power if they had the power. Of course it is better, if a point of that sort arises during the election, that it should be disposed of then and there by some officer, and that the election should go on. It may be a question after the election has taken place whether the election should be set aside. If nothing has happened that should make it necessary to set it aside, all is well; if something has happened to make it invalid it does not matter that the election has proceeded to a conclusion.

It is said also that the action is incompetent on the ground that if any relief is competent at all it could only be had by petition to the Sheriff. I have looked at the Act of Parliament and the sections referred to, and am decidedly with the Lord Ordinary in holding that these clauses do not affect such a case as this. There is jurisdiction given to the Sheriff for certain purposes, but not in all circumstances in which an election might come before this Court for consideration.

The defenders plead that there is no title to sue, but there was no argument on that point submitted to us, nor was there to the Lord Ordinary. Then it is said that all parties are not called, and on that I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I think the decision in which he came to the conclusion to enquire into the facts was the right one in the circumstances. I think, therefore, that we should adhere to his interlocutor.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and with the Lord Ordinary. It seems to me that the Lord Ordinary's very careful opinion completely covers the ground.

The importance of the case undoubtedly lies in the first and second preliminary pleas, the first being a plea to the jurisdiction of this 2nd Div. Court, and the second to the competency of the action on the ground, as your Lordship has explained, that the only remedy open to the pursuer was an election petition to the Sheriff. I think the Lord Ordinary has acted quite rightly in repelling both these pleas, and indeed in repelling all the four preliminary pleas for the defenders and reserving the 5th for discussion on the merits.

Kerr v. Hood and Others.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

On the first of these I do not desire to add anything to what your Lordship has said, except to say that it is always exceedingly difficult to exclude the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in matters where such exclusion does not rest upon an express enactment of the legislature. Especially is it difficult to hold that the legislature has deputed to anybody else to declare that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is excluded. The only attempt here to show that it has been excluded is by saying that the legislature deputed to the Scotch Education Department to make regulations for the conduct of the election, and that one of the regulations made by the Department was that the decision—any decision—of a returning officer should be final. Now, there may be convenience in directing that the decision of the returning officer shall be final for certain purposes and to certain effects, but that cannot be held to extend to a finality which shall have the effect of excluding the jurisdiction of this Court. I think Mr Spens was quite well founded when he said that you cannot assume that the right of the lieges to resort to the Supreme Court is taken away by anything short of very express and clear enactment, or (which is the same thing) by implication so plain as to be luce clarius.

So far as the case depends on the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act of 1890, I think the matter stands as your Lordship has put it. The intention of that Act, I think, very clearly was by the combined effect of sect. 2 and sect. 30 to put School Board elections on the same footing as other elections, not being Parliamentary, and to make the same regulations apply to them all. So reading the Act, petitions about the election of a School Board are to take the ordinary form of an election petition before the Sheriff. That is all quite right, but that is only in certain prescribed and defined cases—the cases set out in sect. 30, which cover, be it observed, all the normal grounds for challenging any of the elections to which the Act relates. That leaves any case not falling under these four heads to rest on the ordinary law, which, if I am right so far, left it open to this Court to deal with any objection to an election based on grounds other than those specified in sect. 30. This view is confirmed, as the Lord Ordinary points out, by sect. 36 and by sect. 44, both of which contemplate a decision of this Court upon questions arising as to such elections. On the whole matter I entirely agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary, and think it unnecessary to say more.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think it admits of doubt that this Court is competent to entertain actions for reduction of any documents or proceedings unless reduction is excluded by the nature of the documents or proceedings themselves, or by statutory enactment.

Now, there is nothing in the nature of the documents or proceedings here to exclude reduction. But it has been argued that the jurisdiction of the Court is excluded by statutory enactment, and in this way. It is said that power is given by statute to the Education Department to make regulations for School Board elections, and in the second place it is said that by the Order issued by the Board on 2nd October 1905, the returning officer's decision on the validity of any nomination of candidates for the School Board is made final. Now if the Order had merely provided that the returning officer should decide as to the validity of nominations, I do not think any objection could be taken to that. But the question is whether the words which follow, to the effect that such decision shall be final, are ultra vires or intra vires of the Education Department. Now that depends on the meaning to be attached to these words "shall be final." If they possibly only mean, as suggested by your Lordship in the chair, that the returning officer is to decide for the purpose of getting through with the election, and till the election is over, whether a nomination is valid or not, I think that might be a very proper regulation for the Board of Education to make. But if they mean that the decision of the returning officer is to be final to the effect of excluding the Courts of law, I think that ultra vires, for the reasons so lucidly stated by the Lord Ordinary, and particularly upon the ground which is set forth at the part of his opinion where he says—"Were it to receive the effect claimed for it, it would preclude all enquiry into the conduct of a returning officer, in the matter of a nomination, however grossly incompetent, or biased, or even corrupt such conduct may have been." Now here it is alleged that the conduct of the returning officer was unfair and malicious. Whether that allegation is true or not remains to be seen; but in view of the possibility of such cases arising, it would be a serious thing indeed if it were to be held that it was in the power of a returning officer finally to determine whether a person was to be refused a right of being placed in the list of candidates or not just as he chose to decide, it might be under the influence of many motives or it might be perfectly bona fide, but on grounds quite unfounded in point of law. If that is the meaning of the finality clause here, I do not think it can be held that it is a clause which the Education Department were entitled to enact.

With regard to the second point, I concur in what has been said by your Lordships. The Act of 1890 being a general Act applicable to various kinds of elections, it really was intended to reserve cases arising on the most common grounds of objection in such elections to be dealt with in an election petition before the Sheriff, and to leave cases arising on any other competent ground to be dealt with under the common law remedy of reduction. I may say that I quite concur with Lord Kincairney's opinion in the case of Hodge v. School Board of Ballingry, 35 S.L.R. 634.—16*th May* 1907.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

9. H.M. Advocate v. Kennedy.

High Court of Justiciary — H.M. Advocate v. Kennedy.

Justiciary Cases—Murder—Evidence—Malice—Proof of Previous Threats and Acts by the Accused—Notice—Criminal Procedure Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. cap. 35), sect. 8.

Charles Kennedy was indicted at the instance of His Majesty's Advocate on the charge "that on 9th March 1907, in the house occupied by you in Meadowhead Road, Craigneuk, Wishaw, you did assault Christina Loudon or Kennedy, your wife, and did apply a lighted newspaper to the clothing then worn by her, and set fire to the same, whereby she was severely burned on the legs and body, and died on said date, and you did thus murder her."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and was tried before Lord Salvesen at the Circuit Court in Glasgow on 9th May 1907.

In the course of the trial the Advocate-Depute proposed to question a witness as to previous threats uttered, and acts of violence offered to the deceased by the panel, whereupon counsel for the panel objected that as notice had not been given in the indictment or otherwise, evidence as to the panel's acts or statements prior to a period of fourteen days before the date of the occurrence of the crime charged was inadmissible. Counsel cited Macdonald's Criminal Law (3rd ed.), p. 469; Robertson, 1 Broun 152 at 173. The Advocate-Depute referred to sect. 8 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1887, which makes it unnecessary to put the word "maliciously" in the indictment, and maintained that such evidence was competent.

Lord Salvesen.—I have no hesitation in repelling the objection. Since the passing of the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887 there is no absolute rule limiting the evidence of facts and statements relevant to show previous malice on the part of the accused to a period of fourteen days previous to the date of the crime charged. It is no longer necessary to libel malice in the indictment, and the practice for many years has been in favour of allowing without notice evidence of any facts which have a bearing on the motive of the accused. The weight which the jury will attach to such evidence will of course depend on the interval of time which has elapsed between the date of the alleged threats and the crime, and the Court will not permit evidence to be led of threats or conduct which, from their remoteness in time or otherwise, cannot reasonably be supposed to have any connection with the crime charged.

Evidence was then led of threats to burn the deceased, uttered by the panel towards her, and acts of violence offered to her by him six months before the date of the crime charged.

The jury found the panel guilty of culpable homicide, and sentence of fifteen years' penal servitude was pronounced.—9*th May* 1907.

BILL CHAMBER.

(Lord Dundas.)

10. Brodie (Steven's Judicial Factor).

Judicial Factor — Special Powers — Powers Granted to Invest Funds, being Proceeds of Sale of Heritage and Held as Surrogatum therefor, in Purchase of Other Heritage, and to Borrow on Security of Heritage to be so Acquired.

This was an application by a judicial factor craving the special powers detailed below. The Note presented to the Court by the factor contained a narrative to the following effect.

On 6th June 1899 James Mortimer Brodie, accountant, Port-Glasgow, was appointed judicial factor on the estate of the late William Steven, mariner, Port-Glasgow. On 15th February 1907 the judicial factor presented the following report to the Accountant of Court.

. . . . . .

Brodie (Steven's Judicial Factor).

"From the last account of charge and discharge of the judicial factor's intromissions it will be seen that the factory estate at the close of that account—30th June 1906—amounted to £827, 15s. 11d., invested in bonds over certain heritable subjects in Greenock, with the exception of a sum of £77, 15s. 11d. on deposit-receipt. It will also be seen from that account that the annual income derived from the estate during the last year amounted to £26, 10s. 8d., which, being divided among the four surviving liferenters entitled thereto, represented to each, after paying current expenses, the small sum of £6, 2s. 7d.

"At the date of the judicial factor's appointment the factory estate consisted entirely of heritable property situated in Port-Glasgow, the income derived from which was about double that derived from the estate as at present invested. The heritable property being, however, some two hundred years old, and in a poor and dilapidated condition, a heavy expenditure would have been required, which the estate was not in a position to meet, to put it into a sanitary condition, had this been ordered by the sanitary authorities as the alternative of closing it up. In the petition for the appointment of the judicial factor power was accordingly craved to sell the heritable property, the price to be treated as a surrogatum therefor. The power of sale craved was granted, and the sale subsequently carried through. Since then the capital of the estate has stood invested in the heritable bonds above referred to.

"In consequence of the estate standing invested in heritable bonds instead of, as originally, in heritable property, the income derived therefrom has, as before pointed out, been very considerably diminished, the loss to each of the four beneficiaries being about £6 a year. The beneficiaries are all working people—one of them being almost entirely dependent on the share he receives from the estate—and they not unnaturally consider it a hardship that by the present method of investing the estate this loss should have to be sustained by them.

"In these circumstances the judicial factor is desirous of restoring the estate to its original condition, and, by so doing, increasing the income to be derived therefrom. He accordingly proposes to call up the existing bonds as at Whitsunday next, 1907, and, with the sanction of the Court, to reinvest the proceeds in the purchase of the heritable property mentioned below in manner following.

"I. Reinvestment of Capital.

"Purchase of property situated at 21 Clunebraefoot, Port-Glasgow, which is entirely new and finished in a first-class manner, and fully let.

Deduct bond proposed to be taken over same at 3¾ per cent.,	900	0	0
Sum proposed to be invested by factor in above property,	£500	0	0
Amount proposed to be lent on heritable security at 4 per cent.,	275	0	0
Balance of factory funds to be available for expenses of application to Court, and expenses connected with purchase of property and preparation of bond,	52	15	11
Total factory funds,	£827	15	11

II. Annual Income derived from Reinvestment of Funds.

Balance payable from rental account of property proposed to be purchased, as per separate statement,	£37	9	5
Interest from new bond at 4 per cent.,	£11	0	0
	£48	9	5
Annual income of factory estate as at present invested, as per last account of charge and discharge,	26	10	8
Net annual increase to beneficiaries by reinvestment of funds as proposed,	£21	18	9

"The judicial factor would accordingly respectfully request the Accountant of Court to report whether, in his opinion, powers should be granted to him to reinvest the factory estate in the manner above mentioned."

The Accountant of Court, having considered the said report, remitted to an architect to value and report upon the subjects proposed to be bought. The architect reported favourably of the property. The Accountant of Court estimated the increase of income which would be available to the liferenters from the proposed purchase at £23, 13s. per annum. He reported in the following terms:—

"The powers craved are:—

1. To purchase said subjects at No. 21 Clunebraefoot, Port-Glasgow, at the price of £1400 sterling; and
2. To borrow on security of same a sum of £900 sterling.

"The Accountant refers to the cases of Gilray, 18th May 1876, 3 R. 619, and Watt, 1856, 18 D. 652.

"The reinvestment proposed by the judicial factor being beneficial to the liferenters and not prejudicial to the interests of the fiars, the Accountant is of opinion that the powers craved by the judicial factor may be granted, but reports the matter for the consideration of the Court."

The judicial factor thereupon presented this Note to the Court, craving the special powers above referred to.

The Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills granted the powers craved.—26th April 1907.

SHERIFF COURT.

(Sheriff-Substitute Guy at Edinburgh.)

11. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Thomson.

BANKRUPTCY — SEQUESTRATION — PETITION AGAINST TRUSTEE FOR ACCOUNTING AND REPLACING FUNDS—COMPETENCY—BANKRUPTCY ACT 1856, SECT. 86—MALVERSATION—BURGH ASSESSMENTS — EDINBURGH AND MUNICIPAL POLICE (AMENDMENT) ACT 1891, SECT. 71.

The 86th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. cap. 79) provides: "The judicial factor, the trustee, and commissioners shall be amenable to the Lord Ordinary and to the Sheriff, although resident beyond the territory of the Sheriff, at the instance of any party interested, to account for their intromissions and management, by petition served on them; and in case it shall appear that such application ought not to have been made, the party complained of shall be entitled to his full expenses, to be either retained out of the funds, or recovered from the party complaining, as the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall direct."

This was a petition at the instance of the Magistrates of the City of Edinburgh and George Gunn, Collector of Police Assessments for the said city, against E. J. M. Thomson, C.A., Edinburgh, trustee on the sequestrated estate of Mrs Reid, as such trustee and as an individual, in which the pursuers craved the Court "to ordain the defender to produce a full account of his intromissions as trustee foresaid with the funds and estate of the said Mrs Mary Williamson Reid, from the date of the sequestration of said estate on 19th April 1904 to the present date, by which account the amount available for distribution among the creditors of the said Mrs Mary Williamson Reid according to their several rights may be ascertained; and to ordain him to pay such amount as may be so ascertained, or any balance thereof, into bank for behoof of the said sequestrated estate, in order that the same may be available for distribution among the said creditors, according to their several rights and interests; and in particular, to find on said accounting that the defender is bound to credit the said sequestrated estate with the sum of £153, 19s. 3d., specified in the Condescendence hereto annexed, and to ordain him to credit the said sequestrated estate with said sum in said accounting as if said sum had been recovered and retained by him as part of the funds of the said sequestrated estate for division amongst the creditors of the bankrupt according to their several rights and interest, subject always to payment of necessary charges and commission to the trustee, in terms of the bankruptcy statute, and to find the defender liable in expenses."

The estate of Mrs Reid was sequestrated on 19th April 1904. At that date she was the tenant of certain hotel premises, and the burgh assessments due in respect of her occupation of the premises for the year ending 15th May 1904, which became payable on 11th November 1903, had not been paid. The said assessments (together with the statutory penalty) amounted to £18, 19s. 2d., and an affidavit and claim for the same were lodged in the sequestration on 7th June 1904.

On 14th May 1904 the household furniture of the bankrupt was sold by the defender by private bargain for the sum of £231, 2s. 11d. The defender averred that of this sum he received £80, the balance having been paid to the landlord of the premises, being the rent due to him, and for which rent the furniture was liable to his hypothec.

No dividends were paid and no deliverances were pronounced in the sequestration, as the funds available for division among the preferable creditors were insufficient; and the defender averred that after paying the expenses of the sequestration and administration there were not funds in his hands to enable him to pay the assessments.

The pursuers maintained that they were entitled to have their claim adjudicated on, and to a deliverance ranking them. They also averred that provided the claims of the creditors were ranked according to their rights and interests under the bankruptcy statute, the funds were sufficient to pay them their preferable claim, and that the defender had failed to administer the funds of the estate according to law; and, in particular, they averred that the payment of rent and interest (amounting to £153, 19s. 3d.) to the landlord while the assessments remained unpaid was illegal and erroneous, as their claim for assessments was preferable to all claims of a private nature in virtue of the Edinburgh and Municipal Police (Amendment) Act 1891, sect. 71, which enacts that "All rates and assessments imposed under the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts shall, in the case of bankruptcy, insolvency, or liquidation, be a preferable claim to all debts of a private nature, due by the person or persons assessed, or by the person or persons liable in such rates and assessments."

The defender pleaded, inter alia: "(1) The petition in the present circumstances is incompetent and unnecessary." On the question of the competency of the petition the following cases were cited: Bell v. Gow, 1862, 1 M. 84; Burt v. Bell, 1863, 1 M. 382; Henderson v. Henderson's Tr., 1882, 10 R. 188; M'Adam v. Martin's Tr., 1884, 12 R. 358; Craig v. Mitchell, 1895, II. S.L.T. 488, III. S.L.T. 20; and Duke v. More, 1903, 6 F. 190.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Guy) held that the petition was competent.

Sheriff Guy.—The only question which I am at present called upon to decide is whether the present proceeding is competent. I think it is, but I am not to be held at this stage as expressing the opinion that all the craves of the petition can be competently given effect to. It was argued to me that the 86th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act did not apply to such a case as the pursuers set forth. It was said that their remedy was in the sequestration. In a sense that is true, but in the sense that this remedy is in the sequestration. The 86th section is not applicable to provide a means of review of the trustee's actions where the Bankruptcy Acts provide a definite mode of review. But the defender could not suggest any such mode of review that the pursuers could have adopted in the present case. Nor could the pursuers have raised a direct action. That would have presented the same situation as was presented in Craig v. Mitchell (Coull's Tr.), decided by Lord Wellwood on 12th March 1895 (2 S.L.T. 488; affd. 3 S.L.T. 20). In that case Lord Wellwood said that "the pursuer might have applied to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff under sect. 86 of the Bankrupty Act of 1856 by petition calling upon the defender to account for his intromissions and management." That is precisely what the pursuers are now doing. The circumstances averred by the pursuers seem to me to bring the present case under the wide interpretation of malversation in office figured by Lords Adam and Kinnear in the case of Duke v. More, 8th December 1903, 6 F. 190.—26*th September* 1906.

SHERIFF COURT.

Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Thomson.

SHERIFF COURT.

(Sheriff-Substitute Robertson at Aberdeen.)

12. Murray v. Watt's Executors.

JURISDICTION—SHERIFF—DECLARATOR THAT WILL IS VOID FROM UNCERTAINTY—SHERIFF COURT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1877, SECT. 8 (2).

This was an action concluding for declarator that a clause in a will was void from uncertainty, that the deceased died intestate, and that the pursuer, being the next of kin, was entitled to an accounting and payment. The defenders pleaded that the action was incompetent in the Sheriff Court. The Sheriff-Substitute repelled this plea and added the following Note, which sufficiently states the facts.

Sheriff Robertson.—The question here is raised in the following circumstances. The late Miss Margaret Watt died at Inverurie on 26th May 1906. She left a last will and testament nominating the defenders in this action as her executors. The third purpose of her will was in the following terms:—"I direct and empower the said Alexander Smith and William Stewart, and the survivor of them, as executors and executor foresaid, as soon as possible after my death to divide, apportion and pay over the residue and remainder of my estate between and among such charitable, religious and other purposes (including relief to any of my poor relations) as they may select and approve of."

The pursuer here is one of, if not the only, next of kin, and she claims that this clause is void from uncertainty, and that deceased therefore died intestate, so far as the residue of her estate is concerned, and that she (pursuer) is entitled to an accounting from defenders and to payment of the amount brought out.

There seems little doubt that pursuer's contention is sound, and defenders hardly dispute it; indeed, they have obtained the Dean of Faculty's opinion that this purpose is void; but they consider that they are entitled to judicial authority before parting with the money.

They proposed a Special Case, but the pursuer's agent would not agree on the ground of expense, and pursuer eventually brought this action. I do not suppose I should have any difficulty or doubt in disposing of the action, if I am entitled to consider it, but defenders object, and plead that the action is incompetent in the Sheriff Court. Defenders' argument briefly is that to declare this provision void from uncertainty would be an exercise of nobile officium which can only be exercised by the Court of Session (vide Mackay, Prac., I. 211). Pursuer answers that this is not really an exercise of nobile officium, and that it falls directly under the category of cases to which the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court was extended by sect. 8, sub-sect. 2, of the Sheriff Court Act of 1877, i.e. "actions of declarator for the purpose of determining any question relating to the property in, or right of succession to, moveables" where the value is under £1000, as it here admittedly is. Giving the matter my best consideration, I am of opinion that this action falls under this category, and that I have jurisdiction. This is not in the position of a charitable trust whose object requires to be declared and a scheme settled for its administration; in a sense completing the will of the testator and supplying his omissions. All I am asked to do is to apply the law as settled in prior cases, and find in accordance with it that the clause of residue is void from uncertainty, in the same way as if void from want of signature, and that therefore the next of kin must succeed.

As I have said, I think this is within my jurisdiction under the section of the Act quoted, and I therefore repel defenders' first plea in law. —26*th February* 1907.

I. Lease—Tenant's Interests Under Lease—Landlord with Power of Resumption—Local Authority—Acquisition by Local Authority of Part of Subjects Leased by Agreement with Landlord—Tenant's Interests Must Also be Acquired, if not by Agreement, by Provisional Order—Public Health Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 38), sects. 103, 144, and 145.

II. Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. cap. 61), sect. 1—Public Health Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 38), sect. 166—Limitation of Period within which Actions may be Brought—Erection of Works by Local Authority upon Land Leased to Tenant—Delay by Tenant in Bringing Action to Protect his Rights Beyond Period of Limitation—Held that Limitation in Acts Did Not Apply.

This was an action at the instance of Thomas Gilliland, farmer, Haughyett, Mauchline, against the County Council of Ayr as the local authority of the said county within the meaning of the Public Health (Scotland) Act 1897, and the Kilmarnock District Committee of the said County Council as local authority for the Kilmarnock district for certain other purposes under the said Act, to have it declared (a) that the pursuer was tenant of the farm of Haughyett, Mauchline, under a lease dated March and April 1906, following upon missives dated August and October 1903, entered into between him and the trustees of the late Sir Claud Alexander of Ballochmyle, for the period of nineteen years from the separation of the crop of the year 1903 as regards the arable land, and from Whitsunday 1904 as regards the houses, of the said farm; (b) that in the subjects leased to him there was included a certain plot or area of ground disponed by the said trustees to the defenders by disposition dated January 1906, and also certain other portions of ground over which a servitude was granted by the said disposition; (c) that the pursuer was entitled as tenant to the exclusive possession of the subjects leased; (d) that the defenders had no lawful right to interfere with the pursuer in his use and possession of the subjects, except in so far as they may acquire right by contract with the pursuer or by the due exercise of any of the powers conferred on them as local authorities; (e) that the defenders had at present no right or title to occupy any portion of the subjects let to him, or to have erected thereon any sewage tank or other drainage works, or to enter on the lands let to him; (f) that any rights conferred upon the defenders by the said disposition granted in their favour by the trustees were subject to the pursuer's right to possess and enjoy the whole subjects let to him during the whole currency of the lease.

The action further concluded for interdict and removal of the works erected on the ground of which pursuer was tenant, for restoration of the ground to its former state, and for damages; and alternatively to the conclusions for interdict, removing, restoration, and payment, it sought declarator further (a) that the defenders had entered upon the said lands and erected a sewage tank, and had thereby interfered with the pursuer in the use and enjoyment of the lands; and that having done so, the defenders were bound, as a condition of being allowed to continue in the possession and occupation of the lands during the pursuer's tenancy under his lease, to make compensation to the pursuer for the value of his interest in the land so taken, and for all damage done; and (b) that the defenders were bound to take steps for ascertainment of the compensation due, and to pay the same.

The facts of the case and contentions of parties appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia: "(1) The averments of the defenders being irrelevant to support their pleas, the defences ought to be repelled."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia: "(3) In respect of the provisions of the Public Health Act 1897 and the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, the action is barred."

The Lord Ordinary repelled the third plea in law for the defenders, and sustained the first plea in law for the pursuer, and found and declared in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the Summons.

Lord Johnston. — The pursuer, Thomas Gilliland, by a series of letters, No. 6 of process, which amounted to complete and valid missives of let, the last of them being dated 24th October 1903, became tenant for nineteen years, under the trustees of Sir Claud Alexander of Ballochmyle, of the farm of Haughyett, and entered thereto and possessed the same from Martinmas 1903 as to the land, and Whitsunday 1904 as to the houses and grass. He possessed for the first two or three years under these missives, but it was a condition thereof that he should "enter into a formal lease in the terms recently introduced for use on the estate."

Outer House. Lord Johnston.

Gilliland v. County Council of Ayr and Others.

One of these terms was a power of resumption in favour of the landlords, to be afterwards mentioned. It is averred that this was not brought to pursuer's notice at the time the contract was entered into, and was not within his contemplation. But as it entered the formal lease, afterwards granted and accepted, the averment cannot be regarded.

While the negotiations for this lease were proceeding, the landlords' agents, on 1st October 1903 (No. 18 of process) received an informal hint from a Mr Bain that the Kilmarnock District Committee would in all probability be applying to them for land on Haughyett for filtration purposes in connection with Mauchline drainage scheme. What relation to the Committee Mr Bain held I do not know, but the information he gave had no effect on the landlords' negotiations with the pursuers.

Thereafter the Kilmarnock District Committee did enter on negotiations with the Ballochmyle trustees for between two and three roods of ground on Haughyett for the site of sewage purification tanks, and for a wayleave or servitude for a pipe track. The full correspondence is not produced, but the following is shown from the letters which have been referred to. (1) On 27th June 1904 the clerk to the Committee wrote: "The Committee understand the tenant holds from year to year, and upon that footing they will pay his claims, either as these may be amicably adjusted, or as they may be settled by arbitration after the work is completed and the amount of damage can be ascertained." (2) This mistake was corrected by the landlords' agents, who wrote on 13th July 1904, inter alia, "Haughyett is let on lease." But it appears to me that the explanation did not penetrate into the minds of the Committee or their advisers, and that they continued to the end persuaded that they were dealing with land which was only let from year to year, and not subject to a current lease, and I am satisfied that this is the cause of the awkward situation which has been created. But for this the pursuer had no responsibility. (3) These negotiations resulted in an agreement between the Ballochmyle trustees and the Committee being come to in February 1905, and on the 8th of that month the landlords' agents wrote: "Your clients may now take possession and proceed with the works." In the correspondence which resulted in this agreement there was a general reference to tenant's claims to be undertaken by the Committee, but these, as far as I can find, were only referred to as "all damage of any kind which may be sustained by our clients or their tenants in the construction and maintenance of the works." From this I gather that the landlords' agents did not, any more than the Committee and their clerk, appreciate the pursuer's position and right as tenant under lease.

Apparently the District Committee did enter into possession of the ground shortly after 8th February 1905, and they say that they completed their works on 5th February 1906.

The disposition from the Ballochmyle trustees to the Committee is dated 23rd December 1905 and 10th January 1906 and recorded 26th January 1906, but the formal lease between the trustees and the pursuer was not executed till 7th and 10th March and 4th April 1906. Though he did not oppose the Committee taking possession and executing their works, the pursuer did, on 27th November 1905, in course of correspondence, lodge with the Committee's clerk a claim, No. 15 of process, which fully disclosed the fact that he claimed on the footing of a tenancy having seventeen and a half years to run. This position he has consistently maintained. On the other hand, the Committee, who are defenders in the case, have maintained the attitude on which they appear to me to have negotiated with the landlords and subsequently to have acted, that the pursuer was only a yearly tenant and to be treated as such. I found my view that this attitude was adopted under error, upon the consideration that it was adopted before the Committee knew anything of the landlords' power of resumption. Until April 1906 they knew nothing of this power, as the formal lease was not in existence till then, and was only exhibited to them on the 11th of that month. But they now maintain that the pursuer's position was, so far as they were concerned, made that of a yearly tenant, or rather tenant at will, by reason of the landlords' power of resumption, on making compensation as adjusted by arbitration; and that for any compensation the pursuer may be entitled to, he has consequently to look to his landlords and not to them. They may be entitled to maintain this plea, but it was not in the minds of either of the parties concerned at the date of the agreement come to.

In the disposition of December 1905, January 1906, by the Ballochmyle trustees to the District Committee, No. 8 of process, it is declared that the latter "shall indemnify the tenant or occupier of said lands for all loss of crop and surface or other damages which they may have already sustained or may sustain, by or through the operations in constructing said proprietors' works, etc.; and further, shall recompense and make good to us and our foresaids, and the tenants or occupiers foresaid, any damage that may arise" from these operations or the repair thereof. This clearly does not contemplate the compensation of the pursuer for his interest in the lands, etc., taken.

Again, in the formal lease by the Ballochmyle trustees to the pursuer, there are these two important clauses:

1st. "As also reserving to the proprietor power to resume any part or parts of the farm for building, feuing, quarrying, letting on long lease, or any other purpose, and to make roads and ditches on the lands hereby let, and to straighten or alter marches, and, in doing so, to add to or decrease the extent of the farm."

2nd. "Reserving always to the tenant his claim for damages or compensation against the County Council of Ayrshire or the Kilmarnock District Committee in connection with the land taken by them for sewage tank and other works relating thereto."

I shall revert immediately to the first of these clauses. As regards the second, it obviously contemplates the pursuer's claim from a different point of view from that on which the clause in the District Committee's disposition is drawn. And this, I conclude, arises from the fact that his agent had a hand in framing the one deed, while the Committee's agent was the draughtsman of the other. But the clause, though from another point of view it may be important, has no materiality to the present question, for, as between the pursuer and defenders, it could not give the former claims which he had not otherwise, nor was it required to give him claims which he had otherwise. Now in these circumstances the present action has been raised really to determine whether the pursuer remained after 8th February 1905, or at any rate after the 26th January 1906, when the District Committee's disposition was recorded, tenant of the land acquired by him on a nineteen years' lease with a number of years still to run, and whether, consequently, he should have been dealt with and compensated on that footing, or whether he was, at one or other of these dates, dispossessed and left without claim except for surface and other damages occasioned by the construction of the works. The complexity of the situation created by the irregular action of the landlords and the District Committee has compelled the pursuer to a complex form of action to attain his remedy. But I think that the above question lies at the root of the case, and that if it is determined the case will admit of a simpler solution than at first sight seems possible.

I think that I am entitled to take it from the Record, in conjunction with the documents and correspondence referred to and incorporated therein (and the parties' argument solicited a decision if possible without proof)—

1st, That the landlords had no power to resume the land in question except under the clause in the lease above quoted;

2nd, That they never did resume the land in question, unless impliedly by their action in dealing with the District Committee in consenting to the Committee taking possession and in granting them a title.

First, then, what is the interpretation of the claim of resumption? I pass over, meantime, the fact that it gives no right to resume for pipe tracks, wayleaves or servitudes. Does it give right to resume for the purpose of transferring to a company or local authority with compulsory powers? It expressly says for building, feuing, quarrying, or long leasing. All these are common and well-recognised estate purposes. It adds, or for "any other purpose," but according to a well-known canon of construction, such general purpose must be ejusdem generis with the particular purposes enumerated. And I cannot regard the execution of a public work, either of a commercial character, as a railway, or of a municipal character, such as sewage works, as ejusdem generis with the ordinary estate purposes enumerated. I am supported in this view when I find that the purpose cannot be attained without granting, in conjunction with right to the land, rights of servitude which in no possible view does the clause contemplate. The case is very similar to that of Johnson v. Edgware, etc. Railway Co., 1866, 35 Beav. 480, 35 L.J. Ch. 322, and in nothing more than in this, that, as there, the fact that the railway was coming through the land, so here the fact that the local authority would require the land was known to the landlords when the respective leases were granted. I refer to Lord Romilly's judgment, the reasoning in which I adopt, as I think it in large part applicable to the present case. I am unable to bring the case within the decision in Middle Ward of Lanark v. Marshall, 1896, 24 R. 139. The case is not well reported, for the report does not give any indication of how or where the landlord resumed possession. But it was admitted that he had resumed, and competently resumed, and on that footing he paid, and the tenants accepted the compensation provided by the leases. In these circumstances it was held that the tenants' claim was entirely against their landlord under the lease, and that they had no claim against a local authority who had feued the resumed land from the landlord.

Second. Having regard to the manner in which the landlords and the local authority acted here, it falls to consider the position in which the local authority stood. They had, under the Public Health Act 1897, sect. 103, powers to construct sewers, and under that section sewers include all works necessary for the disposal or treatment of sewage. They had, therefore, statutory powers to execute the works which they have constructed on the Ballochmyle lands leased to the pursuer. For the purpose of sect. 103, they had power under sect. 144 to acquire land in terms of the Lands Clauses Act, and that "whether by agreement or otherwise." But for the meaning of "otherwise" reference must be made to sect. 145. They have acquired from the landlords by agreement. But they could only acquire their interest in the lands, and that was an interest subject to the interest of the pursuer—subject to his current lease for nineteen years. If they could not acquire his interest by agreement (and they never tried), they were compelled to resort to a provisional order under sect. 145. That section covers the rights, not merely of owners, but of lessees and occupiers. Their acquisition by agreement from the landlords does not relegate the tenant to a claim under the 164th section (the equivalent of the 116th section of the 1867 Act), as in the Peterhead case, 1880, 7 R. 536.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Gilliland v. County Council of Ayr and Others.

I do not think that the District Committee can be put in any better position than if it be assumed that they had statutory powers under a private Act, and had acquired lands from the proprietor under their compulsory powers, it matters not whether by agreement or by putting in force their compulsory powers and going to arbitration. The statutory taking by the local authority is not equivalent to resumption by the landlord under the lease. Taking by the local authority was not the thing contemplated by the clause of resumption (see Solway Junction Railway Co. v. Jackson, 1874, 1 R. 831, and Lord Watson's comment thereon in Fleming v. Newport Railway Co., 1883, 10 R. (H.L.) at p. 36).

I cannot hold that the provisions of the Public Health Act 1897, sect. 166, or of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, are applicable to the present case, and I shall therefore repel the defenders' third plea in law, and that being so, I think that I am in a position generally to sustain the first plea for the pursuer, at least as regards the declaratory conclusion of the Summons.

But as regards the operative conclusion there is some difficulty owing to the actings of parties, The defenders have been allowed to take possession and to complete their works. I think that the correspondence shows that the statement of Cond. 10 in the first half of page 17 of the Record is very probably justified, and it is quite clear that the defenders have all along been willing to compensate the pursuer on the footing of a yearly tenancy. If it be found that they are bound to compensate him on the footing of a nineteen years' lease, I cannot assume that they will decline to enter into arbitration, as if they had taken under compulsory powers, to which the pursuer consents. If they do decline, though I do not consider the pursuers' alternative conclusion workable or even competent, I think, notwithstanding, that there is a very simple compulsitor. They cannot now be interdicted, but they can be ordained to remove. I do not find that difficulty which the learned Dean of Faculty represented that the judgment in Graham v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, 9 R. (H.L.) 91, interposed. I am not proposing to impose on the pursuer an equitable compensation for his legal rights, though I think, in the public interest, I might do so. He desires such equitable compensation. I am giving the defenders the opportunity, with the pursuer's consent, to make such equitable compensation, and if they do not like to take that opportunity, they must submit to the legal consequence.

In order that the defenders may have an opportunity of taking my judgment to review if so advised, I shall limit my decree to the declaratory conclusion.—23*rd May* 1907.

PROCESS — PRINTING — FAILURE TO LODGE PRINTS — EXCEPTION OF "GOOD CAUSE"—ACTIONS TRANSMITTED FROM SHERIFF COURT UNDER EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT — EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT 1880 (43 & 44 VICT. CAP. 42), SECT. 6—SHERIFF COURTS ACT 1877 (40 & 41 VICT. CAP. 50), SECT. 9—COURT OF SESSION ACT 1868 (31 & 32 VICT. CAP. 100), SECT. 26.

Sect. 6 of the Employers' Liability Act provides as follows:—

"(1) Every action for recovery of compensation under this Act shall be brought in a county court, but may, upon the application of either plaintiff or defendant, be removed into a superior court in like manner and upon the same conditions as an action commenced in a county court may by law be removed.

. . . . . .

In Scotland any action under this Act may be removed to the Court of Session at the instance of either party, in the manner provided by, and subject to the conditions prescribed by, sect. 9 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1877."

. . . . . .

Sect. 9 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act provides as follows:—

". . . . (1.) If a defender shall at any time before an interlocutor closing the record is pronounced in the action, or within six days after such an interlocutor shall have been pronounced, lodge a note in the process in the following or similar terms: that is to say—

"The defender prays that the process may be transmitted to the Court of Session.

[Signed by the defender or his law agent.]

"[Date.]

"it shall be the duty of the Sheriff-Clerk forthwith to transmit the process to the Keeper of the Rolls of the First Division of the Court of Session, who shall, under the directions of the Lord President of the Court, mark on the petition the Division and the Lord Ordinary before whom it shall depend, and shall transmit the process to the depute-clerk officiating at the bar of such Lord Ordinary; and the process having been so transmitted, shall thereafter proceed before the Court of Session as nearly as may be as if it had been raised in that Court."

Sect. 26 of the Court of Session Act of 1868 provides as follows:—

"If no motion for revisal is made as above provided, or if such motion is refused, or after the lapse of the period within which the revised pleadings fall to be lodged where a revisal has been allowed or ordered, the pursuer shall cause the pleadings which are to form the record to be printed, and shall within eight days from the lodging of the defences or revised pleadings, as the case may be, deliver two printer's proofs thereof to the agent or to each of the agents of the other parties, and also to the clerk to the process, who shall transmit the same to the Lord Ordinary, and the Lord Ordinary shall direct the cause to be put to the roll for a day not less than four days and not more than six days thereafter: and upon such day the Lord Ordinary shall require the parties then to adjust their pleadings, and shall close the record: Provided that, if the pursuer shall fail to deliver the printer's proofs as aforesaid, the defender may enrol the cause, and move for decree of absolvitor by default, which decree the Lord Ordinary shall grant unless the pursuer shall show good cause to the contrary: . . . ."

An action of damages at common law and under the Employers' Liability Act was raised in the Sheriff Court, transmitted to the Court of Session, and marked by the Keeper of the Rolls to Lord Salvesen on 9th May 1907. Prints of the Open Record were not lodged until 20th May. The defenders enrolled the cause before the Lord Ordinary, and moved for decree by default on the ground that the pursuer's agent had failed to lodge prints in terms of the 26th section of the Court of Session Act 1868.

The pursuer opposed the motion on the ground (1) that the said section did not apply to actions originating in the Sheriff Court and transmitted from that Court to the Court of Session; and (2) that in not printing within eight days after the date of transmission, the pursuer relied on a judgment of Lord Ardwall (which is not reported) giving effect to his first contention, and that this was "good cause" within the meaning of the said 26th section.

The Lord Ordinary refused the motion. His Lordship held (1) that, following Lord Ardwall's judgment, the 26th section of the Act of 1868 did not apply to an action originating in the Sheriff Court, and that if the pursuer delayed in printing the Record, it was open to the defenders in such action to enrol the cause, and move for an order on the pursuer to print; (2) that even if sect. 26 did apply, he would have been prepared to hold that the pursuer's failure to print came within the exception of "good cause" in the section, in respect that there was a prior judgment of Lord Ardwall refusing a similar motion.—23*rd May* 1907.

Gardiner Baird.

15. Gardiner Baird.

Liferent and Fee—Capital or Income—Price of Entailed Estate—Price Invested in Debenture Stocks between Dividends—Apportionment of Accrued Dividend Carried by Stocks at Date of Investment—Held that the Apportionment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict., cap. 35) Did Not Apply.

Sir William Gardiner Baird disentailed and sold certain lands for the sum of £19,000, which was duly consigned in the Bank of Scotland in terms of the Entail (Scotland) Act 1882.

On Sir William's petition part of the money was invested at the sight of the Court in the name of trustees in certain railway stocks, chiefly debenture stocks.

When, in obedience to the remit in an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills of 3rd July 1906, the reporter, Mr George Dunlop, W.S., Edinburgh, was revising the deed of declaration of trust which the trustees were ordered to execute in connection with the investment, the question of apportionment arose.

The reporter reported that some of the stocks were at the date of purchase carrying accrued interest, and expressed the opinion that the first dividend should be apportioned between income and capital, and only the portion effeiring to the period subsequent to purchase should be treated as income and paid to the petitioner.

The reporter referred to the following cases:—Donaldson, 1851, 14 D. 165; Cameron, 1873, 1 R. 21. In Cameron he said the principle of the apportionment of dividends between income and capital is clearly laid down. He stated that in his opinion the petitioner would be receiving double interest if he were held entitled to the proportion of dividends earned by stocks during a period when the funds entailed for his behoof were not invested in them. He quoted sect. 27 of the Entail (Scotland) Act of 1882, which is as follows: "The price of an entailed estate or any part thereof sold under the provision of this Act shall be entailed estate within the meaning of this Act"; and argued that this price must be treated exactly as if it were entailed land and the capital of the fund accordingly kept absolutely intact, but subject, of course, to such fluctuations as might take place in the Stock Exchange prices of the securities. He further said that the Apportionment Act would be applicable at the termination of the first liferent, and he considered that the same principle should be applied at the initiation of the trust. That so far as his information went it was the general practice in trusts for liferent beneficiaries which are administered in Scotland, and audited by professional auditors, to make an apportionment between capital and income of the first dividend received after the purchase of stocks.

Bill Chamber. Lord Guthrie.

The petitioner, on the other hand, argued that the Apportionment Acts do not apply in a case of this kind, and referred to Scholefield v. Redfern, 1863, 2 Drury and Small 173, and Clarke, 1881, L.R. 18, Ch. D. 160. He contended that the Apportionment Act of 1870 only applies where there is a determination of interest, limited or otherwise, between the dates when the periodical payments in the nature of income become due, and that there had been no change or determination of interest in this case. He admitted that if the stock had been bought cum. div. within the settling period when the dividend fell to be paid, then it would have fallen to be restored wholly to capital, but argued that if the stock be bought, as here, two or three months before the declaration of dividend, it is impossible to say what proportion of the price is applicable to such dividend (Donaldson v. Donaldson's Trs., 1851, 14 D. 165; Bulkeley v. Stephens, 1896, 2 Ch. 241).

Further, the interlocutor of 3rd July 1906 was in these terms: "Authorises the said trustees to pay the income or annual produce of the funds so invested to the petitioner for his own use and behoof during his life, and after his death to the heirs of entail in their order who would have been entitled to succeed to the said lands of Damside and Factor's Park under the foresaid deed of entail. Appoints the said trustees . . . . to set aside in each year and place to the credit of a sinking fund to be opened and kept in their name such portion of the income of the India 3½ per cent. stock . . . . as shall be sufficient to provide against loss of capital on redemption. . . ."

By this interlocutor no authority or direction was given to the trustees to treat any portion of the income, except in the case of the India stock, as applicable to capital; and under the interlocutors they have no alternative but to pay the dividends as collected to the petitioner, subject to the creation of a sinking fund in connection with the India stock.

Assuming that apportionment was made, the sum apportioned to capital would have to be invested, and it would be necessary to apportion between capital and income the first dividend received on such investment. This operation would have to be carried on ad infinitum, so that the principle could not be carried to its logical conclusion.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills upheld the petitioner's contentions, and pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the first dividends received on the securities specified in the schedule appended to the said interim report are not subject to apportionment between capital and income, but fall to be paid wholly to the petitioner for his own use and behoof, the first dividend on the India 3½ per cent. stock specified in the said schedule being subject to the direction with regard to a sinking fund contained in the interlocutor of 3rd July 1906, and directs Mr Dunlop to adjust the declaration of trust referred to in the interlocutor of 3rd July and 3rd October 1906, in accordance with these findings: quoad ultra, continues the petition."—21*st March* 1907.

III. Rights in Security—Heritable Bond—Extinction Confusione—Succession of Fee Simple Proprietor of Security Lands to Fee of Bond Burdened with Certain Liferents—Circumstances in Which it was Held that Fee of Debt was Not Extinguished Confusione.

The facts of this case and the contentions of the various parties to it appear sufficiently from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion, which is in the following terms:—

Lord Dundas.—The fund in medio in this action of multiplepoinding is a sum of £4500, contained in a bond and disposition in security, dated 17th May 1830, granted by the late Andrew Colvile in favour of the late John Blackburn of Killearn. By the said bond, certain lands called Muirside, now forming part of the estate of Crombie and Craigflower, were conveyed in security for the repayment of the said sum of £4500. Mr

Blackburn was duly infeft; and on 2nd August 1834 he conveyed the said lands and all his right and interest under the said bond and disposition in security to Miss Margaret Blackburn and her heirs and assignees. Miss Blackburn was duty infeft. By disposition, assignation and settlement, dated 24th August 1841, on the narrative that she had resolved to settle the destination and right of succession of the said sum of money and heritable security for the same in the event of her death, Miss Blackburn disponed and conveyed the lands of Muirside, and her whole right and interest to and under the said bond and disposition in security, to and in favour of her grand-nieces, daughters of the said Andrew Colvile, her nephew nominatim, equally among them, or such of them as should survive her and be unmarried; and to the survivors or survivor of them in liferent, during all the days of their lifetime and remaining unmarried, as said was, for their liferent use only, and after the marriage or death of all of them, then to and in favour of the heir of entail who might be in possession of the estate of Crombie and Craigflower at the marriage or death of all the daughters of the said Andrew Colvile. At the date of this deed Muirside was entailed upon the same series of heirs as Crombie and Craigflower, although this fact appears to have been unknown to the framer of the deed. Miss Blackburn died on 10th February 1842, and the liferentrices were thereafter duly infeft as such. The income of the said sum of £4500 was regularly paid to such of them as were entitled to it until 2nd August 1905, when Miss Isalen Mary Colvile, the last surviving daughter of Andrew Colvile, died. At the date of Miss Blackburn's death, her nephew, the said Andrew Colvile, was heir of entail in possession of the entailed estates of Crombie and Craigflower, including Muirside. He died in 1856, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir James William Colvile, who completed his title as heir of entail, and died on 6th December 1880. Sir James was succeeded by his brother, Eden Colvile, who made up title in due form. On 31st March 1881 Eden Colvile raised an action of declarator in the Court of Session to have it declared that the three deeds of entail under which he held the estates of Crombie and Craigflower (including Muirside) were invalid and ineffectual as regarded the whole prohibitory, irritant and resolutive clauses therein, and that he was entitled to deal with the estates as unlimited fiar thereof. In this action the pursuer obtained decree from the Lord Ordinary (Curriehill) and the Second Division. The case is reported (Colvile v. Marindin, 1881, 8 R. 937). Eden Colvile died on 2nd April 1893, leaving a trust disposition of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, in favour of trustees, who are now represented by the pursuers and real raisers of this action. By the said trust disposition Eden Colvile evacuated the previous tailzied destination of Crombie and Craigflower. In these circumstances, competing claims are made to the sum of £4500 contained in the said bond and disposition in security.

It will be convenient to consider first the claim No. 15 of process for Captain Arthur Henry Marindin, the person who, but for the disentail of the estates of Crombie and Craigflower and the subsequent evacuation of the tailzied destination, would have been the heir of entail in possession at the date of the death of the last liferentrix. I am of opinion that this claim is ill-founded, and must be repelled. It seems to me impossible, as matter of construction, to hold that Captain Marindin was, or is, "after the marriage or death of all of them" (i.e. the liferentrices) " . . . . the heir of entail . . . . in possession of the estate of Crombie and Craigflower . . . ." I think that possession of the entailed estate was a condition of the succession. I should have reached this conclusion apart from authority; but such aid as may be derived from reported cases seems to me to strengthen the view which I take. Thus in Inglis v. Gillanders, 1894, 22 R. 266; affd. 1895, ibid. (H.L.) 51, the portion of the destination specially considered was "to the heir in possession of Highfield under the entail thereof for the time, and (i.e. whom failing) to the other heirs-substitute in said entail in the order set down in said entail successively." Highfield had been disentailed and the tailzied destination evacuated. It was held in regard to the "first branch" above quoted, that (in the words of Lord Watson (22 R. (H.L.) at p. 55)), "it is obvious that, since the disentail of Highfield, the substitution has become void, because there can be no heir answering the description." The "second branch," however, was held to import no condition of possession; all that was requisite being the character of an heir-substitute designated in the deed of entail. The first branch of the destination in that case appears to me to bear a very strong resemblance to that now under consideration. In the immediately succeeding case of Schank, 1895, 22 R. 845, the words were "the heirs of entail who may in succession and for the time be in possession, or have right to be in possession, of the entailed estate of X, under and in virtue of the deed of entail." The ground of judgment was thus summarised by Lord Trayner: "It is the essential quality of the person claiming the liferent that he shall be in possession or be entitled to the possession of the entailed lands. The defender does not, and no other person now can, possess that quality, for the entail is no longer in existence." The recent decision in Mackenzie's Trs., 1907, S.C. 139,—a complicated case, involving scrutiny of a variety of documents,—seems to have turned ultimately upon a differentiation of the phrase "the heir entitled to succeed under the said deed of entail," occurring in a codicil,—from the language of the testator's principal deed, which was "the heir succeeding to "said estates under the said deed of entail." I was also referred to, but need not comment upon, the cases of Fenton Livingstone, 1899, 1 F. 831, and Davidson, 1906, 14 S.L.T. 337. For the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion that the claim for Captain Marindin must be repelled. At the date of the death of the last surviving liferentrix, neither he nor any one else could fulfil the condition—upon which, in my judgment, the right of succession depended—of being heir of entail in possession of Crombie and Craigflower.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Colville's Trustees v. Marindin and Others.

If this view is correct, it seems to follow that intestacy resulted. But a controversy is raised between the parties who claim to represent, on the one hand, Miss Blackburn's heir at law, and on the other hand, her heirs in mobilibus. The first of these claims is made by the trustees of Sir James William Colvile. They state that Miss Blackburn's heir in heritage at her decease was her nephew Andrew Wedderburn Colvile, who died in 1856, without having made up a title to the bond. On his death the right to make up title thereto passed to his son, Sir James William Colvile, who survived until 1880. His trustees maintain that, in virtue of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 94), sect. 9, a personal right to the bond vested in Sir James, and passed upon his death to them, under and in terms of his trust disposition and settlement. On the other hand, the fund in medio is claimed by the next of kin and representatives in mobilibus of Miss Blackburn. Their plea in law is that "the testatrix having postponed vesting of the fund in medio until the termination of the liferent, and the destination having then failed, the claimants, as her next of kin and heirs in mobilibus, are entitled to be ranked and preferred to said fund in terms of their claim." Of the opposing contentions thus raised I prefer the former. It is, I apprehend, settled law—at all events since the decision in Lord v. Colvin, 1865, 3 M. 1083—that in a case, as this is, of resulting intestacy, the heir must be looked for as at the time of the testator's death, and not as at the date when it became certain that none of the contingencies could happen, by the occurrence of which intestacy would have been prevented. Nor do I see any reason to doubt that the quality and character of the succession must be ascertained as at the date of the death of the testatrix. This view appears to me to be in accordance with the language of sect. 117 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 101), and the cases of Brown, 1870, 8 M. 439, and Cunningham, 1889, 17 R. 218. If that is so, I take it that the right to make up title to the bond, which was heritable at Miss Blackburn's death, passed to her heir at law; and that—unless the argument for Miss Kathleen Marindin, which I must presently notice, is well founded—the fee of the money is now vested in Sir James Colvile's trustees. Counsel for the next of kin referred me to a great number of authorities, amongst the best known of which are Ferguson, 1875, 2 R. 627; Maule, 1876, 3 R. 831; Cumstie, 1876, 3 R. 921; and Tristram, 1894, 22 R. 121. It is perhaps sufficient to say that none of these cases, nor the doctrine of fiduciary fee with which they are mainly concerned, appears to me to have any application to the present case; and that, even upon a contrary assumption, I do not understand how these claimants could take benefit from the application of the doctrine referred to. Subject, therefore, to the argument next to be considered, Sir James Colvile's trustees are, in my opinion, entitled to prevail in the competition.

I must now deal with the views submitted on behalf of Miss Kathleen Marindin. These are, as I shall afterwards point out, introduced into the case in a very singular manner; but they were made the subject of an able and earnest debate, which deserves attention, and is not unattended with difficulty. Miss Marindin is the person presently entitled to the free annual income of the estate of the late Eden Colvile, held by his trustees, the pursuers and real raisers, which includes the lands of Muirside. She has, therefore, an interest to maintain, as she does, that the bond in question has been extinguished confusione. The theory of her contention is that, on the death of the last liferentrix and the failure of a fiar, the bequest fell into intestacy of Miss Blackburn; that in 1874, when the Conveyancing Act, above referred to, became law, the rights of debtor and creditor respectively in the said bond concurred in the person of Sir James Colvile; and that confusion accordingly operated, at all events so as to extinguish the fee of the £4500 debt. As regards the debtor side of the matter, it is pointed out (I think fairly enough) that although in 1874 the entail of Muirside subsisted, and was not known to be invalid, it was truly so from the passing, and under the operation, of the Rutherfurd Act, particularly sect. 43 thereof, and that Sir James was, therefore, from his succession in 1856 onwards, de facto proprietor in fee simple of the lands. When, however, one comes to consider Sir James Colvile's position as creditor in the bond, the matter becomes more difficult. It is not easy to affirm that he was in the full right of credit, looking to the active subsistence of the liferents, and to the fact that at their termination there might have been an heir of entail in possession of Crombie and Craigflower other than Sir James himself. I know of no authority which governs this rather perplexing state of matters. It seems to me to be by no means clear that a right of credit of so contingent a kind is sufficient to invest its temporary holder with the character of creditor in a question of confusion. But, however that may be, I do not think, regarding the matter upon principle, that it would be possible to hold that the fee of this debt could be extinguished confusione in 1874, consistently with the right of the liferentrices to draw interest upon it, as they in fact did, for thirty years thereafter. It was maintained that Miss Blackburn could not legally or effectually make her bequest in the way she did; and that the liferentrices, in spite of their infeftment, had really no right to the interest of the money, at all events after 1874, when the fee was, according to the argument, extinguished by confusion. But these views, which were not supported by reference to authority, appear to me to be unsound. Miss Blackburn's mode of destination was unusual and inconvenient; but I do not think that it was illegal or ineffectual. I was referred to the case of Love, 1863, 2 M. 22, especially to certain dicta therein. Lord Neaves said (p. 31): "When any one is pleno jure the ultimate debtor and creditor in the same debt without relief, that situation in general amounts to confusion, and extinguishes the debt. It may be that other parties are interested in the debt, as where an heir-portioner, being the joint creditor in an heritable debt, succeeds as heir to the debtor, or vice versa. The result in that case is that the right is pro rata extinguished. It is difficult to see why a similar rule should not apply to a case of liferent and fee." The Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis), at p. 32, added: "I participate strongly in the doubts suggested by Lord Neaves, whether the right to this third" (of the bond) "was not extinguished confusione." I fully acknowledge the great weight which must attach to any words which fell from these eminent judges. The dicta, however, were purely obiter, and were doubted by Lords Cowan and Benholme (p. 30). Further, it is permissible to observe that the illustration of joint interest suggested by Lord Neaves appears to be very different in its nature from that of liferent and fee, and that his Lordship does not explain the effect of the application of the doctrine of confusio to the right of the liferenter. If the obligation for the payment of the principal has been finally extinguished, it is hard to see how the right of the liferenter, duly infeft, could possibly continue to subsist. It may also be noted that though the facts in Love v. Storie are not very clear from the report, there was in that case an existing fiar, definitely named, which so far distinguishes it from the present case. Upon the best consideration which I am able to give to the argument for Miss Marindin, I am of opinion that it fails, because it appears to me that her counsel cannot successfully maintain that Sir James Colvile was, in Lord Neaves' words, "pleno jure the ultimate debtor and creditor" in the debt in question. In my judgment, therefore, the claim of Sir James Colvile's trustees must be sustained, subject, of course, to their granting a valid discharge in favour of the real raisers. In these circumstances, it is not necessary to consider in what manner or to what extent it would have been possible, as the pleadings in this action stand, to give effect to the argument for Miss Marindin. The document (No. 16 of pro.) in which it is contained is certainly framed in a remarkable manner. It appears to be of a hybrid character. It is headed (inaccurately, as I think), "Objections to the Condescendence of the Fund in medio"; the principal pleas in law attached to it are directed to establish the incompetency of the action and the absence of double distress, upon the theory that confusion having operated, there is truly no fund in the hands of the real raisers; and it contains an "alternative" claim to be ranked and preferred to a portion of the fund in medio which ex hypothesi does not exist. This is not, in my judgment, a legitimate mode of pleading; but, as the suit is a friendly one, a way out of the difficulty might probably have been arrived at.—25*th May* 1907.

The pursuers were the owners of the steam lighter "Sealight," and in this action they claimed from the owners and master of the s.s. "Davaar" the sum of £500 as remuneration for salvage services and compensation for damages sustained by their vessel in rendering said services. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof.

The facts of the case as proved, and the contentions of the parties, sufficiently appear from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary, who gave decree in favour of the pursuers for the sum of £80.

Lord Salvesen.—On 23rd October 1906 the steamship "Davaar," belonging to the defenders, was on her usual coasting voyage to Campbeltown. She had just called at Saddel Bay, where the ferry boat had come out to meet her, when it was found that, through some unexplained reason, her rudder was lost. The master of the "Davaar" was first apprised of this occurrence by the boatman, who shouted out to him to let go his anchor. With the southerly wind which was then prevailing there was no safe anchorage in Saddel Bay; and accordingly the master set his engines full speed astern. The "Davaar" has a right-handed propeller, which implies that, when she is moving astern, she will proceed on a curve from starboard to port. I am prepared to hold on the evidence that this was a wise manœuvre, as the vessel's head was then pointing south-west, and the curve which she would necessarily make in moving astern would tend to bring her further from the land. According to the evidence of those on board, her engines were kept reversed full speed for about twenty minutes, at the end of which period she was a mile from the nearest shore, and was heading in a northerly direction.

A screw steamer without steering power cannot be navigated into port without assistance. The master of the "Davaar" realised this, and instructed the boatman at Saddel Bay at once to telegraph for a tug. Notwithstanding this precaution, as there was a strong southerly wind blowing and a choppy sea from the south, the master thought it desirable to obtain immediate assistance. Accordingly the usual signals of distress were hoisted, and several rockets discharged. These signals were observed by the "Sealight," a steam lighter belonging to the pursuers, which had shortly before left Campbeltown on a voyage up the Clyde, and she at once proceeded to the "Davaar's" assistance. The "Sealight" had no cargo on board, and was drawing four feet of water forward and eight feet aft; and, although more than a usually powerful ship of her class, was not adapted for towage purposes. On going alongside some conversation took place between the two masters, the upshot of which was that, at the "Davaar's" request, the "Sealight" undertook to tow her to Lochranza. A strong manilla hawser seven inches in diameter was passed on board; and the "Sealight" proceeded to tow the "Davaar" for a period of time variously estimated at from twenty minutes to three-quarters of an hour. At the end of that period the hawser suddenly parted, with the result that one of the bolts in the "Sealight's" engine snapped, and the "Sealight" was herself disabled. She accordingly proceeded under sail to Lochranza, where some temporary repairs were executed on her engines. The "Davaar" also hoisted sail; and in spite of the want of her rudder she was able after several hours to manœuvre into a safe anchorage near Port Cranaig, about four miles north of Saddel Bay. From this position she was assisted into port by the tugs that had been sent in response to the telegram already referred to.

In these somewhat peculiar circumstances the "Sealight" claims remuneration as for salvage services, and, if I could accept the evidence of her master and mate as to the respective positions of the "Davaar" at the beginning and end of the towage, she would, undoubtedly, be entitled to such remuneration. According to them the "Davaar" was lying with her head pointing to the south only 200 or 300 yards from a lee shore, and, but for the services of the "Sealight," would in all probability have drifted on to the rocky coast at Saddel Bay. They further state that, after towing for three-quarters of an hour, the "Sealight" left the "Davaar" with her head pointing to the north and well clear of the shore. The other two members of the crew of the "Sealight" were not examined; and the case therefore rests entirely on the evidence of the master and mate. It is absolutely contradicted by the officers and some of the passengers of the "Davaar," and also by two independent witnesses — the boatmen, who rowed after the "Davaar," and who had the best means of observing her position. According to these witnesses — whose evidence I accept — the "Davaar" was a mile or a mile and a quarter from the nearest land, and was in no immediate danger.

There is the same conflict as to what took place while the two vessels were connected by means of the hawser. On the one hand the officers and passengers on the "Davaar" say that the "Sealight" was quite unable to tow her, and that, in point of fact, the "Davaar" was not moved to any appreciable extent by the efforts of the "Sealight." On the other hand, the master and engineer of the "Sealight" say that the towage was proceeding satisfactorily until the hawser snapped. The real evidence appears to me all to be in favour of the latter view. "The "Sealight" is proved to have been capable of towing a larger vessel than the "Davaar" in calm water; and I am satisfied that, with the wind and the sea behind her, she could have brought the "Davaar" to Lochranza if no accident had occurred. No doubt the pace would have been a very slow one, probably not exceeding three knots an hour; for the light condition of the "Sealight" was against her rendering efficient service as a tug. That she did move the "Davaar" through the water is, I think, further proved by the fact that the "Davaar" sheered from side to side. In order to correct the sheer the master of the "Davaar," at least on one occasion, without warning to the tug, reversed his engines full speed astern; and I have no doubt that this was what caused the hawser to part. The exact time during which the "Sealight" continued to tow probably did not exceed half an hour, and during that time the "Davaar" was not, I think, towed more than from one to two knots; and her position, so far as danger was concerned, was practically the same as when she was first taken in tow. It is a condition of an award, as for salvage, that the services have contributed, in some degree, to the saving of property. In my judgment this cannot be affirmed of the services in the present case. The "Davaar" would have been in no worse position if she had never been taken in tow at all.

It does not, however, follow that the owners of the "Sealight" are not entitled to some remuneration for what they did, or at all events to compensation for the damage which they suffered. Had the "Davaar" been utterly lost, no such claim could have arisen, however serious the injuries which have been sustained by the vessel attempting to render salvage services. Here, however, the property was ultimately saved; and there is thus an ample fund out of which to award remuneration. I was referred to various authorities, of which that most in point is the "Melpomene," L.R. 1873, 4 Adm. and Ec. 129. In that case Sir Robert Phillimore said, "Where a vessel makes a signal of distress, and another goes out with the bona fide intention of assisting that distress, and, as far as she can, does so, and some accident occurs which prevents her services being as effectual as she intended them to be, and no blame attaches to her, she ought not to go wholly unrewarded." This carefully guarded proposition which the learned judge laid down as stating a principle for future guidance, appears to me to be consistent with good sense and equity; and I am prepared to follow it. It is admittedly applicable to the circumstances of the present case; and, accordingly, involves my allowing some remuneration to the "Sealight" for her services or attempted services. The case of the "Melpomene" appears not to have been followed by Mr Justice Butt in two cases—the "Cheerful," 11 P.D. 3, and the "Benlavig," 14 P.D. 3. In the latter case, however, the learned judge reached the same result by a somewhat different road; for he did award remuneration to a vessel for towing another, although the tug left the tow in a more dangerous position than she was in when she was taken in tow. The reasoning upon which he did so, however, is to my mind not satisfactory. He adopted the plaintiffs' alternative argument that they were entitled to be paid a reasonable sum for having fulfilled the contract entered into by them, namely, to attempt to tow the "Benlavig" to Gibraltar. On reading the facts of the case, there seems to have been no other kind of agreement to tow than what always takes place when an offer to salve is accepted by a ship in distress. Whether a port of destination is named or not, there is no contract except that implied in the services being accepted by the disabled ship involving—as such acceptance does—remuneration to the salvor in the event of the services proving ultimately successful. I accordingly prefer the principle on which Sir Robert Phillimore proceeded; but even if the alternative principle of Mr Justice Butt were sound, it is equally applicable here, for the "Sealight" contracted to attempt to tow the "Davaar" to Lochranza, just as much as the "Vester" contracted to attempt to tow the "Benlavig" to Gibraltar.

In considering the amount to be awarded, I think I am entitled to take into consideration the damage which the "Sealight" suffered. That she did sustain some damage is, I think, plain. The crank-bolt of the low-pressure engine was broken through; and this is an indication of the strain to which the engines of the "Sealight" must have been subjected. Some expense and delay occurred in getting the crank-bolt replaced, which could only be done at Greenock. The "Sealight" was surveyed in November by two engineers, Mr Nicol and Mr Cairns, who found that the crank-shaft was bent. It is, of course, possible that this was not the result of the accident, as the survey did not take place immediately after the vessel's arrival in Greenock, as it ought to have done; but the evidence of the engineer convinces me that this injury must have been coincident with the snapping of the bolt which disabled the engines. This was the only thing that was discovered in November; and although, according to the experts, the vessel should not have been continued in her service until the crank-shaft had been put right, she continued running until April, when the pursuers had her put on a slip and overhauled. Various other defects were then found to exist in the engines, which the pursuers attribute to the accident during the towage. I am not prepared to hold that those other defects were due to the accident. Indeed I think, as regards some of them, that it has been proved that they were of old standing; and practically what pursuers are attempting, in this case, is to get the engines, which had been running for twelve years, overhauled and repaired at the expense of the defenders. The materials for estimating the cost of repairing the bent crank-shaft and replacing the bolt have not been put before me in a satisfactory form. Sitting as a jury I estimate the cost of repairing the engines, so far as due to the accident during the attempted towage, at £20; and although the estimates of the pursuers' witnesses are much higher, I cannot see why these small repairs should not have been executed in five days, which, at £6 a day, would add £30 to the loss which the pursuers sustained. In addition, I think they are entitled to charge a survey fee of £10, 10s., and a slip fee of the same amount; making the total damage which they sustained, in their well-meant effort to tow the "Davaar," £71. I do not add to this anything by way of remuneration for the towage actually effected, as I think that was so inappreciable as scarcely to admit of having a pecuniary value attached to it. But it is fair to allow a small sum to cover the trouble to which the pursuers were necessarily put in having their vessel surveyed and repaired. I propose, accordingly, to find the pursuers entitled to a sum of £80 to compensate them for the damage which they sustained in attempting to tow the "Davaar" at her request.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

Ross & Marshall v. Owners and Master of S.S. "Davaar."

I may add that, apart from the principles that Sir Robert Phillimore laid down on which I propose to act, there is another ground on which the same results might well be reached, and that is, that the snapping of the hawser was due to negligent navigation on the part of the master of the "Davaar." I could understand him, if he wished to bring his ship into line with the tug, putting the engines slow astern; but I think it was unseamanlike, without any warning to the tug, to put them full speed astern, with the result that so great a strain was put on the manilla hawser as to snap it. The "Davaar" is a vessel whose engines are able to propel her at thirteen knots an hour; and it is obvious that, even when then they are going astern, they would move the vessel much more rapidly backwards than the "Sealight" was able to propel her forwards. I do not, however, attribute to the master of the "Davaar" the deliberate intention of snapping the rope, and so freeing himself from the "Sealight"; although I have an impression that he was not sorry to be quit of a tug which was likely to consume so long a time in the proposed towage to Lochranza.

Counsel for the pursuers thereafter moved the Lord Ordinary to grant a certificate in terms of sect. 547, sub-sect. 2, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which provides as follows:—

"Subject as aforesaid, disputes as to salvage shall be determined by the High Court in England or Ireland, or in Scotland the Court of Session; but if the claimant does not recover in such Court in Great Britain more than £300 . . . . he shall not be entitled to recover any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him in the prosecution of his claim, unless the Court before which the case is tried certify that the case is a fit one to be tried otherwise than summarily in manner provided by this Act. . . ."

The same section also provides that where a dispute is to be determined summarily in Scotland it shall be referred to and determined in the Sheriff Court.

The motion was opposed by the defenders, on the ground that the claim for salvage should not have been made in the Court of Session.

The cases of "The Fenix" (1855), Swa. 13, and Lawson v. Grangemouth Dockyard Co., 1888, 15 R. 753, were referred to in the debate.

The Lord Ordinary granted the certificate asked.

Lord Salvesen.—In my opinion this is a case where I ought to grant a certificate. I quite assent to the passage that has been quoted from Dr Lushington's opinion as regulating the matter in the ordinary case. But I think that the exceptions that he refers to apply—at all events one of them applies—to the present case. This was not an ordinary action of salvage in which the only question, or the main question, between the parties was the one of amount. It was a case of a very peculiar nature, which involved a question of law that has not hitherto come up for consideration in the Courts in Scotland. Now that, I think, makes this case a special case, and, without saying that there may not be various other reasons on which a certificate might be granted, some of which might apply here—as, for instance, the fact that there was a very great conflict of testimony, and therefore a difficult question of fact to solve—I think it is sufficient to say that I grant the certificate because the action involved a legal question which made the case one eminently suited for the Supreme Court, and not at all suited for decision by the summary tribunal which is the only alternative that the statute provides. I shall accordingly grant a certificate in terms of sect. 547, sub-sect. 2, of the Merchant Shipping Act.—21*st May* 1907.

II. Reparation — Master and Servant — Limited Company—Liability of Company at Common Law for Breach of Ordinary Duties of Master: (a) Plant in Disrepair; (b) Vicious Horse.

This was an action of damages at common law and under the Employers' Liability Act at the instance of a vanman against a limited company. The injuries complained of were sustained through one of the defenders' horses having bolted while being driven by the pursuer. The pursuer averred: "The pursuer's injuries were due to the fault of the defenders in respect that they carelessly and negligently supplied a horse which was inherently vicious. . . . Said horse was well known to the defenders, who personally superintended their said business, to be of a vicious and dangerous character.

The pursuer proposed an issue with damages scheduled under the Act and at common law. The defenders argued that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue under the Act in respect he was not a workman thereunder, and was not entitled to an issue at common law in respect that there was no averment of personal fault (Yarmouth v. France, 1887, 19 Q.B.D. 647; Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Company, 1887, 18 Q.B.D. 683; Morgan v. London General Omnibus Company, 1884, 13 Q.B.D. 832; Bound v. Lawrence [1892], 1 Q.B. 226; Smith v. Associated Omnibus Co. Ltd., 1907, 23 T.L.R. 381).

The Lord Ordinary approved of the issue.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of opinion that the pursuer has stated a relevant case under the Employers' Liability Act 1880. It was not disputed that the averments in Cond. 4 are relevant to infer liability under the statute if the pursuer was engaged in an employment to which the Employers' Liability Act applies. The pursuer describes himself as a vanman, and states that on the day the accident occurred he was ordered by his foreman to take charge of one of the defenders' horses and to deliver some furniture in one of their vans. That, in my opinion, is a sufficient averment. It may or may not turn out, after the evidence has been led, that the pursuer is a workman within the meaning of sect. 8 of the Employers' Liability Act and sect. 10 of the Employer and Workmen Act of 1875. The averment is such, however, that facts may well be established under it which will bring the case within the principle of the decision in Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q.B.D. p. 647.

The case sought to be made at common law creates more difficulty. An employer is not liable at common law if he takes due care to engage competent servants, to supply sufficient plant, and to ensure a proper system of working. It is here alleged that the defenders supplied insufficient plant in so far as (1) the toe-board for the driver's seat on the van was broken and defective, and (2) that the horse was inherently vicious.

I do not think the averments as regards the toe-board amount to failure to supply sufficient plant. They appear to me to mean that the plant, though originally sufficient, was allowed to get out of order and was not repaired. The duty of looking after this part of the plant was, however, a matter that the defenders were quite entitled to delegate to a servant, and fault on the part of their servant in regard to such a matter, though it may infer liability under the Act, cannot do so at common law.

The case as regards the horse appears to me to be different. The horse was part of the defenders' plant. If the defenders supplied a vicious horse, then they failed to provide sufficient plant. Inasmuch, however, as no employer guarantees his plant to be sufficient, they will only be liable if the insufficient plant was supplied owing to negligence. One of the pursuer's averments in Cond. 3 I have difficulty in following. It is this: "Said horse was well known to the defenders, who personally superintend their business, to be of a vicious and dangerous character." When one looks to see who the defenders are it appears they are Thomas's Limited, described as an incorporated company. The pursuer, however, goes on to say defenders were careless and negligent in supplying such a horse for the purposes of their trade. The fact that the defenders are a company will of course not put them in a better position than if the defender was an individual. If the fault was in regard to a matter which an individual employer was bound personally to look after, the employer will be liable at common law though the fault was the fault of an employee. No employer can delegate what is part of his duty as master. Illustrations of this are contained in the cases of Macdonald v. Wyllie & Son, 1898, 1 F. 339; M'Mullen v. Newhouse Coal Co., 1896, 23 R. 759; and the principle is enunciated in Wright v. Dunlop & Co. Ltd., 1893, 20 R. 363. Therefore, in my opinion, if there was a failure to provide sufficient plant, and this was due to negligence, albeit the negligence of an employee, the defenders will be liable at common law.

I am accordingly of opinion that the proposed issue should be approved.—28*th May* 1907.

subject to delusions as to the action of his relatives regarding the marriage, and as to occurrences at the brick works where he was employed as an engineman to within a week of the marriage, and again a few days after it. That after the marriage the defender behaved in a wild and excited manner, thought he was being poisoned, and threatened to commit suicide. That before the marriage the defender's conduct had been so peculiar that he was often spoken of as "daft." That nineteen days after the marriage—that is, on 11th April 1894—the defender absconded, and when caught was taken to Larbert Asylum on 29th May 1894, where he has ever since been confined as a dangerous lunatic. That the marriage had never been consummated.

The Lord Ordinary granted decree as craved.

Lord Guthrie.—The pursuer seeks declarator of nullity of the marriage between her and the defender celebrated on 23rd March 1894, on the ground that at the time the defender was insane and incapable of understanding the nature of marriage and of giving his consent thereto. The defender was certified insane on 11th April 1894—that is, nineteen days after marriage. He absconded, and when caught was taken to Larbert Asylum on 29th May 1894, where he has been ever since as a dangerous lunatic—his mental condition being pronounced hopeless. I think the pursuer has made out her case. Whether it would have been sufficient to establish insanity of any kind at the time of marriage, or whether it is not also necessary to show absence of consent in the sense of incapacity to understand the nature and effect of the contract of marriage, I do not require to consider. The defender is proved, in my opinion, not only to have shewn the ordinary symptoms of insanity immediately prior to the marriage—delusions, loss of self-control, perverted affections and threatened suicide; but it is sufficiently proved that the result of his mental condition was to render him incapable of a rational comprehension of or consent to the contract into which he was entering. I therefore grant decree.—28*th May* 1907.

20. The Accountant of Court.

JUDICIAL FACTOR—JUDICIAL FACTORS (SCOTLAND) ACT 1880 (43 & 44 VICT. CAP. 4), SECT. 4, SUB-SECT. 7—RULE OF COURT—FACTORS APPOINTED BY SHERIFFS IN COMMISSARY COURTS FOR PURPOSE OF CONFIRMING TO ESTATES OF INTESTATES WHO HAVE LEFT NO REPRESENTATIVES, OR WHOSE REPRESENTATIVES ARE IN MINORITY, ARE SUBJECT TO ACCOUNTANT OF COURT.

This was a report by the Accountant of Court for a rule under the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1880, sect. 4 (7), which provides as follows:—

"It shall be the duty of the Accountant, when it appears to him that there is a diversity of judgment or practice in proceedings in judicial factories in the Sheriff Courts which it would be important to put an end to, to report the same to the First Division of the Court of Session, specifying the proceedings in which such diversity appeared, and asking for a rule to be laid down to secure uniformity of judgment or practice in such proceedings, and the Court shall consider such report, and if they shall see fit, shall lay down such a rule accordingly, which rule the several Sheriffs and their Substitutes shall be bound to observe."

The report set forth, inter alia:—

The Accountant of Court begs to report that in 1896 he first became aware, through a special remit by Sheriff Thoms, that, throughout the sheriffdoms, appointments of judicial factors were made which were not reported to him, and had not therefore come under his supervision.

These were appointments made in the Commissary Courts for the purpose of confirming to the estates of intestate persons who had left no representatives, or whose children were in minority.

After getting an opinion from the then Solicitor-General that these appointments fell under his supervision, the Accountant called upon the Sheriff Clerks to intimate all such appointments to him. This order was complied with, and there have been reported to date 148 such appointments (78 of which came from Glasgow). These have been annually supervised by the Accountant, and in several cases discharges granted at close on Report by him in the usual way.

In the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, Alexander Rankine was in February 1902 appointed "factor for Christina M'Intyre, who is in minority, and John M'Intyre, Helen M'Intyre, and Duncan M'Intyre, who are in pupillarity." This was duly intimated to the Accountant. An inventory was lodged, and annual accounts subsequently audited up to 5th September 1906, when the estate was exhausted.

In November 1906 the usual petition for discharge was presented, which was refused by the Sheriff, on the ground that it was an application as executor-dative and not as factor.

In the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, John Meikle was in June 1903 appointed factor for Catherine Meikle, James Meikle, and John Meikle, children of the deceased James Meikle, mason, Glasgow. An inventory and annual accounts were duly lodged.

In November 1906, the cautioner having died, the Accountant issued a requisition to find new caution, and he received a letter from the factor that the Sheriff-Clerk declined to issue a new bond of caution "in respect he held the Accountant had no right of supervision over factories of this nature."

In the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Forfar, George G. Milne, grain merchant, Montrose, was in September 1898 appointed factor for the two pupil sons of the deceased Mrs Jane Mitchell, Montrose. An inventory and accounts were duly lodged, and the factor lodged with the Accountant a note for Special Powers. On the Accountant's report being laid before the Sheriff, he found "that it was incompetent to grant the authority craved, and refused the crave of the note."

In the Sheriff Courts of Aberdeenshire, Ayrshire, etc., no such questions have been raised, and accounts are lodged and discharges granted in the usual way.

There being thus diversity of judgment and practice in proceeding in regard to these judicial factors, the Accountant craves your Lordships, in terms of sect 4, sub-sect. 7, of the Judicial Factors Act 1880, for a rule deciding whether factors appointed under these conditions fall under his supervision.

Sect. 6 of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1889, is as follows:—

"In addition to the factors specified in the recited Act of 1849, the Accountant shall superintend the conduct of all other factors and persons already appointed or to be appointed by the Court of Session, or any of the Lords Ordinary in the said Court, or by any of the Sheriffs or Sheriff-Substitutes in the several Sheriff Courts in Scotland, to hold, administer, or protect any property or funds belonging to persons or estates in Scotland; and all such factors and others shall be and hereby are made subject to the provisions affecting judicial factors of the said recited Act of 1849, and of any Acts amending the same, or in terms of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1880, and of any Acts of Sederunt made in terms of said Acts; and the Accountant shall see that they duly observe all rules and regulations affecting them for the time: provided that nothing in this section contained shall be held to apply to executors-dative. . . ."

Counsel for the reporter referred to the following authorities:—Alexander's Practice of Commissary Courts, p. 54; Johnstone v. Lowden, 1838, 16 S. 541; Johnstone's Exr. v. Dobie, 1907, S.C. 31; Accountant of Court, 1893, 20 R. 571.

The Court issued the following interlocutor:—

"The Lords of Council and Session (First Division), in pursuance of the powers vested in them by sect. 4, sub-sect. 7, of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1880, upon a Report made to them by the Accountant of Court, boxed on 16th March 1907, direct and appoint that Factors appointed by Sheriffs or Sheriff-Substitutes for the purpose of confirming to the estates of intestate persons who have left no representative, or whose representatives are in pupillarity or minority, shall fall under the supervision of the Accountant of Court, and shall be subject to the provisions of sect. 6 of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1889."

The Lord President.—This is a report by the Accountant of Court made in terms of sect. 4, sub-sect. 7, of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1880, asking the Court to lay down a rule to ensure a similarity of practice in the various sheriff courts in a matter pertaining to judicial factors; and the question in controversy which has been raised in practice is, whether the judicial factors who are appointed in the sheriff courts, sitting as Commissary Courts, with a view to taking the position of executor-dative on the estates which fall to minors, are, or are not, subject to the jurisdiction of the Accountant of Court.

I need scarcely remind your Lordships that though the practice of appointing factors is partially statutory, and partially also a common law practice, the question of the jurisdiction of the Accountant of Court is here a statutory matter, for he is an official created with certain duties, and his duties are laid down in the statute; and the matter comes finally to be nothing more or less than simply what is the proper construction of the 6th section of the Factors (Scotland) Act 1889. That section is in these terms: "In addition to the factors specified in the recited Act of 1849, the Accountant shall superintend the conduct of all other factors and persons already appointed or to be appointed by the Court of Session, or any of the Lords Ordinary in the said Court, or by any of the Sheriffs or Sheriff-Substitutes in the several Sheriff Courts in Scotland," and all such persons are made subject to the provisions applying to judicial factors; and then comes a proviso providing "that nothing in this section contained shall be held to apply to executors-dative."

The learned Sheriff-Substitutes who have held that such factors as I have mentioned are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Accountant of Court have gone on somewhat different views; both of them have expressed a doubt whether a factor of this sort falls within the category of the persons recited in sect. 6, and one of them, whether or not that may be so, thinks that this class of factors falls clearly within the proviso in sect. 6. Now it is material to notice that this is evidently an attempt of the Legislature to solve still further than was solved in 1849 the whole question of Quis custodiet ipsos custodes, and so far as one may take the import of the section concerned, I think there is evinced a desire that factors in general should be put under the very salutary jurisdiction of the Accountant of Court. The factors here in question are certainly factors, and they are certainly appointed by the Sheriff or Sheriff-Substitute, and the only point is whether they are appointed in the Sheriff Court in Scotland. I have no doubt these factors are appointed in the Sheriff Court, because before 1880 the jurisdiction of the Commissary Court in Scotland had been transferred to the Sheriff Court. The next point for consideration is whether such an appointment of a judicial factor in the Sheriff Court, with a view to his becoming executor, falls within the proviso "that nothing in this section contained shall be held to apply to executors-dative"; and the first thing I ask myself is, Why was that proviso put in? Owing to the wide terms of the principal clause, which is not limited to factors, I do not think the answer is doubtful. If the first clause had only said "factors," there would have been no necessity to put this in. But the clause is not limited to "factors," but goes on to specify "any person appointed to protect any property or funds situated in Scotland." Now that is such very wide language that it might have been supposed to pull in executors-dative. Executors-dative are persons appointed to protect and administer property, and therefore the proviso was put in for the very good reason, pointed out by Lord M'Laren, that there is not the same reason to supervise an executor-dative as a factor, because the executor-dative is looking after his own interests, and is there as a person connected with the estate. When, however, you come to factors appointed to take the position of executors-dative to minors, there is great reason for subjecting them to the scrutiny of the Accountant of Court. The factors in question may have to administer for many years, and there is just the same reason for subjecting them as any other factor to the scrutiny of the Court. There is always a bond of caution in one case as in the other, but years may go and the cautioner may die and in the end it may be found that the factor has not been administering the estate as he ought. It was to check that that the whole system of supervision by the Accountant of Court was devised, and the underlying reason is as strong in the one case as in the other.

I therefore come clearly to the opinion that the fact that the person who is a factor afterwards becomes executor-dative does not make any difference, and that the fact that he is appointed as executor-dative does not take away the generality that as a factor he is under the jurisdiction of the Accountant of Court.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion, and think that the learned Sheriffs who have taken a different view have failed to observe the very obvious distinction between persons decerned and confirmed executor-dative in their own rights, and persons so confirmed merely as factor for pupils or minors. If that distinction is kept in view, then I think the construction of the statute your Lordship has explained becomes perfectly reasonable. There can be no reason to suppose that the Legislature intended to deprive pupils or minors of the protection of a factor which is given to others.

Lord Pearson.—I concur.—16*th May* 1907.

21. Krupp and Another v. John Menzies Limited.

Evidence—Written Contract—Alleged Clerical Error—Document Explicit and Unambiguous — Proof of Averments of Clerical Error Allowed.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 12.)

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

The facts of the case appear from the prv ious report.

The defenders reclaimed.

The Reclaiming Note was put out for hearing on 24th January 1907. During the course of the hearing, the Court, at the request of counsel for the reclaimers, postponed the hearing to allow the reclaimers to put in a Minute of Amendment. Counsel for the reclaimers were subsequently permitted to amend on payment of £21 of expenses.

The Record as amended contained the following averments by the defenders, inter alia :—

The agreement is referred to. Explained that the words "one-fifth part" were inserted in the agreement by a clerical error instead of the words "five per cent.," and that the pursuers are well aware of this fact. On or about 1st October 1900 the pursuers had a meeting with the defenders' managing director and law agent at the office of the latter in Edinburgh. At this meeting terms were discussed for a proposed agreement between the pursuers and defenders relating to the appointment of the pursuers as manager and housekeeper respectively of the defenders' new hotel, which was shortly to be opened at Mallaig, for which posts the pursuers had already applied to the defenders. The conditions of service were fully explained and detailed to the pursuers at the said meeting. These conditions were similar to those in the existing agreement between the defenders and Mr Rusterholz, the manager of the Palace Hotel, Inverness, and his wife. The said hotel also belongs to the defenders, and the pursuers were already familiar with the conditions in the said agreement. The conditions explained to the pursuers at the said meeting were agreed to by them. As regards salary, the same salary as was paid to Mr Rusterholz and his wife, viz., £200 per annum, was offered to and was accepted by the pursuers. As regards a share of profits, it was explained to the pursuers that Mr Rusterholz received a bonus of 10 per cent. One-half of such bonus, viz., £5 per cent. of the net annual profits of the business of the hotel, was offered to the pursuers, and this they agreed to accept. The smaller rate was fixed because of the larger earning capacity of the Mallaig business through the liquor turnover during the winter months. It was further arranged that the defenders' law agent should prepare and send the pursuers a draft of the agreement. On or about 13th October 1900 the defenders' law agent had a meeting with the pursuer Mr Krupp at Banavie Hotel, Inverness-shire, which also belongs to the defenders. At that meeting the pursuer Mr Krupp requested the defenders' law agent to allocate in the agreement one-half of the salary of £200 agreed upon to him, and the other half to the pursuer Mrs Krupp. To this the defenders' law agent agreed on behalf of the defenders. The defenders' law agent, on returning to town, proceeded to have the draft agreement framed on the terms arranged. The only changes which fell to be made on the draft agreement, as compared with the agreement with Mr Rusterholz and his wife, were (1) the allocation of one-half of the salary to each of the pursuers; (2) the substitution of 5 per cent. of the annual profits instead of 10 per cent. "Ten per cent." in the agreement with Mr Rusterholz was expressed as "one-tenth part of the net annual profits." A clerk was directed to draft the agreement on that footing. He was provided with the agreement with Mr Rusterholz for his assistance, and was directed to give effect to the alterations aforesaid, his instructions being as regards the share of profits to give half the share received by Mr Rusterholz under his agreement to the pursuers under theirs. The said clerk by inadvertence inserted the words "one-fifth part" instead of the words "five per cent.," or its equivalent "one-twentieth part," being an erroneous calculation on his part of one-half of a tenth.

The case was put out for further hearing on 16th May 1907, when the following authorities were referred to:—Dickson on Evidence, Vol. II., 1041; Taylor on Evidence, 1140; Carricks v. Saunders, 1850, 12 D. 812; Glasgow Feuing and Building Co. Ltd. v. Watson's Trs., 1887, 14 R. 610; Stewart's Trs. v. Hart, 1875, 3 R. 192; Marquess of Queensberry v. Scottish Union Insurance Co., 1839, 1 D. 1203, affid. 1 Bell's App. 183; Harris v. Pepperell, 1867, 5 Eq. 1; Manser v. Bach, 1848, 6 Hare 443; Garrard v. Frankel, 1862, 30 Beavan 445.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof before answer of their respective averments, the defenders to lead in the proof, and to proceed.

The Lord President.—My Lords, I quite agree with the words of Lord President Boyle in the case of Carricks v. Saunders, 12 D. 812, which has been cited to us, that it is a very delicate matter to interfere with a written contract expressed in clear terms, and that parole proof should not be rashly allowed in such a case. But there are cases in which it would be truly a disgrace to any system of jurisprudence if there was no way available of rectifying what would otherwise be a gross injustice. I do not prejudge this case, but take it on the averments of the defenders. According to these averments, the pursuers, Mr and Mrs Krupp, were by their contract, in addition to a cumulo salary of £200 per annum, to receive a proportion of the net profits earned by the hotel at Mallaig which they were to manage for the defenders, viz. 5 per cent. This condition was similar to that in an agreement existing between the manager of the Palace Hotel, Inverness, and the defenders, save that in the case of Inverness the proportion of profits coming to the manager was 10 per cent. This difference was explained to the pursuer as being based on the fact that the gross receipts at Mallaig were larger. The Inverness agreement was given to a clerk, that from it he might draft the agreement with the pursuers, and he was instructed to follow the Inverness agreement, but to halve the percentage of the profits. This clerk somewhat carelessly miscalculated one-fifth as a half of 10 per cent., and inserted that figure in the agreement between the pursuers and the defenders, in place of 5 per cent.

The error remained undiscovered by either party, and the pursuers received a share of the profits on a 5 per cent. basis until the parties eventually quarrelled as to the amount due. Then the pursuers demanded a settlement on the basis of 20 per cent. or one-fifth of the net profit as the proportion allotted to them under the agreement. My Lords, this case seems to me to have nothing to do with the avoidance or re-formation of the contract. The only question is whether proof is admissible that a document, which in ordinary circumstances would be held to express the intentions of the parties, does not in fact do so.

I am clearly of opinion that proof should be allowed.

Lord M'Laren.—It may be kept in view that it is a condition of the pursuers' case that neither party was under error as to the terms of the contract intended. That being so, we are not at all in the region of rescinding or re-forming a written contract where one of the parties has been led into error by the fault or negligence of the other party.

What it is proposed to prove is that the fraction, one-fifth was inserted in the agreement in place of 5 per cent., the true quantity. This was either a clerical or an arithmetical error, and is prima facie subject to correction. We know, for example, that a misnomer is always subject to correction, for on proof of the true name of the person or thing, effect is always given to that proof. Then in deeds of conveyance arithmetical errors are subject to correction when it appears on the face of the deed that they are arithmetical errors. In such cases we do not vary the terms of the contract at all, but merely seek to give expression to the true contract as agreed to by the parties.

While I have a strong opinion that such a power of correction is inherent in the Supreme Court, the first step in the operation evidently is to ascertain the facts of the case and the considerations raised by these facts. I concur with your Lordship that proof should be allowed.

Ship — Charter-party — Construction—Ship "Expected Ready to Load" About Certain Date — Obligation to Proceed Thereafter to Port of Lading "With All Convenient Speed"—Subsequent Charter-parties Entered Into by Shipowners Preventing Fulfilment of Obligation—Cancellation Clause—Breach of Contract—Damages.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

This was an action at the instance of Thomas Nelson & Sons, publishers, Edinburgh, against the Dundee East Coast Shipping Co. Ltd., for damages for breach of a contract contained in a charter-party entered into between the parties, by failure to provide a ship by the day stipulated. The terms of the charter-party sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord President.

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary. In the course of cross-examination, David Nicol, one of the defenders, made the following admissions:—

"The charter was of the 'Alice,' with an option entitling us to substitute the 'Douglas.' It was expected to be ready to load about the 3rd of March. Q. Two days afterwards, didn't you charter the 'Alice' to carry potatoes from Dundee to Penzance? A. Yes. Q. Expected ready on Tuesday 7th March? A. Yes. Q. That charter made it impossible for the 'Alice' to fulfil the charter with the Nelsons? A. Yes. We chartered the 'Douglas' on 2nd March, due to load on the 7th from the Tees to Chatham. Q. That made it impossible for the 'Douglas' to fulfil the charter with the Messrs Nelson? A. Yes. Before concluding that charter we telephoned to Messrs Cairns about when Messrs Nelson would be ready to load, and they said the cargo would not be ready for shipment before the 9th or 10th of March. Q. Having got that information, that the bargain with you and Messrs Nelson was to load on the 9th or 10th, you at once chartered the 'Douglas' in such a way as to make it impossible that she could load the cargo? A. No, she would be down on the 13th. Q. That is not the 9th or 10th. A. We gave no guarantee that she would be there before the 9th or 10th.

"By the Court.—Q. Did you enter into a charter as regards the 'Douglas' which made it impossible for her to be there on the 9th or 10th of March? A. Yes."

The circumstances of the case otherwise sufficiently appear from the Opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President.

The Lord Ordinary decerned against the defenders, and assessed the damages at £33, 3s. 2d.

Lord Ardwall.—This is an action of damages for breach of a contract of charter-party entered into between the pursuers of the one part, and Messrs R. Cairns & Co. as agents for the defenders, of the other part.

It will assist in construing the charter-party to advert to the circumstances under which it was entered into.

In February 1905 the pursuers, in view of the facts that they were in course of printing and publishing a new encyclopædia in conjunction with Messrs Harmsworth, of London, which was a work of an important character, and was expected to have a large sale, and that they had other material to send to London from time to time, thought that they would try what is called in the evidence the "experiment" of sending these goods by a small steam vessel chartered for the purpose. They accordingly applied to Messrs R. Cairns & Co., shipbrokers in Leith, to furnish them with a vessel. The negotiations were carried out to a certain extent by telephone, and on 14th February 1905 Messrs R. Cairns & Co. made an offer of a "steamer 230 deadweight, loading 3/10 March, for £90, for cargo of paper in bales, Leith to London, cargo to be loaded in two days and discharged in two days." The pursuers on 15th February accepted the offer, and this passage occurs in their letter: "We hereby accept your offer of steamer to carry 230 tons, loading March 9th and 10th, and discharging in two days in port of London." The said letter further said: "It must be clearly understood that the ship must be put in a suitable condition for receiving a cargo of printed paper," and on 16th February (for it seems that the 16th is the proper date and not the 15th as in the document itself) the charter-party of which No. 6 of process is a copy was executed by the parties. Referring to that document, it is to be noticed in the first place that the vessel is stated to be expected to be ready to load about the 3rd March 1905, the words "3rd March 1905" being in writing. Further down the charter-party, and forming part of the printed form, this clause occurs: "In the event of misrepresentation regarding steamer's size or position or of any mishap entailing delay in arrival at port of loading beyond seven days of her expected readiness, charterers to have the option of cancelling this charter." I have no doubt, reading these two passages together, that on a sound construction of the charter-party, it provides for the vessel being at Leith (which, in another part of the charter-party is stipulated as the port of loading) at latest on the 10th of March. I have little doubt that the 3rd of March was written in as the expected date of readiness with the view of bringing the period of seven days in the printed clause, already quoted, to an end by the 10th of March. This is just what might have been expected after Messrs Cairns had received Messrs Nelson's letter, stating that the loading would take place on the 9th and 10th of March. A cancellation clause of the kind above quoted is frequently inserted in charter-parties in order to entitle a charterer, without fear of future questions, to cancel the contract on the occurrence of a specified event, whatever the cause of that event happening might have been, so as to prevent all questions afterwards arising as to his right to cancel, or his possible liability for damage for improperly cancelling the contract. But the clause has also this importance in the present case, that I think it makes it plain that the 10th of March was to be the latest date on which the steamer was to be put at the disposal of the charterers. The clause does not appear to me to derogate from the right of the pursuers to claim damages on account of the vessel not being forward by the 10th March, because what usually follows on the cancellation of a contract when either party has a right to cancel, is that the party cancelling has his full right to claim such damage as he may sustain in consequence of the contract being cancelled, it being, of course, his duty to diminish that damage as much as possible. Apart from the terms of the charter-party, I think it clear that the parties, in point of fact, knew well enough that what was in contemplation was loading on the 9th and 10th of March, and that it was important that the goods should be in London in time (see Messrs Cairns' letter to the pursuers, of 24th February 1905), and there seems little doubt, upon the evidence, that Messrs Cairns & Co., with whom alone the pursuers transacted, knew that the pursuers, for business reasons, required the cargo to be in London on Monday the 13th of March. It is explained very fully in the evidence both of Mr Rintoul and Mr George M. Brown how important it was that the first number of the Encyclopædia should arrive in London by that day, and how very anxious they were that no risks should be run regarding that number being in the hands of all retail dealers by the promised day of publication.

The steamship chartered under the charter-party was called the "Alice," and this clause was added—"That the owners have the option of substituting the s.s. 'Douglas' (sister ship)," and, as above explained, in my view the contract between the parties, as contained in the charter-party, was that one or other of these vessels should be placed at the disposal of the pursuers for loading not later than the morning of the 10th of March, and I think I may add that it was within the contemplation of the parties, if not so expressed or implied in the charter-party, that she should be so placed on the morning of Thursday, March 9th. There can be no doubt that this contract was broken, whichever of these days is taken. On 25th February the pursuers notified Messrs Cairns that they would be ready to load either of the vessels, beginning on the morning of Thursday 9th March, and on 8th March the pursuers telegraphed to Messrs Cairns to ask the earliest date when the "Alice" or "Douglas" could load at Leith. To this, upon 8th March, Messrs Cairns replied that the "Douglas" was expected to be ready at Leith on Wednesday the 14th, or Thursday the 15th March, the "Alice" about the 20th of March, and then they went on to say that another vessel, the "Marion," might now be ready at Leith on Saturday 11th March at noon. It appears from the evidence of the defenders themselves that, having apparently got offers of various other voyages for the "Alice" and "Douglas," they paid no attention to having either of these vessels at Leith on the 9th or 10th of March. The "Alice" was at Dundee on the 7th of March, but had to undergo repairs, and did not leave Dundee until the 11th of March, and apparently by this time the defenders had chartered her to take a cargo of potatoes to Penzance, but in no view could she have been at Leith before the 13th. With regard to the "Douglas," she arrived in Dundee on the 28th of February, and in order to fill up time she was sent with a cargo of potatoes to Wisbech, and then the defenders took a charter-party from Stockton-on-Tees to Chatham, so that neither of these vessels was ever even tendered to the pursuers on or before the 10th of March. There is accordingly no doubt in my mind that the contract was broken, but it is said that the defenders tendered the pursuers the "Marion." If the pursuers had accepted that vessel, there would have been a new contract, and the pursuers were not bound to enter into such. On 9th March, however, the pursuers wrote the Messrs Cairns that they must send some of their goods by one of the regular steamers from Granton to London, and hoped that they may be able to accept their suggestion to send the remainder of the goods by the "Marion." But on the same day Messrs Cairns wrote, saying that the defenders had written to them, stating that they "would only put in 'Marion,' provided free of any stipulation or condition as to payment of difference of freight, etc., on parcel to be sent by liner, and later state that they are now fixing vessel for other business, in view of the position you have taken up." I am of opinion that this was not an offer which the pursuers were bound to accept, as in my view they were entitled, upon neither of the chartered vessels being forward on the 10th, to ship the goods that required to be in London on Monday by a liner, and to charge the extra expense against the defenders. Curiously enough, the pursuers afterwards chartered the "Marion" from a broker other than Cairns, and, as it turned out, she did not arrive in Leith till Saturday the 11th of March at 6 a.m., started loading the pursuers' cargo on Tuesday the 14th of March, but, owing to bad weather, did not reach London till Saturday, the 18th March, at 10.15 p.m., and did not get the discharge of her cargo finished till Monday the 20th of March at 5 p.m. It is suggested, however, that if the pursuers had accepted the offer of the "Marion" at once from the defenders through Messrs Cairns, they might have got her off by the morning of Sunday the 12th, so as to reach London on the 14th; but I may observe that this is only hypothetical, and I do not think it relevant, for the reason I have already stated, that the offer of the "Marion" was made subject to a condition which the pursuers were entitled to reject. The defence stated in Article 4, that the "Marion" was ultimately chartered on the footing that no claims were to be made in respect of the breach of charter of the "Alice" and "Douglas," is disproved. The pursuers in that matter were not represented by Messrs Henry & Macgregor as their agents; on the contrary, they chartered the vessel from them as principals, and paid them a higher rate than the defenders had charged to Henry & Macgregor. I make no comment upon the position of the latter firm in the matter, as it does not concern the present question.

Thomas Nelson & Sons v. The Dundee East Coast Shipping Co. Ltd.

The defenders having failed to put either the "Alice" or the "Douglas" at the pursuers' disposal on 10th March, and it being perfectly evident, from the information communicated to the pursuers by the Messrs Cairns, that neither of these vessels could be at Leith in time to carry the pursuers' cargo to London by the time required, they formally intimated to Messrs Cairns, on the 10th of March, that, as they had failed to provide a steamer in terms of the charter-party, they had been forced to make other arrangements, and held them liable in damages. That the pursuers had a right to cancel the contract as they did by this letter is, as I have said, clear from the charter-party; and the next question is, What damages are due? With regard to that matter, I am of opinion that the pursuers were entitled, in the circumstances, to send the first consignment of the Encyclopædia to London by the Granton steamer, so as to be sure of its arriving on Monday the 13th. I do not think they were bound to run any risk with regard to this consignment. If they had, and more damage had followed, it might have been a much more serious matter for the defenders, and I may refer to the case recently decided in the House of Lords (Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison, L.R. 1905, A.C. 515) as an illustration of the nature of the damages that may be incurred in consequence of a breach of a charter-party.

The Defenders reclaimed, and argued: The breach of contract of which the reclaimers were accused was that of failing to provide a vessel by 10th March. But the charter-party imposed no obligation to provide a ship by the 10th, and was drawn up on the assumption that no ship might be ready on that date. The cancellation clause was the important clause in the charter-party. Its effect was not to give a warranty that a ship would be ready on the 10th, but simply to give the respondents a right to cancel the contract if no ship was ready. The respondents exercised the right to cancel, and that was an end of the matter and no right to damages emerged (Buttercase and Geddie's Trs. v. Geddie, 1897, 24 R. 1128; Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons & Co. [1893], 2 Q.B. 274).

Argued for Respondents: The obligation undertaken in the charter-party was to "sail and proceed with all convenient speed" after the ship was ready, which was expected to be on 3rd March. The cancellation clause applied only to the case of "mishap," e.g. weather, preventing the ship being ready by 10th March. The breach of contract consisted in the reclaimers by their own act having made it impossible to fulfil the obligation in the charter-party. It was not a question of the cancellation clause at all, as it was not a "mishap" but a deliberate act. The construction of the charter-party for which the reclaimers contended amounted to this, that they should provide a vessel or not just as suited them best.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—My Lords, this is an action of damages for breach of a contract of charter-party entered into between the pursuers, who are a firm of publishers in Edinburgh, and a firm of shipowners in Dundee, and the question turns on the true meaning of the charter-party. That charter-party provides: "It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs R. Cairns & Co., Leith, agents of the s.s. 'Alice' . . . . now trading and expected ready to load about 3rd March 1905, and T. Nelson & Sons, Parkside Works, Edinburgh, freighters, that the said ship . . . . shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to a customary loading berth or berths as ordered at Leith," and there load a cargo of paper in bales, and being so loaded shall proceed with her cargo to London. The charter-party further provides:—"In the event of misrepresentation regarding steamer's size or position, or of any mishap entailing delay in arrival at port of loading, beyond seven days of her expected readiness, charterers to have the option of cancelling this charter." I ought to mention this other clause: "Owners to have the option of substituting their s.s. 'Douglas' (sister ship)." Now what happened was this. By the 10th of March neither the "Alice" nor the "Douglas" was tendered, and as Messrs Nelson were under contract to send on paper which was urgently required in London, they shipped part of it by the ordinary line of steamers, and sent on the remainder by another boat which by chance happened to belong to the same firm of shipowners. The damage sued for is the difference of freight between that of the "Alice" and that charged by the ordinary line of steamers.

The Lord Ordinary has held that, reading the charter-party as a whole, the true construction is this—I quote from his opinion—"I have no doubt . . . . that on a sound construction of the charter-party it provides for the vessel being at Leith (which, in another part of the charter-party, is stipulated as the port of loading) at latest on the 10th of March." My Lords, I confess I have some difficulty in holding that there is an absolute obligation to provide a steamer by the 10th of March, but I agree that it was in the contemplation of parties that the steamer was to be ready on or about the 3rd, and that parties were not expected to wait after the 10th. But the matter truly depends on whether the owners have or have not fulfilled the contract by which they bound themselves to provide a ship, "expected ready to load about 3rd March," and which should, "with all convenient speed," proceed to the loading berth at Leith. There does not seem to have been any case precisely the same as the present, but there are many cases in which the words "with all convenient speed" have been construed. They mean that the vessel is to proceed as soon as it can to its destination. If it is delayed by perils of the sea, that would be a sufficient answer. If a definite date is inserted, that of course speaks for itself. But the words here are "expected ready to load." That expression shows that the parties were well aware that the ship might not be ready on the 3rd of March, and it is for that reason that the second clause is put in, viz. that after the 10th of March the charterer might cancel the contract. The ship might not be ready through no fault of the owners; it might be delayed by accident or by stress of weather. That, however, does not alter the fundamental matter that the shipowner must do nothing on his part to prevent the ship being ready at the time mentioned.

Now in his evidence, Nicol, one of the defenders, admits frankly that he so chartered the boats in question as to make it impossible for them to be there on the 10th of March. That seems to put him out of court. We were told that this was an important case for those engaged in the coasting trade, but I cannot think that it is so, for nothing would be easier than to insert words declaring that the owners should not be liable in the event of their failure to provide a ship. I therefore think the Lord Ordinary is right, although I do not base my judgment on the same grounds. I base my judgment on this, that the shipowners, by their own act, put it out of their power to fulfil the contract. It is a case of simple breach of contract, for which the other party is entitled to sue. I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Lord M'Laren.—The Lord Ordinary has given very moderate damages, limited to the actual difference of freight which the Messrs Nelson had to pay for that part of the cargo which had to be sent by the regular line of steamers. No question was raised as to the amount of the damages, but it was submitted by the reclaimers that no damages were due, in respect that the insertion of the clause giving an option to cancel came in place of the common law obligation to provide a ship or pay compensation. I do not think the clause was inserted for any such purpose. Under the known case law on this subject, where there is a general obligation to send a ship with all convenient speed, and circumstances have prevented her arrival, the question is a circumstantial one whether the contract of affreightment may be rescinded. In the case of Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Co. Ltd., L.R. 10, C.P. 125, which is a decision of the Exchequer Chamber and an important authority in mercantile law, it was so treated, even though in that case the ship had been a year late in arriving, the delay, however, being due to unavoidable accident. One of the five judges who heard the case gave it as his opinion that the merchant, the charterer, was bound to wait till the end of the year, but the majority thought otherwise, on the ground that the object of the contract would be defeated or frustrated by such delay, and that the charterer was entitled to treat the contract of affreightment as broken. In such a state of the law it never could be ascertained except by proceedings in Court, whether the object of the voyage had been frustrated, and whether the charterer was entitled to take another ship. That was not a very convenient rule in mercantile practice, and may have led to the insertion of clauses in charter-parties fixing the date beyond which the merchant was not bound to wait before chartering another ship.

Now I take it that this cancelling clause has fixed a time beyond which the Nelsons were not bound to wait and to risk the disappointment of those with whom they were under contract to supply the paper. That, however, leaves untouched the question whether damages are due, and I agree that the liability depends on whether the shipowner has fulfilled his primary obligation to provide a ship with all convenient speed. If it could be shown that the shipowners had used their best endeavours, and that the delay was due to unavoidable accident or perils of the sea, I should have been of opinion that no damages were due. The contract could be cancelled but damages would not be due, for each party would then be within his rights. In this case the shipowners sent each of the two named vessels on coasting voyages which could not be completed in time to admit of one of these vessels being put at the disposal of Messrs Nelson before the date prescribed when the charter might be cancelled; and when a shipowner fails, by his own wilful act, to do his best to provide a ship, I see no reason why he should not be liable in damages like any other person who is in breach of a contract.

Lord Pearson.—The charter-party which we have to construe contains a clause which is said by the defenders to have been inserted by them in order to secure a special object. They are owners of several small coasting steamships; and they say that it is necessary for their profit that the ships should be in constant employment. Their case is that they refrain from tying themselves down to any specific day for arrival at the port of loading. In order to keep their hands free, they use a form of charter-party which in their view contains no obligation at all to furnish a ship as part of the contract, but which confers on the charterers the option of cancelling the charter if no ship is tendered, or of waiting until it pleases the defenders to tender a ship. In this view, these two alternatives exhaust the charterers' remedies, so that no room is left for a claim of damages.

I do not say that it might not be possible so to frame a charter-party. I suppose it could be done by an express clause that all claims of damages for late arrival or for non-arrival at the port of loading are excluded; though whether the defenders would get merchants to hire the ships on such terms is another matter. Here, however, there is no such clause; and in the absence of it the Lord Ordinary has held that a claim for damages is not excluded by the clause as it stands, seeing that when read in connection with the opening words of the charter, it imports, in his view, an absolute obligation to have the ship at Leith on 10th March at latest.

I think the question so raised is one of some difficulty; and I prefer the alternative case which was made for the pursuers, and which, in my view, affords the true solution of this dispute.

The contract must be read as a whole, in order to see exactly what obligations it lays upon the shipowners according to its terms. The ship is described as "now trading"; and as the voyages were apparently confined to home-ports, there could be no difficulty in forecasting the probable day of her arrival at the port of loading, which was Leith. Accordingly, the contract declares that she is "expected ready to load about 3rd March"; and the owners undertake that she shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to Leith, and there load as customary. The defenders dwell on the expression "expected ready to load about 3rd March," as if it left everything open, with the result that the charter is absolutely indefinite as to time, in the important matter of the commencement of loading. I do not say that the words amount to an undertaking that she will be ready to load on 3rd March, or even about 3rd March. But touching as they do a matter within the shipowners' own knowledge and control, they at least import, in my opinion, an assurance that the vessel was at the time in such a position that she might reasonably be expected to be in Leith ready to load by the day named. Now, although that assurance was well founded at the time it was made, and although the ship might with all convenient speed have proceeded to Leith in ample time, the defenders deliberately put it out of their power to fulfil the contract. If for any reason the "Alice" was not available, they had the option of substituting a sister ship. But as regards each of them it appears that the defenders interposed a new charter in such a way as to make it impossible for them to fulfil their contract with the pursuers with either ship. That of itself seems to me sufficient to infer liability in damages.—28*th May* 1907.

23. Mackay and Others v. Rodger and Others.

Evidence — Proof — Recompense — Claim for Expenditure on Heritable Property—Claim Provable Prout de Jure.

The following statement of the circumstances giving rise to this action is taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

"The pursuers in this action are the brothers and sisters of a Miss Ann Mackay, who owned a piece of land on which, when she acquired it, there stood a small thatched cottage. They aver that after she had occupied the cottage a good number of years it became ruinous; and it was thought that the land could be turned to better account by taking down the cottage and erecting upon it a tenement of buildings. Miss Ann Mackay had no funds of her own; but the pursuers had a property in Paisley, which they realised and employed part of the proceeds in erecting buildings which cost £900. They say that they did this with the consent of Miss Ann Mackay, and under an arrangement with her that each of those who contributed to the cost of the erection should be entitled to a proportionate interest in the new buildings. No writing was ever executed in relation to this arrangement; and a will which Miss Ann Mackay left in favour of the pursuers having proved to be inoperative, the defenders, who are the heirs at law as heirs portioners of her younger brother, have made up a title to the land, and maintain a right of property both in the land and in the buildings upon it."

The pursuers now brought this action, the conclusions of which were: (1) To ordain the defenders to grant and execute in favour of the pursuers a disposition of eight-ninths pro indiviso shares, or of such other shares as the pursuers might be found entitled to, of the property referred to (eight-ninths being the pursuers' estimate of their rights in the property on the footing of the arrangement before mentioned), and also to count and reckon for their intromissions with the rents of the said subjects; (2) or otherwise, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £880.

It was subsequently admitted by the pursuers' counsel that he could not ask for a decree under the first conclusion. In support of the second alternative conclusion the pursuers pleaded: "The pursuers having expended upon the property the amount specified in the second alternative conclusion, in reliance upon the arrangement with the late Ann Mackay specified on record, and the said property having been meliorated to at least that extent, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second alternative conclusion."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia: "(2) The averments of the pursuers being irrelevant and lacking in specification, the action should be dismissed.

"(7) The averments of the pursuers can only be proved by writ or oath in respect (a) that they relate to heritage; (b) that they relate to a trust; (c) that they relate to the loan or payment of money; and (d) that they seek to establish an innominate contract."

Held that the pursuers' averments of their claim for recompense were relevant and were provable prout de jure.

Lord Salvesen (after narrating the facts as quoted above).—Under the first conclusion of the Summons the pursuers demand that the defenders should convey to them eight-ninth shares pro indiviso of the property in question. It was admitted, however, by the pursuers' counsel that he was not in a position to insist in this demand; and accordingly the only conclusion that remains is one for payment of the sum of £880, being the value of the work and materials expended in erecting the new buildings.

Several of the defenders' pleas are directed to the first conclusion, and need not be considered. They argued, however, that such an agreement as is alleged by the pursuers cannot be proved by parole; and, as the pursuers admit that they have no writings to substantiate their averments, that the action should be dismissed. They further maintained that the averments of the pursuers are not relevant to support the conclusions, even for payment by way of recompense. In my opinion neither of these pleas can be sustained. In the case of Bell v. Bell, 1841, 3 D. 1201, where the facts were very similar, it was held that a claim for recompense, such as this, could be established prout de jure; and the authority of that case has not been questioned, so far as I am aware, in any subsequent decision. Indeed, in the comparatively recent case of Allan v. Gilchrist, 1875, 2 R. 592, the case of Bell v. Bell was recognised as a binding authority. No doubt, as was said in that case, the claim was one based on fraud; but the same could be said of the pursuers' claim, if it had been directed against the pursuers' author, who was maintaining her right to the sole property of the buildings, although erected with the funds of her brothers and sisters on the faith of the arrangement already referred to. In the present case there is, of course, no charge of fraud made against the defenders, who are the heirs ab intestato of Miss Ann Mackay; but, as such, they cannot be in a better position than their author. If the pursuers' averments are well-founded in fact, the equity of their claim is indisputable; and I know of no rule which prevents them from establishing it by parole evidence. It was said for the defenders that, a they were in entire ignorance of any such arrangement, they would be at the mercy of the pursuers at the proof. I do not think so; because the presumptions are all in their favour, and must be displaced by something more than the mere statements of interested parties. The pursuers, in order to make out their case, will require to show the source of the money which was expended in the erection of the buildings in question; and will probably, as in Bell's case, appeal to the real evidence afforded by the employment and payment of the tradesmen. I shall accordingly allow the pursuers a proof of their averments in common form.—24*th May* 1907.

Dick's Trustees v. Dick and Others.

under the testator's settlement of 4th March 1902: It was true that the trustees here were given a very wide discretion, but that was no reason for assuming they would abuse it and refusing to give validity to the will. The case was indistinguishable from that of Hill and Others v. Burns and Others, 1826, 2 W. and S. 80 (Dundas v. Dundas, 1837, 15 S. 427; M'Lean v. Henderson's Trs., 1880, 7 R. 601; Robbie's Judicial Factor v. Macrae, 1893, 20 R. 358; Dick v. Ferguson, 1758, M. 7446; Blair v. Duncan, 1901, 4 F. (H.L.) 1; Cobb v. Cobb's Trs., 1894, 21 R. 638; Crichton v. Grierson, 1828, 3 W. and S. 329; Miller, 1837, 2 S. and M. 866).

Counsel for the trustees under the testator's prior settlements also reclaimed, and argued: The prior settlements were not revoked by the settlement of 4th March 1902 (Kilpatrick's Trs. v. Kilpatrick, 1874, 1 R. (H.L.) 37; Richmond's Trs. v. Winton, etc., 1864, 3 M. 95).

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the amount of money at stake here is very large; and the case would have required, I think, more ample treatment if it had not been for two circumstances. The first is the very careful Note of the Lord Ordinary, with whom I entirely agree; and secondly, that this class of question is so amply covered by decisions that I think it would be quite out of place to repeat again in less well chosen words propositions which have been established by the highest Court in the land.

My Lords, I think, in spite of the exertions of counsel for the reclaimers, it is quite impossible to distinguish this case in its essential particulars from the case of Hill, etc. v. Burns, 1826, 2 W. and S. 80, except only in one matter, and that matter has to do with the expression as to the time when the trustees are bound to carry into effect the purposes of the trust.

Now the clause which deals with that matter is this:—"I direct them at any time or times, or from time to time as and when the said residue or any part thereof becomes available, as they may deem proper, to pay over or divide the said residue or any part or parts thereof to or amongst such local or Scottish charitable institutions and schemes already constituted, or which may hereafter be constituted (and which may include these hereinbefore named) as they may select, or any one or more of such institutions and schemes, and that at such time, in such manner, or in such proportions all as they in their absolute discretion may deem proper."

My Lords, my own view of that clause is that if you read it along with the whole of the settlement, which of course one is entitled to do, it is no more, in its true construction, than giving a very ample discretion, as to time, to the trustees, but nevertheless leaving them to carry out the bequest as and when the said residue becomes available.

We cannot leave out of view that one of the arrangements of Mr Dick's settlement was one which contemplated his trustees carrying on for a more or less lengthened period his business, and necessitating the retention in the business in the meantime of a large portion of his capital. If the trustees carried on the business, not only was a certain amount of capital hung up while they carried it on, but also there was obviously a possible question of their own liability, against which they were entitled to be protected by the trust estate.

If you take these two matters together—the uncertain duration of this state of affairs, when complete realisation of Mr Dick's estate into cash was impossible, and possibly, although probably not so likely in the mind of the testator, the idea that the trustees might not wish to pay away the estate while they themselves were subject to personal and contingent liabilities in respect of that estate—I think one finds ample justification for the use of the very wide terms as to time this clause employs.

But, my Lords, I do not know that in my view that very much matters. Even if there was not that particular explanation of this clause, and if it were a mere expression of complete generality, so far as time is concerned, in the option which is given to the trustees when they are to carry out the settlement, it would not at all, in my view, derogate from the validity of the settlement.

The reasons for which wills of this sort are not given effect to may be divided into two classes. There is the case where the object which the trustees are to carry out is so imperfectly expressed that the trustees are really left with no direction, or, in other words, using the common expression, the will is void from uncertainty.

Now the decisions, of course, have long ago settled that the expression "charitable purposes" denotes a definite class of objects, and is not therefore an uncertain direction. I need not go through the cases. I have already mentioned one which is the most authoritative decision on the subject. But I would like also to refer to the summary of the whole matter in the observations made by Lord Robertson in the case of Blair, 1901, 4 F. (H.L.) 1, where I think his Lordship really explains the true view upon which charitable bequests have been supported, and bequests for such objects as public purposes have not been supported. The other category—I am not sure if it is another category or whether it is not really just another branch of the same subject—is where it has been held that the Court will not sustain a will which is no will at all in itself, but is simply a giving over of a man's fortune to the arbitrament of another. But beyond that it does not seem to me that the decisions have gone.

When you come to this question of time, it seems to me that the same uncertainty as to any precise period of time might be predicated of bequests which are undoubtedly good. If a man leaves a sum of money to his trustees to be given in their discretion to a certain person—and an example of that class of bequest may be found in the well-known case of Chambers' Trs., 1878, 5 R. (H.L.) 151—it is perfectly uncertain whether that bequest will be eventually made or not. It is equally true, as was stated in argument here, that at no moment of time could you ever go to the trustees and say, "Now you are bound to execute this bequest."

Now when trustees have a discretion I think—in the words of one of the learned judges in one of the cases—that although it is a discretion that will not be interfered with, yet, of course, if the trustees maladminister, and refuse to exercise the discretion at all, the Court will find a way of interfering. If you can suppose that here the trustees simply buttoned their pockets and refused to do anything, I cannot doubt that a way might be found of compelling them to act. But even apart from that, surely it would be an almost fantastic result if, where trustees profess no difficulty and are in no way behaving in a way to suggest that they are really acting in fraudem of their trust—it would surely be fantastic to say to them "Because conceivably you may act in such a way we will take the whole estate away from you and not allow you to deal with it at all." That is what we are asked to do here by holding that this bequest is void.

Accordingly I come to the conclusion that this clause, although it offers a distinction between the case and that of Hill, etc. v. Burns, really creates no difference, and that here the bequest is quite a good one, and the trust one such as the trustees can, consistently with the rules that I have laid down, administer.

My Lords, the second finding of the Lord Ordinary is to the effect that this will supersedes the other wills. I really cannot doubt that anyone looking at this settlement, which is absolutely a universal settlement, could come to any but one conclusion—namely, that this last will was intended to supersede the others, and I do not think we have had any argument presented to us which would shake one's belief in what I believe to be a universal rule. On the whole matter I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord M'Laren.—I have read the Lord Ordinary's note and interlocutor, and I think his Lordship's judgment contains a very well-considered and careful statement of the existing law on the subject. I am quite content to rest my opinion upon the Lord Ordinary's Note, with the further exposition of the subject which has been given by your Lordship in the chair.

I may, however, be allowed to say that I think it is a subject of regret that our law has given such a very wide extension to the doctrine of the benignant construction of charitable bequests. In the earlier cases on the subject we know that the decisions related to estates of moderate amount, and in these cases we have indications either of the parties or of the localities that were to be benefited, with directions that clearly pointed to the immediate realisation of the testator's wishes. But in the progress of the law these restrictions have been gradually and insensibly removed. Now, as I think, it results from all the authorities that the expression "charitable purposes" in a bequest of residue, coupled with the appointment of persons who are to administer that bequest, suffices to exclude the next of kin, even where the will contains no evidence that the testator had ever applied his mind to the consideration of what was to be done with his estate, or that he had any other motive than that of disappointing the expectations of his next of kin. Of course I am very far from suggesting that such was the motive in the present case. I am stating what is possible in the existing state of the law. At the same time, I think we must recognise that this is a matter of opinion. In the present state of the case law on the subject I think it must be left to the House of Lords in its judicial or legislative capacity to determine within what limits the right of charitable disposition is to be allowed.

On the second point I also agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship. The settlement under construction is a universal settlement, and I think, with the possible exception of bequests of specific articles, such a settlement is exclusive of the effect of all previous dispositions.

Therefore I agree that the reclaiming note should be refused.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree entirely with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary; and I also assent to the additional observations that have been made by your Lordship in the chair with special reference to the points which have been argued to us; and I do not need to repeat them.

Lord Pearson.—I am of the same opinion.—29*th May* 1907.

Douglas and Others v. Marquis of Queensberry's Trustees.

FIRST DIVISION.

(The Lord President, Lords M'Laren, Kinnear and Pearson.)

25. Douglas and Others v. Marquis of Queensberry's Trustees.

PROCESS — RECLAIMING NOTE — SUMMARY PETITION — DISTRIBUTION OF BUSINESS ACT 1857 (20 & 21 VICT. CAP. 56), SECT. 6—FINALITY OF INTERLOCUTOR—PETITION LODGED BY A—ANSWERS LODGED BY B—INTERLOCUTOR DISPOSING OF B'S CLAIM NOT RECLAIMED AGAINST—SUBSEQUENT INTERLOCUTOR DISPOSING OF WHOLE MERITS OF PETITION AND UPHOLDING A'S CLAIM—HELD INCOMPETENT TO REVIEW PRIOR INTERLOCUTOR UNDER RECLAIMING NOTE BY B AGAINST SECOND INTERLOCUTOR.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

On 4th July 1905 Reginald Edward Walters and another, the trustees acting under a trust deed dated 10th and 14th July 1900, executed by the Marquis of Queensberry, presented a petition to the Court for authority to uplift the sum of £1026, 3s. 7d. in the hands of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer. The circumstances in which the application was made were set forth in the Petition as follows:—

By private Act of Parliament, 6 Geo. IV. cap. 33, the Judges of the Court of Session in either Division were authorised and required, upon presentation of a petition by the then Charles, Marquis of Queensberry, or by the heir of entail for the time being entitled to and in the possession of the entailed estates enumerated in said Act, to take an account of the debts of the said Charles, Marquis of Queensberry, contracted by him prior to 21st May 1818, and still remaining due and unpaid, and of the burdens affecting and that might affect the entailed estates of the said Charles, Marquis of Queensberry, and to order and direct to be sold by public auction and sale such part of the said entailed estates as should be sufficient to discharge the said debts and burdens. Under and in virtue of the powers granted by said Act, certain of the said entailed lands were sold, and the purchase price applied in payment of the said debts.

By sects. 4 and 5 of the said Act it was provided as follows:—"Sect. 4. Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that in case a surplus shall remain of the price of the lands so to be sold under the authority of this Act, and interest thereof, after defraying the expenses of passing this Act, and all the reasonable expenses which may be incurred in carrying the same into execution, and after payment of all the debts and obligations of the said Charles, Marquis of Queensberry, incurred and contracted prior to the said Twenty-first day of May One thousand eight hundred and eighteen, to be ascertained in manner before directed, the Judges of the said Court of Session in either Division thereof are hereby empowered and required to direct and order that the said surplus shall be laid out and employed in the purchase of other lands, which shall be limited and settled to the same uses and purposes, and under the like prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, as the said lands and estates before mentioned, by the deed of entail hereinbefore recited, now stand limited and settled; and in the meantime and until the money shall be so applied, to order and direct that the same shall remain in the Bank of Scotland, or Royal Bank of Scotland, or Bank of the British Linen Company of Scotland, subject to the direction of the Court of Session in either Division thereof, in the name of such person or persons as the Court shall appoint; and the interest arising from the money so paid in shall annually accumulate and be added to the principal sum, so that they may carry interest together until a proper purchase in lands shall be found, to be limited in the manner hereinbefore directed, and until, upon a petition to be preferred to the said Court of Session in either Division thereof in a summary way by the said Charles, Marquis of Queensberry, or any heir of entail in possession of the said estate, the money shall be ordered to be paid by the treasurer of the Bank of Scotland, or the cashier of the Royal Bank of Scotland, or the manager of the Bank of the British Linen Company of Scotland, for completing the said purchase in such manner as the said Court shall direct.

"Sect. 5. Provided always, that if the money arising by the principal and accumulated interest of such sum or sums shall exceed the amount of the purchase money, then and in that case only the surplus which shall remain, after discharging the expense of the application to the Court, shall be paid to the person or persons who for the time being would be entitled to receive the rents and profits of the lands directed to be purchased, in case the same had been purchased pursuant to this Act, or the representatives of such person or persons."

After payment of all the debts to which the purchase price of the lands sold under order of the Judges of the Court of Session was decerned to be applied, there was left over a balance of £808, 9s. 9d., which, in terms of sect. 4 of said Act, was consigned in the Bank of Scotland in name of "The Marquis of Queensberry's entailed estates," to remain subject to the orders of the Court of Session. Of the said consigned sum, £567, 10s. 4d. was, on 5th January 1837, paid to William Stewart, W.S., in terms of an Act and Warrant of the Court authorising such payment, and a new receipt was thereafter granted by the said Bank of Scotland for the balance remaining, viz., the sum of £240, 19s. 5d.

No orders were ever given with regard to the disposal of the said balance, and at 31st December 1895 it had amounted, with compound interest, to the sum of £1026, 3s. 7d. In terms of the Court of Session Consignation (Scotland) Act 1895, the said sum of £1026, 3s. 7d. was paid over as at said 31st December to the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer, in whose hands it has remained down to the present time.

By trust deed dated 10th and 14th days of July 1900, the Most Honourable Percy Sholto Douglas, Marquis of Queensberry, the successor and representative of the said Charles, Marquis of Queensberry, before referred to, gave, granted, assigned, and disponed to the present petitioners and Christian Chevallier Cobbold, of Fitzalan House, Arundel Street, Strand, London, who has since resigned, as trustees for the purposes mentioned in said trust deed, his estates as therein specifically mentioned, together with "the whole other means, estate and effects, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of every kind, and wherever situate, now belonging or addebted to me, or which shall hereafter belong and be addebted to me in any manner of way."

In or about the beginning of 1901 the said Percy Sholto Douglas, Marquis of Queensberry, became bankrupt, and on 1st August 1901 a receiving order was pronounced against him, and Mr F. S. Salaman was appointed trustee upon his estates. On 12th June 1903 the said order was discharged, and it was ordered that the order of adjudication made against the bankrupt should be annulled in respect of the payment of a composition by the bankrupt. It was also further ordered that all the property of the bankrupt, except a certain cash balance in the hands of Mr Salaman, should vest in the present petitioners as trustees under the said trust deed already referred to. Inter alia, the property thus vested in the petitioners as such trustees included the said sum of £1026, 3s. 7d.

The petitioners prayed the Court to grant warrant to the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer to pay over to the petitioners the said sum of £1026, 3s. 7d., with the compound interest which had accrued thereon from 31st December 1895 till payment.

Answers were lodged by the Hon. Alfred Bruce and others, residuary legatees under the trust disposition and settlement of the deceased eighth Marquis of Queensberry, containing, inter alia, the following averments:—

Explained that the whole revenue or interest which accrued on the consigned balance of £240, 19s. 5d. from the date of the accession of John Sholto Douglas, the eighth Marquis of Queensberry, as heir of entail, on 6th August 1858 to the date of his death, which occurred on 31st January 1900, had vested in the said John Sholto Douglas by operation of law, and is now payable to the respondents as residuary beneficiaries under the trust disposition and settlement of the said John Sholto Douglas.

On 10th February 1906 the Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—

"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, repels the claim made by the respondents Lord Alfred Douglas and others in their answers, No. 11 of process, and continues the cause."

After certain further procedure the Lord Ordinary, on 14th July 1906, issued the following interlocutor:—

"The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the Petition: Finds that the procedure has been regular and proper, and in conformity with the provisions of the statutes: Grants warrant and authority for the payment to the petitioner, The Most Honourable Percy Sholto Douglas, Marquis of Queensberry, of the sum of £1026, 3s. 7d., mentioned in the Petition, with the interest accrued thereon from 31st day of December 1895: Further, grants warrant to and authorises the King's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer to pay over the said sum of £1026, 3s. 7d., with interest accrued thereon as aforesaid, to the petitioners the said Percy Sholto Douglas, Marquis of Queensberry, and Reginald Edward Walters, and Henry Slane Fleming, as trustees mentioned in the Petition, and that upon the joint receipt of the said Percy Sholto Douglas, Marquis of Queensberry, and the said Reginald Edward Walters and Henry Slane Fleming as trustees foresaid; and decerns."

Sect. 6 of the Distribution of Business Act 1857 is as follows:—

"It shall not be competent to bring under review of the Court any interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary upon any such petition . . . . with a view to investigation and enquiry merely, and which does not finally dispone thereof on the merits; but any judgment pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the merits, unless when the same shall have been pronounced in terms of instructions by the Court, on report as hereinbefore mentioned, may be reclaimed against . . . . provided that a reclaiming note shall be boxed within eight days, after which the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, if not so reclaimed against, shall be final."

The respondents the Hon. Alfred Bruce Douglas and others reclaimed against the interlocutor of 14th July 1906.

On the Reclaiming Note being put out for hearing in the Summar Roll, counsel for the petitioners and respondents objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued: Though the reclaiming note was in form against the interlocutor of 14th July 1906, it was in reality against the interlocutor of 10th February 1906, which finally disposed of the merits of the case in so far as the reclaimers' interests were concerned. It was incompetent for the reclaimers to bring under review the interlocutor of 10th February by a reclaiming note against the interlocutor of 14th July. This being a summary petition, the procedure in it was regulated by the Distribution of Business Act 1857. Under sect. 6 of that Act the interlocutor of 10th February, though it did not dispose of the whole merits of the petition, was a judgment on the merits, and became final if not reclaimed against within eight days. Consequently the interlocutor of 10th February was not subject to review (Macqueen v. Tod, 1899, 1 F. 859; Clark v. Barr's Trs., 1903, 5 F. 856).

Argued for the Reclaimers: (1) This being an objection to the competency of a reclaiming note, should have been stated in Single Bills, and was too late at this stage. (2) The interlocutor of 10th February was a judgment on the merits of the reclaimers' claim alone, and not a judgment on the merits of the petition, and was consequently subject to review. It was not till 14th July that the Lord Ordinary finally disposed of the merits of the petition.

The Court refused the reclaiming note.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the reclaimer

1st Div.

Douglas and Others v. Marquis of Queensberry's Trustees.

The Lord President.

began by saying that he would object to the respondents' motion that this reclaiming note be dismissed because it was an objection to the competency and, not having been taken in the Single Bills, was now too late. I express no opinion on that subject, because the respondents' objection was not really on competency at all, but raised the question whether, by reclaiming the interlocutor under review, it was competent to quarrel an interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary at a previous stage in the proceedings and not reclaimed against at the time, and which was an interlocutor on the merits though it did not dispose of the whole merits of the petition.

I am unable to distinguish this case from that of Macqueen v. Tod, 1899, 1 F. 859, followed in Clark v. Barr's Trs., 1903, 5 F. 856, which decided that the procedure in petitions under the Distribution of Business Act 1857 is unaffected by the Court of Session Act 1868, and that the rights of reclaimers and questions as to finality are settled by the Act of 1857 and not by the Act of 1868. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of 10th February 1906 was an interlocutor on the merits, and if not reclaimed against became final. No reason has been stated why the interlocutor of 14th July 1906 is wrong if the interlocutor of 10th February is to stand.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of the same opinion. I am confirmed in the view which I expressed in Macqueen v. Tod, 1 F. 859, by the further discussion of the question in the present case. It would be highly inconvenient if the rules applicable to reclaimers in ordinary actions, such as actions for the recovery of debt, were to be applied to administrative orders of the Court. Take, for instance, the case of a petition for the appointment of a factor loco tutoris or curator bonis. Interlocutors are pronounced in the course of such proceedings on points that do not admit of delay, such as the sale of the ward's estate or its investment. It would be intolerable if after the lapse of twenty years such interlocutors were to be brought under review by a reclaiming note against the curator's discharge. It cannot justly be said that on this point there is any omission in the Court of Session Act 1868, which I think designedly left the procedure in such cases to stand by itself under the code provided in the Distribution of Business Act 1857. It follows that any interlocutor which it is desired to bring under review must be reclaimed against within eight days.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree that what we are now deciding involves no decision as to whether an objection to the competency of a reclaiming note must or must not be taken at Single Bills. The objection here is not to the right to reclaim against the interlocutor of 14th July 1906. If that were the interlocutor to be brought under review, the reclaiming note would admittedly be in time. But when we go into the case it appears that the reclaimer has no interest in that interlocutor unless he can upset the interlocutor of 10th February 1906; and if that is an interlocutor on the merits, the reclaiming note is too late. But that objection does not arise upon the face of the reclaiming note, and need not be taken in the Single Bills. I agree that the question whether the interlocutor of 10th February can now be reviewed must be decided under the Distribution of Business Act 1857. It has been argued that that interlocutor was not final, because it did not dispose of the whole merits of the petition. But it disposes upon its merits of the only question in which the reclaimer is interested, and the only question which the Court is asked to consider. It is of no consequence to the reclaimers, and it is irrelevant to the question we are asked to decide, that other controversies between other persons may be raised before the petition is taken out of Court. I am of opinion that the matter we are asked to consider was finally disposed of by the interlocutor of 10th February, and it is too late to bring that interlocutor under review. There is thus no objection to the competency of the reclaiming note against the interlocutor of the 14th July. But the present reclaimer has no interest or title to complain of that interlocutor, and the reclaiming note must therefore be dismissed.

Lord Pearson concurred.—28*th May* 1907.

OUTER HOUSE.

(Lord Salvesen.)

26. Cassils & Co. v. Absalon.

Process — Proof — Commission for Recovery of Documents — Examination of Havers—Production of Books — Regulations as to Access to Books — Duty of Commissioner—Accountant — Commissioner Has No Power to Appoint Accountant to Examine Books.

The pursuers in this action were calico printers and merchants in Glasgow, and the defender was a merchant in Belgium. In 1904 the parties had entered into an agreement in regard to the printing of handkerchiefs to be sold by the defender. In 1905 the pursuers intimated a claim for damages for breach of contract by the defender. The pursuers now raised this action, founding on an agreement which they said was entered into for settlement of their claim. They averred that the defender agreed to pay to the pursuers a sum equivalent to the profit which the pursuers and a Mr J. W. Elliot (an agent for the sale of grey cloth supplied to the defender) had made on their transactions with the defender since January 1903. The amount thus claimed amounted to £2507, 4s. 8d. The defender resisted this claim on the grounds, inter alia, (1) that he was induced to believe by Mr Elliot that the profits could not exceed £250; and (2) that the sum claimed was not the true profit legitimately made by the pursuers out of the defender. The Lord Ordinary had granted the defender a commission for the recovery of documents.

At the execution of the commission the said J. W. Elliot was cited as a haver. Questions arose in regard to the production of his books, and eventually the haver insisted on locking them up, as the commissioner declined to give an undertaking that the defender would not get access to the books outwith the presence of the pursuers.

The commissioner made an interim report, and parties were heard on said report.

Argued for the Defender: In the circumstances of this case the commissioner was not bound to give the undertaking asked. The haver refused to answer questions, or to point out what entries were referable to the contract in question. The commissioner could not tell, without assistance, what entries were to be excerpted. The haver was obstructing a proper disclosure of the facts. The haver must either give the necessary information, or allow skilled assistance to trace it. The defender was therefore entitled to have an accountant appointed, and the commissioner was wrong in refusing to make such an appointment.

Argued for Pursuers: The matter was not one of obstruction, but of principle. The haver objected to the books being handed over to the inspection of a rival in trade. The commissioner was wrong in refusing to give the undertaking asked, and the haver acted within his rights.

Held (1) that the haver was justified in refusing to hand over the books; and (2) that the commissioner had no right to appoint an accountant to examine the books.

Lord Salvesen.—The first question I have to decide is the most important, whether the haver was justified in the attitude which he took up before the commissioner. He produced admittedly all the documents and books called for in the specification, and he proposed to leave them with the commissioner on the usual terms. But on the commissioner declining to give an undertaking that he would not allow the defenders access to the books outwith the presence of the pursuers, he locked up the books until that question had been determined by the Court. Now I think that the haver was quite justified in what he did. In granting these diligences one has always to consider that the powers given by the Court may be abused unless carefully safeguarded, and when one is dealing with the business books of a commercial firm it has always been customary to grant warrant for recovery of these only on the footing that they shall be lodged with a neutral person, to wit, the commissioner, and that the excerpts bearing on the question in dispute shall be taken at his sight. What the defenders in this case propose to do with the aid of the commissioner is to range through the whole of these business books in order that they may see whether they can ascertain what is the probable nature of the case which the pursuers are going to make. I do not think that is legitimate. I think if that power was given by the Court it would be liable to great abuse. I do not suggest in the present case that any improper advantage would be taken, but I have to consider that this raises a question of principle, and that my decision in the present case may be founded upon in others. The pursuers do recognise that the case is a somewhat special one, because of the number and complexity of the details involved, and accordingly they have made an offer which has very largely influenced my decision—an offer, viz., that the haver shall attend from day to day at the commissioner's office when the defenders desire it in order that the defenders may assist the commissioner in his presence in making the excerpts which they think will bear upon the averments upon record. I think that was a reasonable offer, and in view of the undertaking which has been given I shall let the commissioner know that in my opinion he ought not to allow the books to be taken out of his custody or to be examined by the defenders or their agents outwith the presence of the pursuers.

The other motion for an accountant is really not before me at present. I think, however, the commissioner was absolutely right in refusing the defenders' application for the appointment by the commissioner of an accountant to examine the books. He has no delegated powers except those given expressly by the specification.

For myself I should have considered the motion favourably, as the defender is a foreigner and not conversant with our language, but as the pursuers are willing that the defenders' commercial agent as well as his law agent should be present to assist in the examination of the books, I shall not allow anyone else.—25th May 1907.

(The Lord President, Lords M'Laren, Kinnear and Pearson.)

27. The Mica Insulator Company Limited v. Bruce Peebles & Company Limited.

I. Expenses — Abandonment — Full Expenses Imposed by Judicature Act, sect. 10, as Condition of Abandonment, Fall to be Taxed As Between Party and Party, But Are Not Subject to Modification.

II. Expenses—Patent Cases—Defences of Prior Use and Anticipation — Expenses of Preliminary Investigations —Sect. 29, sub-sect. 6, of Patents Act 1883 Applies to Scotland But Does Not Affect Scottish Procedure and Does Not Supersede Regulation No. 3 Appended to Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876.

III. Expenses—Regulation No. 3 Appended to Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876—Interlocutor Allowing Proof—Interlocutor Remitting to Lord Ordinary to Proceed, Where Proof Necessarily Next Step in Process, Held Equivalent to Interlocutor Allowing Proof — Observations on Nature of Charges — Precognitions — Preliminary Investigations.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 281.)

Report by Lord Johnston.

This was an action for, inter alia, interdict and damages in respect of infringement of patents brought by the Mica Insulator Co. Ltd., London, against Messrs Bruce Peebles & Co. Ltd., Edinburgh. The defenders, in addition to other defences, pleaded that the pursuers' patents were invalid on the grounds of anticipation and prior use. On 27th March 1905 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) allowed a proof. The defenders reclaimed, and on 6th July 1905 the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and allowed the pursuers to lodge a Minute of Amendment of the Record. On 3rd November 1905 the Court allowed the record to be amended, of new closed the record, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary "to proceed as accords." This interlocutor did not contain a formal allowance of proof.

On 20th July 1906, before a formal order for proof had been made, the pursuers lodged a Minute of Abandonment, and the Lord Ordinary remitted the defenders' account of expenses to the Auditor to tax and report. In taxing the account the Auditor disallowed certain items charged for preliminary investigations which had been made for the purpose of setting forth on record the defences of prior use and anticipation. The question now reported arose on the defenders' objections to the Auditor's report.

The Judicature Act 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sect. 10, empowers a pursuer to abandon the action on payment of "full expenses."

No. 3 of the General Regulations appended to the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876 provides:

The expenses to be charged against an opposite party shall be limited to proper "Expenses of Process" without any allowance (beyond that indicated in the table) for preliminary investigations, subject to this proviso, that precognitions (so far as relevant and necessary for proof of the matters in the record between the parties), although taken before the raising of an action or the preparation of defences, and although the case may not proceed to trial or proof, may be allowed where eventually an interlocutor shall be pronounced either approving of issues or allowing a proof.

The Patents, Designs, and Trades Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. cap. 57), sect. 29, provides for the delivery of particulars. Sub-sect. 6 provides:

On taxation of costs, regard shall be had to the particulars delivered by the plaintiff and by the defendant; and they respectively shall not be allowed any costs in respect of any particular delivered by them unless the same is certified by the Court or a judge to have been proven or to have been reasonable and proper, without regard to the general costs of the case.

Sect. 107 provides:

In any action for infringement of a patent in Scotland . . . . but otherwise nothing shall affect the jurisdiction and forms of process of the Courts in Scotland. . . .

On 22nd May 1907 the Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the Court. He added the following Note.

Lord Johnston.—This case, which was raised before Lord Stormonth-Darling in the end of 1904, and in which, after hearing parties in the Procedure Roll, his Lordship on 27th March 1905 sustained the relevancy and allowed a proof, was further discussed in the Inner House in July 1905, when (7 F. 944) your Lordships of the First Division found the pursuers' case materially wanting in specification, and consequently on 6th July 1905 recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 27th March 1905, with a view to the pursuers considering whether they would propose to amend their record. The record was thereafter amended to the satisfaction of your Lordships, and on 3rd November 1905 it was re-closed in the Division and the case remitted to me, as in room of Lord Stormonth-Darling, to proceed as accords.

No movement was made in the case before me until July 1906, when after some fencing between the parties, the defenders moving for a diet of proof to be fixed in order to bring matters to a point—though correctly I should have had first to pronounce a renewed order for proof—and the pursuers seeking further delay, the pursuers on 20th July 1906 lodged a Minute of Abandonment in terms of the statute, in respect whereof I, on that date, in ordinary form appointed the defenders to lodge an account of the expenses incurred by them. This account, amounting to £286, 16s. 9d., has been taxed by the Auditor at £69, 3s., the sum taxed off being as much as £220, 13s. 9d. On objections for the defenders to the Auditor's report, a difficult question of process in relation to expenses arises.

Under the Judicature Act 1825 the power to abandon is given to the pursuer only subject to the condition of "paying full expenses or costs to the defender." What are "full costs" in the sense of the statute in the present case? The Auditor has taken the view that the General Regulations appended to the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876 are peremptory and admit of no exception, and that applying them he can only allow the amount at which in an ordinary case, where no order for proof had been pronounced, the account would have been taxed, and cannot allow anything for prior investigations and precognitions. While I think from his note that the Auditor felt the hardship to the defenders of his ruling in the present case, he had, in my opinion, no alternative except to do what he did or to report the case for instructions; and he probably took the more convenient method of dealing with the case, inasmuch as the result of applying the strict rule is made more apparent from his detailed taxation.

I have given full consideration to the question and shall submit the conclusion at which I have arrived, though, for reasons to be afterwards stated, I think it proper to report the case to your Lordships.

I must refer first in greater detail to the course of procedure in the case. The action, inter alia, was for breach of patent, and sought interdict and damages. The patents founded on were two in number, dated in 1892 and 1895 respectively, but they had both been amended in August 1904, very shortly before the raising of the action. They were for "improvements in the manufacture of flexible sheets for electrical insulation," and the material manufactured by the pursuers under their patents they describe as "micanite" or "flexible micanite cloth." To the action the defenders pleaded (1) want of specification. But they also, besides (2) denying infringement, attacked the patent on the grounds of (3) want of patentable matter; (4) anticipation; and (5) prior use. Before lodging their defences, or at least before closing the record, the defenders took the course, first of all, of taking certain precognitions, and obtaining certain information as to the pursuers' alleged patents, and particularly as to a previous action in England at their instance, founded on one of their patents, which action they had abandoned; and secondly, of consulting two patent experts in England on the subject of their defences. The formal precognitions taken, apparently of employees in the defenders' works, were matter of little moment. The really important thing was the gathering of information in England by the defenders' agents, the consultation of patent experts, and their reports, which latter I regard both as advising as to the defence, and as the equivalent of the precognition of scientific witnesses. According to the defenders' account, No. 37 of process, all this was done prior to 27th March 1905, when Lord Stormonth-Darling allowed a proof. Had that interlocutor stood unrecalled, the Auditor would have been technically able, under the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876, to make allowance for "precognitions" at any rate, whatever that term may cover. But that interlocutor was reclaimed against and was recalled, by reason of the original insufficiency and irrelevancy of the pursuers' statements, and therefore in the sense of the Act of Sederunt no interlocutor has been pronounced allowing a proof, which is the condition of the general regulations appended to the Act of Sederunt, precedent to the Auditor being authorised to allow for precognitions, when the case does not ultimately go to trial.

While the fact that an order for proof was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary and was recalled, and particularly was recalled by reason of the pursuers' failure to make a specific statement in support of the summons, cannot be left out of sight, I should not be inclined to found upon it either way, but to take the matter on broader grounds.

During the discussion in the Inner House the pursuers saw fit to lodge a Minute of Amendment, No. 30 of process, which was considered by your Lordships and found not to obviate the defective specification. On judgment being pronounced, the pursuers apparently craved leave to lodge a supplementary Minute, and this being granted them, there followed the withdrawal of the Minute No. 30 of process, and the lodging of a new Minute of Amendment of Record for the pursuers, No. 32 of process, which called forth a Minute of Amendment for the defenders, No. 33 of process, and thereafter a practically new record was made up on these Minutes and closed by your Lordships on 3rd November 1905, before the case was remitted to me. I have carefully examined the papers, and so far as I am in a position to judge, I am satisfied that the amended defences called for by the pursuers' amended Condescendence could not have been stated without investigations such as the defenders made between the raising of the summons and 27th March 1905. The same might possibly be said of the original defences, but it is unnecessary to consider them.

Do, then, the regulations of the Act of Sederunt of 1876 preclude the Court, in a case such as the present, from giving the defenders an allowance for the costs of such preparation for these defences, because technically there has been no interlocutor allowing proof? I think not, and I do so irrespective of the fact that the Lord Ordinary did actually allow proof, and that the recal of his interlocutor was by reason of the insufficient statements of the pursuers, who are now in the position of having to abandon their case, after having occasioned the defenders considerable trouble and expense. I should have been of the same opinion had the Lord Ordinary, as your Lordships have found he should have done, held the case irrelevant and refused a proof.

I was referred to the case of Armitage v. Caird, 1859, 21 D. 1176, also a patent case, in which absolvitor by default was pronounced before the record was finally closed. The Act of Sederunt regulating audit at that time was that of 19th December 1835, and though there were appended General Regulations, these contained nothing analogous to No. 3 of the General Regulations of 1876. The Court in that case allowed the defenders the expense of investigations prior to closing the record, and I cannot help being impressed by the views of the Lord President and Lord Deas, to the effect that a defender in such a case must put on record all his defences at the outset; he cannot make random statements; it is his duty to make only what he is prepared to support by evidence; the necessary enquiry to enable him to do so is one which the pursuer has "forced upon the defender, who was pursuing in good faith an occupation, which we have no reason for thinking he, at least, supposed to be unlawful." Where the necessary enquiry is of the highly technical kind involved in a case where the question raised is of infringement of patent, it appears to me that it would work grave injustice if the defender, by reason of a technicality, founded on the terms of a general regulation in an Act of Sederunt, were to be denied all allowance for the expense into which he had been forced by a pursuer, who in the end runs away from his action, admitting, as in this case, not only that it was originally in defective form, but that, amend it as he will, he cannot face a proof.

I should myself have been prepared to hold that General Regulations admitted of exception in the application, and that, without making such exception here, I should not be following the direction of the Judicature Act, which is to see that the defender gets "full" expenses. But I cannot ignore the strict view of the Act of Sederunt apparently taken by the Court in Church, 1883, 11 R. 398, and in Shirar v. Dixon, 1885, 12 R. 1013. In the first of these cases the circumstances did not meet the letter of the Regulations, and the letter prevailed. In the latter of these cases I think I must read the judgment as indicating that in the view of the Court the particular proceeding was one to which the Regulations did not apply, and not that in an exceptional case the Regulations might be relaxed. The Court indicated no inclination to relax the general rule. The judgment, therefore, forms no support to me in the present case.

But though I accept the view expressed by Lord Shand, that in order to prevent abuse in the conduct of process, the rule that parties should be required to make preliminary enquiries into facts, relevant though not within their own knowledge, at their own expense, unless a proof is allowed, is a salutary though a somewhat empirical one, I think that where a salutary general rule, if enforced to the letter in a particular case, does not prevent abuse, but occasions it, such general rule should admit of exception. And I am supported in this view by the declared object of the Court in Regulation 4 being to allow such expenses as are necessary to conducting litigation, and I conclude the particular litigation, in a proper manner. Expenses of the class here claimed for were, in my opinion, necessary for the proper conduct of the litigation. Were the question not one depending on the technicalities of Scottish procedure, I should consider the case of Piggot & Co. Ltd. v. Corporation of Hanley, 1906, 23 Pat. Cas. 639, as an analogous authority.

While, therefore, I should personally be prepared to direct the Auditor to allow such expenses as were properly incurred in preliminary enquiries to enable the defence to be properly stated, and for that purpose to examine and tax the items charged (for I am far from saying that the charges are to be allowed as stated), I think it proper to make avizandum with the case to your Lordships, for these reasons:—

1st. I am not the judge before whom any of the procedure in the case has been conducted. On the contrary, the materially important part of the procedure, even to the making up of the present record, has been conducted before your Lordships.

2nd. I am prepared to allow charges which may not be held strictly to come within the term "precognitions" used in the Regulations; and

3rd. The Regulations are those of the Court.

There has been no case in which, in their present aspect, these Regulations have been considered by the Court, or by either of the Divisions, and I do not think that it is within the province of a judge in the Outer House, at his own hand, and particularly in a case which only comes incidentally before him, to be the first to introduce an exception to such General Regulations.

Argued for Defenders: In patent cases the rules for making up records and taxing accounts were the same in Scotland as in England (Patents Act, sect. 29), procedure only being saved (sect. 107). In England the defenders would be entitled to recover the expenses of stating particulars if these were certified by the judge to have been reasonable and proper (Patents Act, sect. 29, sub-sect. 6). Accordingly the defenders were entitled to any expenses for which they could have got a certificate in England. In England the Court would not order a trial in order to determine whether a certificate should be granted or not (Wilcox & Gibb v. Janes [1897], 2 Ch. 71), but they would grant a certificate if they knew enough of the case to be able to certify that the particulars were reasonable and proper (Chamberlain & Hookham Ltd. v. Mayor of Huddersfield, 1901, 18 R.P.C. 454; Ashworth v. Horsfall & Bickham, 1904, 21 R.P.C. 47; Pigott & Co. Ltd. v. Corporation of Hanley, 1906, 23 R.P.C. 639). It was not necessary that the case should have gone to trial; the Court might obtain the information from interlocutory proceedings (Kerr & Hoegger Ltd. v. Crompton & Horrocks, 1901, 19 R.P.C. 9). Here the Court were in a position to say that the particulars were reasonable and the defenders were entitled to recover the expenses incurred in putting them on record. Regulation No. 3 of the Act of Sederunt 15th July 1876 did not apply to patent cases, having been superseded by sect. 29, sub-sect. 6, of the Patents Act.

The present case should be dealt with on the footing that an order for proof had been pronounced. After the record had been amended a proof was necessarily the next step of procedure, and it made no difference that the interlocutor did not formally allow a proof.

In any view Regulation No. 3, appended to the Act of Sederunt 15 July 1876, was not peremptory (Shirer v. Dixon, 1885, 12 R. 1013). The Court should exercise their discretion by seeing that the pursuers got "full expenses," which in the present case meant expenses taxed as between agent and client, or at least included the expenses of the particulars which the defenders were under a statutory duty to put on the record (Patent Act, sect. 29, sub-sect. 6; Armitage v. Caird, 1859, 21 D. 1176).

Argued for Pursuers: The defenders were not entitled to extra-judicial expenses in patent cases any more than in other cases. The pursuers were entitled to abandon on paying "full expenses" (Judicature Act, sect. 10), and "full expenses" meant expenses taxed in the usual way (Ross v. Mackenzie, 1889, 16 R. 871). Armitage v. Caird (cit.) was distinguishable.

Even on the analogy of the English cases the defenders were not entitled to prevail. In England they would not be entitled to the expenses of any particulars unless they had obtained a certificate that the particulars were reasonable (Patents Act, sect. 29, sub-sect. 6), and the Court would not certify unless they had before them such evidence as would enable them to say that the particulars were reasonable (Mandleberg v. Morley, 1895, 12 R.P.C. 35; Bethell v. Gage, 1897, 14 R.P.C. 699; Pigott & Co. Ltd. v. Corporation of Hanley, cit.). In the present case no evidence had been led, and the Court could not certify.

No interlocutor allowing proof had been pronounced. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 27th March 1905 had been recalled. It had never become final, and therefore was not an interlocutor allowing proof in the sense of Regulation No. 3 (Clippens Oil Co. Ltd. v. Edinburgh Water Trustees, 1906, 8 F. 731). The regulations were peremptory, and applied to the present case. Shirer v. Dixon (cit.) was special. The defenders, therefore, were not entitled even to the expense of precognitions (Church v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1883, 11 R. 398; Malcolm v. Moore, 1901, 4 F. 369). If the case were to be dealt with on the footing that proof had been allowed, the defenders were entitled to recover only the expense of precognitions and not the expense of preliminary investigations.

The Court directed that the defenders' account of expenses should be taxed as if an order for proof had been issued at the time that the interlocutor of 3rd November 1905 was pronounced, but that beyond that no distinction could be made in respect that it is a patent case between the present cause and any other.

The Lord President.—My Lords, Lord Johnston has reported to your Lordships a question that arises upon the taxation of an account. The case is the sequel of the Mica Insulator Co. v. Bruce Peebles & Co., which is reported in the 7th volume of Fraser, page 944. But it is as well to state, in order to make no confusion, that after the interlocutor which is appended to the report in that case the parties came back, and, on 3rd November 1905, your Lordships, having considered certain Minutes of Amendment, of new closed the record and remitted the case to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therein as accords. The parties then went back to the Outer House, and for the moment nothing was done; but, when the case was enrolled with the view of having a diet of proof fixed, a Minute of Abandonment was handed in for the pursuers, which, of course, was sustained on the ordinary terms—that is to say, on payment of full expenses, which is the condition imposed by the Judicature Act; and the question now for your Lordships, on the report of the Lord Ordinary, is upon the taxation of these expenses.

The Auditor, conceiving himself bound strictly by the terms of the third General Regulation of the Regulations appended to the Act of Sederunt of 1876, and finding that the original order for proof had been recalled by the Inner House and had not been technically replaced, considered that he was disentitled from allowing any expenses connected with anything that might be called preliminary investigation. The Auditor, in a note appended to his taxation of the account, pointed out that he considered that somewhat of a hardship in the present case; and the Lord Ordinary, who, in his written report, has gone fully into the subject, comes to this conclusion—that he should personally be prepared to direct the Auditor to allow such expenses as were properly incurred in preliminary enquiries to enable the defence to be properly stated.

Now, my Lords, on the argument we have had addressed to us, really three different questions arise. The first question was whether the expenses—"full expenses"—which are imposed statutorily by the Judicature Act as a condition of sustaining a minute of abandonment meant anything different from expenses. My Lords, in one sense I do not think they do, but in another sense the words are not pleonastic. I think the meaning of "full expenses," as used in the Judicature Act, is this: that it took away by statute from the judge the power which the judge would otherwise have of modifying expenses. The minute of abandonment can only be sustained if full expenses are paid, and not modified expenses. But, then, "full expenses" means, I think, expenses as between party and party, and does not admit of any other plan of taxation such as, exempli gratia, between agent and client. And, accordingly, for practical purposes, "full expenses" in a minute of abandonment means precisely the same thing as "with expenses" when expenses without any qualification are awarded in an ordinary action. In other words, you are remitted to the ordinary rule of taxation. Now, that was the first question.

The second question was a question which arose upon the terms of the Patent Act, upon which Mr Sandeman submitted an ingenious argument. It raised an important point which, I think, must be decided once for all. The 29th section of the Patent Act sets forth certain regulations as to what must be done in legal proceedings. In particular, it deals with the delivery of what it calls particulars, and then comes the section on which Mr Sandeman founded—sub-sect. 6, which I shall quote in a moment. Now, your Lordships have already determined, inter alia, in this very case, that that 29th section of the Patent Act must always be read along with the 107th section, which entirely saves Scottish procedure. Now, my Lords, I venture to say so far as the 29th section is concerned, although I quite feel that it is a direction to us which we are bound to attend to just as much as English judges are bound to attend to it, yet really the 29th section does nothing which the law of Scotland would not have done without it. First of all, take these branches of it which deal with the delivery of particulars and the provision that unless particulars are delivered, proof shall not be allowed upon these matters. That really is no more than an expression of what our ordinary practice rules are with regard to statements on record. We should not, quite apart from that, have ever allowed, in a patent case, a person to go in, for instance, to a proof of prior user or prior disclosure unless he had given notice of it on record. And accordingly we have held already that sect. 29 does not make it necessary in Scotland to deliver a paper headed with the name of Particulars, but that the object of it is perfectly well attained by giving notice on record in the ordinary way. Well, now, I come to the sub-section, which we have to deal particularly with here, and that says this: — [His Lordship read sub-section 6]. My Lords, I venture to think that that, again, is an expression of what our ordinary practice would have done without it. In our views of audit, we should never have allowed the costs of parts of the case that had been found to be entirely useless and did not contribute to the case at all or the eventual issue of the case at all. Of course, when you come to apply a rule of that sort to a case there are difficult questions of degree; but that is neither here nor there, the general rule is clear enough. Why that particular sub-section was put in I do not know; but I do not think it would be a difficult guess to suppose that it was put in to meet some sort of abuse which it was considered had arisen in the English practice. And, more than that, one can easily see that the phrase, as it is, had this effect in England, that it relegated the matter to the determination of the judge. Now, my Lords, although in one sense I have no right to know anything of these matters, because it is not my system of law, yet it is common knowledge, and I do know that there are in England many matters regulated by the Master which, in Scotland, are always under the determination of the judge. The effect of that section is, in England, to take these things out of the cognisance of the Master and bring them directly before the judge. And, therefore, again, if I hazard another guess, I think that that had very likely something to do with the genesis of the section. That sort of provision is, of course, of no use in Scotland, where all these matters are directly under the cognisance of the judge. And, therefore, my Lords, what it comes to is this—are your Lordships to deal with this sub-section as putting on us a statutory requirement that there should be a certificate under the hand of the judge in order to deal with what is an auditor's question? I do not think that that sub-section was meant to operate in that way at all; and I think, taken along with sect. 107, we are still entitled to go according to our own procedure in which, allowed to run in its own natural channels, we shall entirely carry out the whole spirit of the enactment that is in sub-sect. 6 of sect. 29.

The Lord President.

Well, now, that question being put out of the way, we come to the next and only other question—whether the particular taxation here has been right. My Lords, the case in this matter is somewhat peculiar. It is not a thing that can very easily recur. The course of the case was this: The pursuers came into Court alleging an infringement by the defenders, but the infringement not of a thing but of a process. Well, they had a discussion in the Outer House, and, apparently, there was some difficulty. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. The defenders reclaimed, and said there was not sufficient specification in the pursuers' complaint to enable them to meet it, and, in particular, that the pursuers had not told them the way in which the defenders had infringed their process. It is evident that there is all the difference in the world between a process and a thing in this matter. If it had been that the defenders had made a certain machine or a certain thing which was like the pursuers', they would need no more specification; but if the defenders have infringed a process, the pursuers must tell in what way the particular process has been infringed. That argument prevailed in the Inner House, and the Inner House thought that, as the action stood, it really was not relevant for want of specification; but, as in all cases where the action is not relevant for want of specification, they gave the pursuers an opportunity of amending. In order to let them amend, it was necessary to get out of the way the formal order for proof standing in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. Accordingly, the first step was to recal the order for proof, and give the pursuers an opportunity of amending. Parties did amend, as I pointed out, and, having amended and having made what, in the view of the Inner House, was a relevant record as being not wanting in specification, the record was of new closed and the case remitted to the Lord Ordinary. Now, of course, a formal order for proof was not renewed, but there was no other possible order which the Lord Ordinary could pronounce. Accordingly, my Lords, my view is that, when the case went back from the Inner House, it was truly in the same situation as if an order for proof had been pronounced. The General Regulations attached to the Act of Sederunt are, of course, of the highest authority, but they are only regulations. They are merely a set of rules which the Court gives out for the guidance of the Auditor. They are not rules which any one Division sitting by itself can in any way set aside, because they have the authority of the whole Court, by which one Division is bound. But, on the other hand, they are not a statute where one must necessarily stick upon the mere letter of what has been enjoined; they are merely rules for our guidance, of which we are fully entitled to interpret the spirit.

Therefore, my Lords, I am of opinion that we are entitled to say to the Auditor that, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, the spirit of the third rule is carried out by holding that here it is in the same position as if an order for proof had been pronounced. But then, my Lords, I am bound to say I do not think that leads to the result to which the Lord Ordinary seems to have come, because he says that he would allow such expenses as were properly incurred in preliminary enquiries to enable the defence to be properly stated. Now, my Lords, unless there is a distinction between patent cases and other cases—and there is no distinction raised by the terms of the Act—I see no ground for subjecting the pursuers to the expenses of the defenders in making their case. They may have, according to the General Regulations, the expense of precognition even although in the long last the proof, with a view to which those precognitions were taken, never is held, because the case has got into such a position that they were in good faith in going on and making their preparations for that proof which was necessarily the future of the case—if the case went on. It is a perfectly different thing to say that they are to have the expense of finding out what their defence is to be. It may be that there is a little hardship in it. There is always a certain amount of hardship in defending yourself against an unjust claim. But, at the same time, any opposite rule would lead to inextricable confusion. You must hold that defenders, when they are called into Court by pursuers, know their own defence. In most cases they do. Patent cases are so far peculiar that, though they may know their own defence in the infringement proper, they may not know the whole possibilities of their defence in the way of attacking the pursuer's patent, and as prudent people they may think it is a better means of defending themselves rather to direct a counter-attack against the pursuer's patent than to rely exclusively upon the fact that they had not infringed the patent.

On the whole matter, my Lords, I am, upon the Lord Ordinary's report, in favour of issuing an order to the Auditor that this account should be taxed in this case in the same way as if in this case an order for proof had been pronounced in so many words at the time the interlocutor of 3rd November was pronounced; but that beyond that no distinction can be made between this case in respect that it is a patent case and any other.

The appellant was on 10th May arrested on a charge of having, on 17th April, committed the crime of rape. He applied on the date of arrest for liberation on finding bail; and the Sheriff-Substitute, having heard the agent of the accused and the procurator-fiscal, refused the prayer of the petition in hoc statu. On 20th May the accused again presented the petition for liberation on finding bail, and the Sheriff again refused the prayer of the petition, adding the following:—"Note. On the authority of Wilson v. M'Guire, 20th June 1889, 16 R. (J.C.) 89, I consider I am bound to refuse bail in cases of rape where the public prosecutor, as here, objects."

The accused appealed to the High Court of Justiciary.

The Bail (Scotland) Act 1888 provides:—

Sect. 2. The Act passed in the first Parliament of His Majesty King William the Third, intituled "An Act for preventing Wrongous Imprisonment and undue delay in Trials," so far as the same relates to bail, is hereby repealed, and from and after the passing of this Act all crimes and offences, except murder and treason, shall be bailable, and any magistrate having jurisdiction to try the offence or to commit the accused until liberated in due course of law may henceforth, at his discretion, on the application of any person who has been committed until liberation in due course of law for any crime or offence, except murder or treason, and after opportunity shall have been given to the prosecutor to be heard thereon, admit or refuse to admit such person to bail; and such application shall be disposed of within twenty-four hours after its presentation to the magistrate, failing which the accused shall be forthwith liberated.

Argued for the Appellant: There was no such rule as the Sheriff-Substitute thought had been laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk in Wilson v. M'Guire. Such a rule would be contrary to the express provisions of the Bail Act 1888. A different view was taken by Lord Kyllachy in an unreported case of Kay in 1904. The Court was bound to exercise their discretion in every case. The circumstances in Wilson's case were exceptional; it was a very serious case. In the present case the alleged crime was committed on 17th April; the accused was a married man who was carrying on a business; he remained quietly at home attending to business in the ordinary way from the date of the alleged crime till he was arrested on 10th May, and there was no prima facie reason to suppose that, if liberated, he would disappear before the trial. The story told by the woman was very difficult to believe, and was uncorroborated by the medical evidence or any other witnesses.

The Court stopped counsel for the appellant and called upon the Solicitor-General, who stated that, having investigated the facts in the present case, he was willing that liberation on bail should be granted.

The Court granted liberation on the accused finding bail for £50.

The Lord Justice-General.—The Solicitor-General has consented to liberation being granted on bail, and there is therefore no further question in this case. But, as the matter of the discretion of the Court in granting liberation on bail in such cases has been mooted, it is right that I should deal with it. I cannot help thinking that a misunderstanding has arisen from the fact of the rubric in Wilson v. M'Guire going further than the Lord Justice-Clerk's judgment warrants. I do not think that his Lordship meant to say more than that, in a case in which bail is asked, if the Lord Advocate objects to it being granted, and states the grounds on which he does so, the Court will be very slow indeed to do anything contrary to his judgment. He certainly did not mean to lay down a rule that in cases of rape the Crown ought not to grant consent. That the Court has the power to grant liberation on bail I do not think can be doubted. If the Lord Advocate assures the Court that in his view the effect of that will in all likelihood be to defeat the ends of justice by the prisoner absconding, as the Lord Advocate's only object must be to secure his presence at the trial, the Court will no doubt give weight to that statement. If it is thought that is not likely to happen, there is no reason why liberation should not be granted. The relations between the Lord Advocate and the Court in this country have happily always been such as to make it unlikely that the Court would grant liberation on bail in the face of objection such as I have mentioned, but that is all that can be said. In the present case no more need be said than that the Solicitor-General has consented to liberation being granted.

Lord M'Laren.—It must be kept in view that in the earlier stages of a criminal investigation the procurator-fiscal is the person who knows most about the circumstances of the case, but the duty of deciding whether bail should be accepted or not is cast upon the magistrate to whom the application is made.

I think it is in accordance with good sense and justice that great weight should be given to the representations of the procurator-fiscal on this question, if, for example, he states that he has good reason to fear that the accused will go away and forfeit his bail. But it cannot be doubted that on a sound construction of the Bail Act of 1888 it was intended that the discretion as to granting or refusing an application for bail should lie with the magistrate.

Process — Competent and Omitted — Decree for Expenses in Name of Agent Disburser — Suspension Incompetent on Ground that Agent in Whose Name Decree has Gone Out is Not the Agent Disburser or is Not a Duly Qualified Law Agent.

In this Note of Suspension and Interdict the facts and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, repelled the reasons for suspension.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is a suspension of a charge on an extract decree dated 19th and 21st July 1906, pronounced by the Sheriff-Substitute in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Dunoon. The charge is to make payment of the expenses of an action of declarator and removing brought by the complainer, who is a writer in Glasgow, against a Mr Duncan.

The terms of the interlocutor of 19th July are as follows:—"Dunoon, 19th July 1906. Act. Rennie, Alt. James.—The Sheriff-Substitute having heard parties on the objections to the Auditor's report on the defender's account of expenses, and on the motion for the defender, to allow the decree for expenses to go out and be extracted in name of Mr William James, solicitor, Greenock, the agent disburser thereof, makes avizandum with the cause.

"Scott Moncrieff Penney."

By the interlocutor of 21st July the Sheriff-Substitute repelled the objections stated by the pursuer (the complainer in the present suspension) to the Auditor's report; approved of the report; found that the expenses due amounted to £43, 10s. 5½d., and for this sum, along with £1 of a debate fee, he granted decree against the pursuer, and allowed "said decree to go out in name of the defender's agent (Mr James) as agent disburser." The respondent in the present suspension is Mr James.

The grounds on which suspension is sought are . . . . (fourth) that Messrs M'Ilwraith & Walker, writers, Greenock, were the agents for Mr Duncan, the defender in the action; that Mr James was merely in their employment, and was not the agent disburser. A further plea was added after the discussion in the Procedure Roll, and after proof had been allowed, that the respondent was not at the time he made the motion for expenses entitled under the Law Agents Acts 1873 and 1891 to act as agent in the cause or to recover costs therein. . . .

The procedure in the case was as follows:—An account of defender's expenses was lodged and taxed by the Auditor on 16th July 1906. On the same day the complainer lodged objections to the taxed account. A copy of these objections was sent the same day to Messrs M'Ilwraith & Walker, writers, Greenock, as agents for Mr Duncan. Mr James is a qualified law agent in the employment of Messrs M'Ilwraith & Walker. On the 16th of July, in the Sheriff-Clerk's office, the complainer tendered a caveat to secure that intimation should be given to him of any motion for decree for expenses in name of Mr James. . . .

I have left to the end two points which were strongly urged on behalf of the complainer. The first is that Mr James was not "the procurator who conducted the suit" within the meaning of sect. 106 of the Act of Sederunt of 1839. It was maintained that the "procurator who conducted the suit" meant the same thing as the agent disburser, and that it was Mr Walker and not Mr James who disbursed all the expenses in connection with the case. The second point is contained in the amendment to Statement 9, viz.—that the respondent is not, and was not at the time be obtained the decree, a certificated enrolled law agent, or at least that he had not paid the duties for the period then current entitling him to act as a law agent; and that accordingly he was not entitled under the Law Agents Act 1873 and 1891 to act as agent in the cause, or to recover costs therein. I do not consider it necessary to express an opinion upon the merits of either of these pleas. I consider that the complainer is barred by the exception of competent, and omitted from maintaining either of them as a reason for the present suspension. The decision in the case of Ewing v. Wallace, 1832, 6 W. and S. 222, seems to me a sufficient authority to cover both pleas.

I am accordingly of opinion that the reasons for suspension should be repelled.—1*st June* 1907.

Property — Servitude — Access—Lane—Implied Grant — Grant Interpreted with Reference to Actings of Feuar Known to Superior At, and Shortly After, Date of Grant.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Low.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 436.)

The pursuer reclaimed against an interlocutor of Lord Low assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the action, these conclusions being for (1) declarator that the pursuer had a servitude right of access to a lane bounding her property, and (2) interdict against the defenders interfering with the lane in such a way as to obstruct the pursuer's right of access.

The case was heard on 12th June 1906, when the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was recalled and a proof was allowed. Proof was led before Lord M'Laren on 25th July 1906. The case was again heard on 15th and 16th November 1906, and 29th January 1907.

By feu contract entered into between the pursuer and the defender, Henry M. M. Hamilton, that defender feued to the pursuer—

All and whole that portion of ground, part of the entailed estate of Raploch, lying in the parish of Dalserf and county of Lanark, containing Eight hundred and sixty-eight square yards and eight square feet or thereby, equal to Twenty-eight poles and seventy-two one-hundredth parts of a pole imperial measure; bounded on the north-west by west by the central line of an intended road or street to measure thirty feet in breadth, and running in a parallel direction to Raploch Street, along which it extends forty-six feet or thereby; on the north-east by north by ground about to be feued to Hugh Mackay, along which it extends One hundred and seventy feet or thereby on a line at right angles to the said road or street; on the south-east by east by an intended lane to measure Twenty feet in breadth, along which it extends Forty-six feet or thereby; on the south-west by south by ground feued to George and Thomas Thomson, along which it extends One hundred and seventy feet or thereby on a line at right angles to the said road or street, all as delineated on the feuing plan of Larkhall, prepared by Kyle, Dennison & Frew, civil engineers and land surveyors in Glasgow.

Among the conditions of the contract were the following, viz.:—

. . . . Further, the said piece of ground above disponed is so disponed always with and under the provisions, declarations, stipulations, burdens, prohibitions, restrictions, and others following, videlicet: —First. . . . Second. The said second party and her foresaids shall be bound and obliged forthwith to erect a dwelling-house or dwelling-houses which shall be capable of yielding a yearly rent equal to at least treble the feu-duty after mentioned, and to uphold the same so as to yield that rent in all time coming; . . . . and in the event of the said second party or her foresaids using the ground floor of said tenement as dwelling-houses, such houses shall have their respective kitchens to the back of said buildings, with access by a back door to the court or yard behind the same, through which door all water and refuse of every description shall be carried and deposited, the water in the sinks to be constructed in the back courts, and the refuse in the ashpits or dung-steads to be erected behind the said buildings as after mentioned, and no water or refuse of any description from said buildings shall be taken out of said houses by the doors fronting said intended road or street, or deposited on the said intended road or street; . . . . the second party and her foresaids shall be bound and obliged to satisfy and obtain the approval of the said first party or his foresaids as to the said dwelling-house or dwelling-houses and one-storey building so to be erected upon the said piece of ground hereby feued, and to exhibit to them and obtain the approval of all plans in connection with the same before the buildings are commenced, and which plans and erections the said first party or his foresaids shall have power to approve of or reject as they shall think proper.

This defender subsequently feued to John Hamilton, who was also called as a defender in the action, another piece of ground which included part of the solum of the lane which was described as the south-east by east boundary of the pursuer's feu, and over which the servitude was claimed in the present action.

Among the facts established by the proof were: That the "intended lane" had been formed before the pursuer's house was built; that a house had been built on the pursuer's feu without leaving sufficient room at the sides for carrying refuse which might be taken out at the back door round to the front entrance; that from the time the pursuer occupied her house in 1898 till 1904, when John Hamilton closed the lane, the pursuer had been in use to take in coals and manure, and to remove garden and house refuse by the lane; and that the lane had been used by neighbouring feuars in the same way.

Argued for Reclaimer: The references to the lane and the street in the feu contract were in pari casu. Without access to the lane the pursuer could not fulfil the conditions of her feu. That implied a right of access by the lane. The surrounding facts and circumstances must be taken into account, and the facts and circumstances proved in evidence showed that the intention of parties here was that a right of access by this lane should be given. The case was ruled by Argyllshire Commissioners of Supply v. Campbell, 1885, 12 R. 1255. Counsel also referred to Walton Brothers v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 1876, 3 R. 1130; M'Laren v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Co., 1878, 5 R. 1042; Louttit's Trs. v. Highland Railway Co., 1892, 19 R. 791.

Argued for Respondent: There was no actual grant of a right of access, and no such right was necessarily implied. The reference to the lane in the plan and feu contract was merely for the purposes of identifying the subjects and fixing the boundaries (Free St Mark's Church Trs. v. Taylor's Trs., 1869, 7 M. 415; Shearer v. Peddie, 1899, 1 F. 1201).

The Court found that under the terms of the feu contract libelled, as explained by the subsequent actings of the parties, the pursuer had a contract right to an access to her feu from a lane there described; found that the lane having been formed by the superior, was appropriated to the use of the pursuer and the other feuars, to whom like rights had been granted; and continued the cause with a view to the disposal of the conclusions for interdict.

Lord M'Laren.—In this case the pursuer, Mrs Boyd, who is proprietor of a feu in Avon Street, Larkhall, claims to be entitled by contract with the superior to the use of a lane which runs parallel to Avon Street, and gives access to the back of the house by a door opening to the area of the feu. There is a considerable number of circumstantial cases in the reported decisions raising the same question under varying conditions, but I am not in a position to say that the law is so well defined that it is possible to extract from the decisions a definite criterion for determining whether an approach or an access referred to in the title deeds by way of description and followed by use, amounts to an obligation to warrant the right of access. On the one hand, I think it may be taken that a mere reference to a lane or other access in a bounding description does not necessarily imply a continuing right. But such a description, taken in connection with expressions in the deed which imply that the access is to be used for the purposes of the feu, may be the foundation of a claim to the use of the access in perpetuity. When this is followed by possession brought to the knowledge of the superior or his agents, and when the possession is clearly referable to the feuar's title, I think we have all elements that are necessary in a question between superior and feuar to establish a contract right.

The opinion I have formed on the merits of this case will, I think, be most easily explained if I begin by examining the import of the decisions in cognate cases, which I shall do very shortly, taking them in the order of their dates. It is not necessary to go back to the case of Gordon v. The New Club, 1818, 6 Dow 87, and cases of that class, which have settled that neither the exhibition of a feuing-plan, nor even a general reference to a feuing-plan in a feu charter or contract, will bind the superior in a question with the feuar to what is shown on the plan. A plan, it is well understood, is only a pictorial description, and it is only incorporated with the title to the extent and for the purposes for which it is referred to in the deed of title.

To this principle we may refer the case of Free St Mark's v. Taylor, 1869, 7 M. 415, where the question was whether there was a contract between the pursuers and the original proprietor, from whom both the parties derived right, to leave space for a street between their respective properties. The property was described as bounded on the east by the central line of a proposed street, and the street was delineated on a plan referred to in the conveyance. But there was no obligation laid either on the purchaser or on the seller, who retained the property of the other half of the proposed street, not to build up to the central line. So far as I can gather from the report there was nothing either in the context of the deed, or in the possession following on it, from which a contract could be implied to make or maintain a street corresponding to the bounding description. In these circumstances the second disponee was held to be entitled to build up to the line which was the boundary of his property.

This decision may be compared with that in the previous case of Barr v. Robertson, 1854, 16 D. 1049, where damages were claimed in respect of the shutting up of a street shown on a plan which was held to be for certain purposes imported into the feu-contract. Now, while the judgment was adverse to the pursuer's claim, it is recognised in the opinions of Lord President M'Neill and Lord Rutherfurd that the descriptive boundary would give the feuar a right to have a street fronting his feu, and of the specified breadth. To that extent the right of the feuar was not disputed, that the existence of the right entered into the ground of judgment, because the question considered by the judges in their opinions was to what extent and effect were the plan and the description made part of the contract between superior and feuar.

In the next of the leading cases, Argyllshire Commissioners of Supply v. Campbell, 1885, 12 R. 1255, the principle of determining such questions by the criterion of contract right was farther developed, for in that case the Court gave weight to the actings of the feuar, not contested at the time by the superior, as evidence of the intention of the parties that a lane referred to in the bounding description of the feu right was to be available as an access. The Lord President, in particular, in his exposition of the legal question, begins by stating that if the matter had rested entirely on the terms of the title it might be questioned whether the description of the feu as bounded by a lane would imply that the feuars were to have the right of access by that lane. But then, he says, the question does not by any means arise purely in that form. Then his Lordship points out that, under the deed, buildings adapted to a particular purpose were to be erected subject to approval by the superior; and following upon that provision a building was erected with an entrance from the lane to the back part of the premises, and with a window looking out upon the lane. Now in that case the superior had by a later grant given off a feu which was held to include the solum of the lane; and as the result of the decision the Commissioners were held to have right to the access, and had interdict against the second feuar, restraining him from building on the lane.

It is safe to say that the case of the Argyllshire Commissioners is a very important decision, and has been so treated, and it is quite in accord with the principle of that decision that subsequent cases of the same character have been treated as circumstantial cases, and that the feuar has not always been successful in establishing a contract right to the access which he claimed. I merely note that in the case of Louttit's Trs. v. Highland Railway Co., 1892, 19 R. 791, the railway company admitted their obligation to pay damages to the feuar. The Lord President's observations to the effect that the obligation to give an access is satisfied by maintaining such accesses as existed at the time, is, I think, a statement of the general rule of law, and is in no way inconsistent with the principle of the Argyllshire case. To the same effect Lord Low in his opinion in the case of Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society Ltd., 1895, 23 R. 209, reserves the question of what would be the feuar's right if a road had been in existence in the line referred to.

I must, however, refer a little more fully to the latest case in this Division of the Court, the case of Shearer v. Peddie, 1899, 1 F. 1201, because I look upon it as an illustration of the kind of case to which the principle of the Argyllshire case could not be applied so as to establish a right of access in favour of the feuar. The important elements in that case were, first, that according to the scheme of allotment of the eleven houses constituting Kilmailing Terrace, each feuar by his title acquired right to the property of the part of the lane situated behind his house; second, that while certain conditions were inserted in each disposition for the benefit of other feuars, the use of the lane was not one of these conditions, and the right could not be maintained on the principle of community of interest; and third, that the feuar who claimed to hold his part of the lane free from a servitude was the proprietor of the lot first given off, and his feu-right contained no reservation in favour of the superior or subsequent disponees of a right to use the portion of the feu on which it was proposed to form a lane. Under these conditions it was held that any use which had been made of the subject by other feuars depended on the tolerance of the owner of the feu, and could be recalled. In this case the relation of superior and feuar did not exist between the parties respectively claiming and disputing the right of access. It was really a question between two feuars, one of whom successfully maintained that his right was unrestricted.

Boyd v. Hamilton and Others.

Lord M'Laren.

I think it results from the decisions that in a question between a superior and a feuar who claims a right incidental to the use of his feu, the question is rather in the region of contract than of strict property law, and that evidence of acts done by the feuar in the assertion of the right is admissible to interpret the title, or at least to bar the superior from disputing the interpretation of the title which has been acted on with his knowledge, and presumably with his consent.

In the present case the first point made by the pursuer is that the feu is described as being bounded "on the south-east by east by an intended lane to measure twenty feet in breadth, along which it extends forty-six feet or thereby." This lane was formed, though it may be observed that the surface of the lane has not been put into good order, and its situation, which corresponds with the description, is nearly parallel to the street which is the principal access. In the conditions of feu which follow, the character of the house or houses to be erected is described, and it is provided that the houses shall have their respective kitchens to the back of the main buildings with access by a back door to the court or yard behind the same, "through which door all water and refuse of every description shall be carried and deposited"; and after further provisions to the like effect it is provided that no refuse of any description shall be taken out of the houses by the doors fronting said intended road or street, or deposited on said intended road or street. I ought to have noticed that the street fronting the houses is in the bounding clause described as an intended road or street to measure thirty feet in breadth. This, accordingly, is not the case of a feu abutting on a completed street, but bounded in another direction by a projected street or lane. Both lines of communication are in the region of intention, and it cannot be said that ex facie of the deed the implied obligation to grant ish and entry is satisfied by one access rather than the other. Passing from the point and reverting to the clause last quoted, I venture to think that there is here a strong implication that the feuar was empowered to use the lane at the rear of his building for the removal of the ashes and other refuse specified which he was prohibited from taking out of the house by the main door or depositing on the adjacent street. It is hardly conceivable that a feuar should agree to be bound by the prohibition unless it was intended that as matter of contract he was to remove the refuse by the lane described in his title, and which, when formed, would be available and suitable for this purpose.

In this question it is, of course, necessary that we should consider the whole deed; but I do not propose to read it ad longum, and the only other clause which I shall quote is the clause under which the feuar is taken bound to satisfy and obtain the approval of the superior as to the dwelling-house or houses to be erected, and to exhibit to him and obtain his approval of all plans in connection therewith before the buildings are commenced. I refer to this clause because the pursuer sets forth in the condescendence that the two semi-detached houses which she has erected on the feu substantially occupy the whole breadth of the feu, so that on the one side there is only a space of a few inches between the house and the boundary, and on the other side only a space of two feet clear, which, if a boundary wall was erected separating this from the adjoining feu, would be reduced to about eighteen inches. This statement is supported by the proof, and as it would not be possible to carry the refuse from the rear of the house to the front by a passage eighteen inches wide, and as the feuar is prohibited from removing it by the front door, I think it is a fair inference that the houses were so built in reliance on the implied representation in the feu-contract that a lane was to be constructed at the rear of the buildings for the accommodation of the feuars.

But, further, I think it must be taken that the plans for the pursuer's houses were exhibited to the superior or his authorised agents in conformity with the condition to that effect; and the superior must be taken to have assented to the erection of the houses on a plan which made it impossible that the refuse from the house could be removed consistently with the conditions of feu otherwise than by means of the lane.

It is proved by the evidence of the contractor that the lane was formed under the instructions of the superior's factor in 1894–95, and the pursuer's son, who was then in the service of his father, a builder to trade, says that their house was begun to be built about February 1896, and that the lane was then fully completed. The lane was regularly used by the pursuer and by the other feuars in the street until 1904, when it was closed and a fence run across it by John Hamilton, one of the defenders. The closing of the lane is defended on the ground that the superior had conveyed to John Hamilton the property of his feu in terms which included the solum of the lane ex adverso of his feu. But it is plain that if the superior had already given to Mrs Boyd and the other feuars a contract right to the use of the lane, he could only convey the solum of part of the lane subject to the uses already vested in the other feuars, and on that assumption neither John Hamilton nor the superior had the power of closing the lane. Now, in my opinion the pursuer had a right to the use of the lane. The clauses of the feu contract on which I have commented go far to establish such a right apart from subsequent use. But assuming that they fall short of what is necessary to prove a contract, I think that taken in connection with the erection of a house with the superior's approval, to which the use of a back lane was an indispensable adjunct, and taking into account also the uninterrupted use of the lane for eight years, the superior must be taken to have made an irrevocable appropriation of the lane to the use of the feuars in fulfilment of his implied engagement to them, and that it is not in his power to withdraw the use of the lane, or to confer on any other person an unqualified right to the solum thereof, and thus to deprive the pursuer of her access. It follows, in my opinion, that the pursuer is entitled to decree substantially in terms of the conclusions of the action.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree, although I have found the case to be a somewhat difficult one. Not that I think there is any difficulty in the law, arising from conflict of decisions, or doubt as to the principles of the law to be applied, but I find some difficulty in reference to the inferences of fact which are to be drawn from the facts and circumstances in this case. I do not think the pursuer can maintain a right of access founded upon a grant implied from fact alone, but I think the case of the Argyllshire Commissioners of Supply is authority for holding that the true interpretation of a boundary description such as we have here in question is to be arrived at, not only from the terms of the description in reference to the other clauses of the grant, but also with reference to facts and circumstances at the time when the grant was made and the conduct of the parties immediately after the grant. I take it upon that decision that a grant described as bounded by a lane, or an intended lane, may mean by a way of access which the granter has made or undertakes to make, or it may be a mere description of adjoining property by which the grant is limited. But in considering which is the true meaning we must take all the facts into account. On that part of the case I have come to the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived, and for the reasons you have given, which I consider it unnecessary to repeat. I only add that there is, to my mind, no legal difficulty created by the subsequent conveyance of part of the land to another feuar, because an effectual servitude may be created without any written constitution of the servitude, and the new feuar has the full benefit of the conveyance of the property of the land subject to a servitude right already created.

On 28th December 1905 Hugo Knoblauch, merchant, Leith, wrote to Messrs Philp & Co., Largo, Fife, in the following terms:—

"Dear Sirs,—I am offering to-day Plate Linseed for January/February shipment to Leith, and have pleasure in quoting you 100 tons at 41/3, usual Plate terms. I shall be glad to hear if you are buyers, and await your esteemed reply.—Yours truly, Hugo Knoblauch."

On 29th December Messrs Philp & Co. replied by telegram in the following terms:—"Accept hundred January/February Plate 41/3 Leith per steamer Leith—Philp." They also sent the following letter:—

"Largo, 30th Dec. 1905.

"Dear Sir,—Your favour of yesterday came duly to hand, and this forenoon we wired you as per enclosed copy, thus buying from you 100 tons Plate Linseed, January/February steamer shipment usual contract.—Yours truly, Alex. Philp & Co."

Thereafter Messrs Philp & Co. having called upon Mr Knoblauch to fulfil the contract for the sale of 100 tons linseed which they alleged was constituted by the offer contained in his letter and their acceptance thereof, Mr Knoblauch denied that any such contract had been entered into. Messrs Philp & Co. thereupon bought in 100 tons linseed and raised this action against Mr Knoblauch for the damage they had suffered, being the difference between the contract price of the linseed and the market price on the day when Mr Knoblauch intimated that he declined to recognise the contract.

The Pursuers pleaded: "1. The defender being in breach of his contract with the pursuers, is liable to them in damages."

The Defender pleaded: "1. The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the Summons.

"2. The averments of the pursuers being unfounded in fact, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

2nd Div.
Philp & Co. v. Knoblauch.

"3. No contract having been entered into by the defender with the pursuers, he is entitled to absolvitor."

On 15th June 1906 the Lord Ordinary [Dundas] pronounced this interlocutor:—"... Sustains the first and third pleas in law for the defender: assoilzies him from the conclusions of the Summons, and decerns."

He delivered the following Opinion:—

Lord Dundas.—This case raises for decision a very short and sharp point, which is not without difficulty, and is to a considerable extent a question of impression. The matter involved is the construction of the defender's letter to the pursuers, dated 28th December 1905. The pursuers aver that by that letter "the defender offered to sell to the pursuers 100 tons Plate Linseed for January/February shipment to Leith, at the price of 41s. 3d. per quarter." This is not, in my judgment, the proper construction of the letter. If it were so, it would not, I think, be easy to affirm within what period the offer, if not recalled, might be accepted by the pursuers,—a very important matter, because, as the facts of the case indicate, the price of Plate Linseed is liable to considerable fluctuation. The defender had apparently a call upon such linseed, which he was entitled to sell. I read his letter as amounting to no more than an intimation to the pursuers of this fact; an enquiry whether they were buyers of Plate Linseed; an expression of willingness to sell to them up to 100 tons, and a quotation of the price at which it stood on the day of writing for their guidance. If this is the correct construction of the letter, it falls short, though perhaps not very far short, of a definite offer, to be closed by acceptance, to sell 100 tons at 41s. 3d. per quarter. In the dealings of the commercial world, I think the letters or telegrams which are said to import a concluded contract must be construed upon their terms, according to the fair and natural meaning of the language employed; and that it is not legitimate to infer, if it is not sufficiently expressed, an offer on the one hand or an acceptance on the other. In this connection the case of Harvey v. Facey, 1893, App. Ca. 552, is interesting and suggestive. In my opinion the defender is entitled to have his first and third pleas in law sustained, and to be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Pursuers reclaimed, and argued: The defender's letter of 28th December and the pursuers' telegram of 29th and letter of 30th December constituted a completed contract of sale.

Argued for the Defender: (1) The letter of 28th December was not an offer to sell, but merely an intimation that the defender was open to deal in linseed (Harvey v. Facey, 1893, A.C. 552). (2) If there was an offer it had not been accepted, as the pursuers did not state that they agreed that "usual Plate terms" was to be a condition of the contract.

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am sorry to differ from the Lord Ordinary, who has carefully considered the case, but I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is erroneous. This first letter of 28th December 1905 is not a letter merely indicating that the defender had certain goods at his disposal and would be glad to enter into negotiations with regard to them, but stated that he had "pleasure in quoting you (the pursuers) 100 tons (of linseed) at 41/3 usual Plate terms," and that he awaited "your esteemed reply." That, I think, was clearly an offer of the 100 tons at a named price. Now, that letter was replied to by a telegram in these terms: "Accept hundred January/February Plate 41/3 Leith per steamer Leith." That was a shorthand way of stating their reply to be followed by a letter. I think the telegram was a very plain acceptance of the 100 tons which the defender had quoted. I think it must be read along with the letter which followed, in which the pursuers say: "We wired you as per enclosed copy, thus buying from you 100 tons Plate Linseed January/February steamers shipment usual contract." The pursuers' telegram, read with their letter, is a very plain acceptance of what I consider is the plain offer contained in the defender's letter of 28th December. Without going nicely into the phraseology used, I am distinctly of that opinion. The only difficulty is the question whether the words used by the pursuers involved an acceptance of the usual Plate terms as a condition of the contract. I think they did, when we read the telegram and the letter together. The telegram "accepts" without any reservation on this point, and the letter contains the words "usual contract," which plainly mean the same thing as the words usual Plate terms in the offer.

The case of Harvey v. Facey, L.R. [1893], A.C. 552, which was quoted to us, has no bearing. That was a case regarding an alleged purchase and sale of heritable property, not a transaction like this in re mercatoria. Further, there was never really an offer. The telegram founded on as an offer was not an offer. It was merely an opening of negotiations; it offered nothing. It was merely an intimation of the lowest price which would be considered if anyone came forward offering it. I have no doubt that decision was right, but it has no bearing here.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree. I should like in addition only to make a single reference to Harvey v. Facey [1893], A.C. 552, cited by the Lord Ordinary. In that case a telegram was sent to the owner of a certain property asking whether he was willing to sell it to the persons making the enquiry, and also asking what was the lowest price; and the telegram in reply stated the lowest price for the property but did not answer the first question. The Privy Council there held (and I do not, of course, question their judgment in the least) that there was no contract, the ground of their judgment being that there was no answer to or agreement on the question first asked, which had to be express, and could not be implied.

But here, I am of opinion that the defender's letter to the pursuers of 28th December, and the pursuers' telegram of 29th December in answer thereto, contained all the conditions necessary to make a concluded agreement. There was no necessity or reason for the defender in that letter quoting to the pursuers a specific quantity and price unless he was prepared to make a contract with them, if buyers, as to which he awaited their reply. That reply could only be received next day, and was sent by telegram as soon as possible. I am of opinion that a contract was thereby concluded, and on usual Plate terms. It is true the telegram does not repeat "on usual Plate terms," but I think that pursuers' telegram plainly implied their consent thereto.

Lord Low.—I agree.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree. I think that the letter of 28th December 1905 contains in the first place a general statement that the defender is selling Plate linseed, and then goes on to make an absolutely definite offer of a specific quantity at a specific price. The defender says: "I shall be glad to hear if you are buyers." This does not mean buyers in general, but buyers of the quantity specified at the price quoted, otherwise there would be no meaning in the phrase which follows, "and await your esteemed reply." This offer was accepted by a telegram dated 29th December 1905, sent before the offer was recalled, and the letter and telegram constitute, in my opinion, a concluded contract for the purchase of the linseed in question.

It was maintained by the defender that there was no concluded contract, because the telegram did not fully meet the offer in respect that it did not refer to "usual Plate terms"; but with regard to a document so plainly in re mercatoria as a telegram, I think the acceptance therein contained, which included a specification of the subject sold, the time of delivery, the quantity and the price, was sufficient, and that it implied an acceptance of the ancillary condition "usual Plate terms." But further, the pursuers' letter of 29th December 1905 contained that condition, and moreover, these "terms" being the invariable conditions for Plate linseed, they must be held to have formed an implied condition of the acceptance unless specially excluded. For these reasons I think it is vain for the defender to plead that there was no concluded contract in respect of the absence in the telegram of a reference to "usual Plate terms."—31*st May* 1907.

32. Hayman & Son v. Thomson M'Lintock and Others.

I. Right in Security—Bill of Lading—Bill of Lading Given by Owner of Goods in Security for Advance Over Goods — Goods Not Delivered to Security-Holder—Rights of Holder of Bill of Lading as Against Trustee in Bankruptcy of Owner of Goods—Observed by The Lord President that the Security-Holder Cannot Lose Possession of the Goods Unless by Losing Possession of the Document of Title.

II. Sale—Sale of Unascertained Goods—Constructive Delivery — Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. cap. 71), sect. 16.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 863.)

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The claimants M'Connell & Reid reclaimed. Counsel for M'Connell & Reid and for J. K. Stewart, whose claims were in the same position, argued: Hayman & Son were personally bound by the terms of the transfer notes delivered to the reclaimers and to Stewart to deliver the flour to them (Benjamin on Sale, 5th ed. p. 865; Godts v. Rose, 1855, 25 L.J., C.P. 61). Hayman & Son came under this obligation on the direct instructions of the sellers, i.e. the bankrupt, and therefore the bankrupt must leave the bags with the custodiers to allow them to implement their obligation. The trustee in bankruptcy could be in no better position than the bankrupt (Knights v. Wiffen, 1870, 5 Q.B. 660; Henderson & Co. v. Williams [1895], 1 Q.B. 521; Macintosh v. Brierly, 1846, 5 Bell's App. 1; Whitehouse and Others v. Frost and Others, 1810, 12 East 613).

Alternatively, assume the Lord Ordinary was right in holding the property in the sacks purchased had not passed. Then there was common ownership in the sacks in Hayman & Son's store (Stair's Institutions, II. 1, 37). The separation could only be done by consent of parties or by the Court. Therefore the bankrupt had a pro indiviso right in the sacks which he validly sold to the purchasers, who completed their right by intimating it to the common agent of the parties, the storekeeper.

Counsel for the claimant Thomson M'Lintock as against the claim of M'Connell & Reid and 1st Div. Hayman & Son v. Thomson M'Lintock and Others.

J. K. Stewart, argued: (1) No right of property ever passed to the purchasers, as the goods were never ascertained (Sale of Goods Act 1893, sect. 13; Black v. Incorporation of Bakers, Glasgow, etc., 1867, 6 M. 137; Pochin & Co. v. Robinows & Marjoribanks, 1869, 7 M. 622, per the Lord President, p. 628; Anderson & Crompton v. Walls & Co., 1870, 9 M. 122). (2) The granting of a delivery order raised no plea of bar against the seller which could be pleaded against his trustee in bankruptcy (M'Ewan v. Smith, 1849, 6 Bell's App. 340; Distillers Co. Ltd. v. Russell's Tr., 1889, 16 R. 479). The argument for Thomson M'Lintock as against the claimants John Stevenson & Moorhead, Watson & Co., appears from the opinion of the Lord President.

Counsel referred to the following authorities: Burdick v. Sewell, 1884, 13 Q.B.D. 159, per Bowen, L.J., p. 170, 10 A.C. 74; Carver's Carriage by Sea, sect. 497; Grange & Co. v. Taylor, 1904, 9 Aspinall 559.

Counsel for the claimant John Stevenson referred to the following authorities: Ritchie v. Scott, 1899, 1 F. 728; Hamilton v. Western Bank of Scotland, 1856, 19 D. 152, per the Lord President, p. 160; Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sect. 47.

Counsel for claimants Moorhead, Watson & Co. adopted the argument for John Stevenson, and argued further: The bill of lading remained a good title to the goods after they were removed from the ship and stored. It was the only operative method of dealing with the goods (Saunders Brothers v. Maclean & Co., 1883, 11 Q.B.D. 327; Short v. Simpson, 1866, 1 C.P. 248).

The Court adhered.

The Lord President. — This is a multiplepoinding, and the subjects in medio are certain bags of flour within the store of one Hayman, who is the pursuer and nominal raiser. He has no interest in the matter whatsoever, and the question arises upon a competition for these bags. Now the course of dealing out of which the question arose was this. There was a miller in America called Seymour Carter, and there was a firm of flour merchants in Glasgow of the name of John M'Nairn & Co., the sole partner of which firm was John Stevenson, and they had business relations with Seymour Carter. The course of business was this, that Carter used to ship bags of flour, and to take bills of lading in the name of himself (Carter) as consignee. He then sent over the bills of lading to his correspondents James Findlay & Co. in Glasgow, along with bills drawn upon M'Nairn & Co.; and M'Nairn & Co., on going to James Findlay & Co. and putting them in funds to retire the bills of exchange, were handed the bills of lading. Having got the bills of lading they could go to the Allan Line, by which the flour was usually sent, and from them get a delivery order to put the flour into a store, Hayman's being the store in which they generally put it. Now, as it suited the ship to get rid of the flour sometimes, if the bills of lading were not presented, the flour was stored in Hayman's store all the same. The storage order was in terms of a form, addressed to the Allan Line, Master Porter Department, which recited that the bill of lading had been presented, and that form was used even when in point of fact the bill of lading was not presented, but in that case there was a notandum added, stating that the flour was stored in the name of the ship. Then when the bill of lading was presented, a second delivery order was got from the Allan Line addressed to the store.

What happened on one occasion was this: that M'Nairn & Co. being short of money went to a Mr Stevenson, who was an uncle of the sole partner of M'Nairn & Co., and asked him if he would give him an advance; and they proposed to give him in security some of the flour which was coming. Stevenson consented to give them an advance of a certain sum, and he gave them a cheque upon his bank, the Commercial Bank, for that amount. With the proceeds of that cheque M'Nairn & Co. went to James Findlay & Co. and got the bills of lading of a certain cargo of flour; and they then handed the bills of lading blank endorsed to the Commercial Bank to hold for Stevenson. The flour was then deposited in Hayman's store in ship's name. Stevenson did nothing after that, and while the flour was still in Hayman's store M'Nairn & Co. went bankrupt. Now the state of affairs when M'Nairn & Co. went bankrupt was that Hayman had a good many bags of flour in his store—more, a good deal, than would satisfy the number of bags which were specified in the bills of lading that had been handed to Stevenson. Taking Stevenson's case, the competition arises between him as in right of these bags in virtue of the bills of lading and the delivery order which he got from the shipping company afterwards, and the trustee.

My Lords, I take Stevenson's case first, because it seems to me to come logically first. Upon this state of the facts we had an excessively ingenious argument from Mr Murray, which was really founded, I think, entirely upon the case of Sewell v. Burdick, 1884, 13 Q.B.D. 159, in the House of Lords, where a shipowner sued the holder of a bill of lading for freight. Whether he was liable as upon the contract of freight depended on the terms of the Bills of Lading Act; and the terms of the Bills of Lading Act which deal with the point are that the person is to be liable if he has the property in the goods. Now Sewell v. Burdick determined — it was an English case—that according to the law of England the question of whether the holder of a bill of lading in security was the holder of the property, or was merely a pledgee, was in each case a question of fact; but in this case they held that he was a pledgee, and that according to the law of England a pledgee in those circumstances had not the property in the goods in the sense of the Bills of Lading Act, but had only a property known to the law of England as a special property. Mr Murray, commenting on that case, suddenly, so to speak, assumed that the law of Scotland was the same as the law of England, for, he said, in this case the property of the goods was not in the pledgee or holder of the security, Stevenson, but was still in the bankrupt, and that, accordingly, the property being in the bankrupt, the result obviously followed that Stevenson could only have a dividend and could not have the actual goods.

I am afraid that though that is ingenious it is too ingenious, and the fallacy rests in suddenly turning an English term to use in Scottish law, and assuming that it is the same. There is no such thing in Scots law as the term special property, and there cannot be, according to the law of Scotland, a distinction between the property and a special property. But the form of security effectuated by what in the law of England is called a special property is perfectly well known in the law of Scotland. There is a very well-known leading authority upon the matter—namely, the case of Hamilton v. Western Bank, 1856, 19 D. 152. I take it to be clear beyond all doubt that when a person gives a document which transfers moveable property he can make a perfectly good security, and that, whatever the law of England may be, the law of Scotland was certainly this, that the condition of affairs in which a pledgee might lose his rights by losing possession, applies only to the proper case of corporeal moveables. It is very often a confusion of ideas or quibble of words to talk of losing possession where what is given to you is not the property itself but documents which transfer the property. You cannot lose possession of the moveables unless you lose the document, and the puzzle which Mr Murray attempted to create about the loss of the possession of the bags is really no puzzle at all, because Mr Stevenson had never lost possession of the bill of lading, and therefore, upon Hamilton v. Western Bank, he holds a perfectly good security.

Mr Murray's senior, the Solicitor-General, really, remembering that this was a nautical case, jettisoned his junior's argument entirely, and he put the case upon perfectly separate grounds. He admitted that there was quite a good security in Mr Stevenson's hands; but then, he said that the security was in the circumstances of no use to him, and for this reason, that these bags of flour were in no way distinguishable: you could not tell one bag from another, and no one could say to what particular 500 bags in the store Stevenson's bills of lading applied. Therefore, said the Solicitor-General, the property is now all immixed, and being immixed it is mine. That is really a sort of new form of alluvia in the person of the trustee which I have never heard of before, and the fallacy of it, I think, can be easily tested by supposing for a moment that Stevenson, instead of being a security holder, had been merely a third party. There is the bankruptcy during which Hayman's store is filled with bags apparently belonging to the bankrupt and bags apparently belonging to this third person; and these bags are so immixed that no one can tell which bags belong to each. If the storekeeper is not in a position to fulfil his contract—that is to say, if he has not bags enough to satisfy his obligation to deliver bags to both the bankrupt and the third party—no doubt a position of some difficulty may arise. But here there is no such difficulty. It is admitted that Hayman has bags enough to satisfy both the claims of the trustee and of Stevenson, and in the circumstances I prefigured, what would have happened would be that the bags all being the same, a number corresponding to the number held by the third party would be handed to him, and the rest handed to the trustee. I do not think that anyone could suppose that there was any difficulty in that situation. If that is the situation, what difference does it make if, instead of being a third party, Stevenson is a person who holds a security over the goods, provided that security has been well constituted? Therefore I think the argument of the Solicitor-General is not so ingenious as that of his junior, and is equally unsound. Upon this matter the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary has come to is perfectly right; and that disposes of the matter so far as Mr Stevenson is concerned.

But there were other claimants, Moorhead, Watson & Company, who are for all practical purposes in precisely the same position as Stevenson, except that the bills of lading were transferred after the cargo was put in the store. In the view I have taken that distinction makes no difference, and therefore Moorhead, Watson & Co.'s case follows that of Stevenson; and that disposes of these two cases.

That leaves 424 bags in the hands of the trustee as representing the bankrupt, and upon these 424 bags arises a subsequent question with persons of the name of M'Connell & Reid and J. K. Stewart. The question arises out of this, that after the bankrupt had got the flour into the store, he entered into a contract of sale of certain of these bags in favour of these parties. There is no question as to the contract of sale of the flour lying in the store; but before anything was done in the way of separating the bags, there came the bankruptcy. The trustee in the bankruptcy appeals simply to the 16th section of the Sale of Goods Act, which specially provides that where there is a sale of unascertained goods the property shall not pass until the goods shall have been ascertained. Here nothing was done to ascertain the goods. These flour bags were not separately marked, and although doubtless if the buyer here had gone to the storekeeper and had got him to put aside the sacks or mark them, or put them into another room, that would have passed the property; yet as he did none of those things, the property, it seems to me, did not pass. It is not enough merely to get an acknowledgment in general terms that so many of those bags belonging to the bankrupt are held for him.

I think, therefore, that there again the Lord Ordinary has taken an entirely right view. It is a perfectly simple question arising solely on the terms of the Act. I am therefore for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord M'Laren.—This is a somewhat involved case, and if I had had any doubt about the result I should have wished to take time to consider it and to unravel its details; but I am satisfied that the Lord Ordinary has decided the various points correctly and in accordance with settled law.

With regard to the sacks of flour which were represented by the bills of lading at the time of M'Nairn & Co.'s bankruptcy, various objections were raised to the right of Mr Stevenson as holder of these bills. In the first place, it was said that the goods were landed, and that Stevenson, the transferee of a bill of lading, was in no better position as owner of the goods than the holder of a delivery order, which would not in all circumstances suffice to pass the property. It may be that at one time the effect of the transference of bills of lading was too rigorously limited to the case of goods which were on board a ship at sea. If Mr Stevenson had advanced the money upon the security of a bill of lading while the goods were actually at sea, although he might have taken the bill in security only, I think no one who was conversant with mercantile law would dispute that Mr Stevenson had a good security upon his bill of lading to the extent of his advances. But I think the later law has settled that the question as to the effect of a bill of lading does not depend upon the arrival, or even the unloading, of the ship, and that a bill of lading must be taken to be an effective document of title representing the goods until these have been actually delivered to the person in right of the bill.

There are some advantages, and there may also be disadvantages, in the rule, as I have stated it, where the storage of the goods has extended over a considerable time; but since the case of Barber v. Meyerstein, 1870, L.R. 4 H.L. 338, I think it must be taken as settled that, although the goods are stored, the delivery of the bills of lading has effect in all respects, whether as a title of property, or whether as a security to the person to whom it has been endorsed or delivered, exactly as if the goods were on board the ship.

If that principle is once admitted, it again disposes of the next argument, which was founded upon the analogy of the delivery order. It is perfectly true that a delivery order is worthless as passing specific property until the goods have been ascertained, but that is exactly the distinction between the effect of a delivery order for goods on shore and a bill of lading. Bills of lading have been long in use, and as far back as we have any knowledge of their use, they were held to be negotiable. Such bills, expressed to be for so many bags of flour or quarters of grain on board a particular ship, would pass by blank indorsation from hand to hand while the ship was at sea. How is it possible, consistently with such a state of the law, that the goods could be specifically ascertained, or that the various persons who took such bills of lading could examine and verify the goods while the ship was in mid ocean? We know that bills of lading are granted for portions of cargo in bulk which cannot, of course, be ascertained; and when bills of lading are granted in these circumstances, they must operate as a transfer of an unascertained quantity of goods on board the ship, until delivery is made in terms of the obligation. Delivery had not been made here, and therefore Mr Stevenson's right to these undelivered goods was as effectual as if they were identified by marks and numbers. . . . I am of opinion, therefore, that on both points the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be adhered to.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

(The Lord Justice-General, Lords M'Laren and Kinnear.)

33. Stott and Shaw v. Renton.

Justiciary Cases—Betting—Advertising by Circular and Handbill—Invitations to Bet—Betting Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. cap. 119), sect. 1—Betting Act 1874 (37 Vict. cap. 15), sect. 3 (3).

Stated Case.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute of the Lothians at Edinburgh, (Gardner Millar), convicting the appellants of contraventions of sect. 1 of the Betting Act 1853, and sect. 3, sub-sect. (3), of the Betting Act, 1874.

The facts were set forth as follows :—

This is a cause brought in this Court under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, at the instance of the respondent against the appellants, charging them—First, that on 15th August 1906, at some post office in Leith or Edinburgh to the respondent unknown, they did send by post to John Hepburn, wire worker, 11 Dalmeny Street, Leith (1) the circular or advertisement produced giving particulars of the terms on which they were prepared to bet with their clients, and containing, inter alia, the statements marked No. 1 set forth in column (I) of Schedule A annexed to the complaint ; (2) the handbill or betting card produced applicable to the making of bets with them on the Cesarewitch and Cambridge Stakes, being horse races to be run on 10th and 24th October 1906, respectively, and containing, inter alia, the statements marked No. 2 set forth in said column (I) of said schedule ; and (3) a betting card, also produced, containing, inter alia, the statements marked No. 3, set forth in column (I) of said Schedule, said card being applicable to bets to be made with them on the football matches therein mentioned and set forth in column (II) of said Schedule, and which were to be played on 18th August 1906, and that they did thus invite the said John Hepburn to make bets with them on said horse races and football matches, being such bets on such events or contingencies as are mentioned in the Betting Act 1853, sect. 1 ; and (Second) that on 14th September 1906, in Links Place, Leith, they did by the hands of John Ward, 77 Albert Street, Edinburgh, their messenger, send, publish, and exhibit to Thomas Donachie, 18 Couper Street, Leith, and to a number of other persons whose names were to the respondent unknown, betting cards containing, inter alia, the statements contained in column (I) of Schedule B annexed to said Complaint, said cards being applicable to bets to be made with them on the football matches therein mentioned and set forth in column (II) of said Schedule B, and which were to be played on 15th September 1906, and that they did thus invite the said Thomas Donachie, and other persons to the respondent unknown, who received said cards, to make bets with them on said football matches, being such bets on such events or contingencies as are mentioned in the Betting Act 1853, sect. 1, and one of said betting cards was produced, all contrary to the Betting Act 1874, sect. 3 (3), whereby the said Samuel Stott and Pearcy Shaw were each liable to the penalties provided by the 7th section of the said Betting Act 1853, with respect to offences under that section.

The complaint was called in Court before me on 9th November 1906, when, before pleading, the agent for the appellants stated the following preliminary pleas, viz. :—

That the complaint is not relevant in respect that (1) the appellants are not charged with having sent the circular, handbill, and betting cards referred to from a house, office, room, or place in terms of sect. 7 of the Betting Act 1853 ; and (2) it was not averred that the said circular, handbill, and betting cards invited the persons referred to in the complaint to resort to a particular house, office, room, or place within the meaning of said Act to make bets with the appellants.

Having heard the agent for the appellants and the respondent, I repelled all of said objections, whereupon the appellants pleaded not guilty, and the case thereafter went to trial.

The following facts were proved :

That the appellants were commission agents or bookmakers, and the only known partners of the firm of Stott & Shaw, turf and football accountants, Leith Hall, Tolbooth Wynd, Leith, at which address they carried on their said business, in the conduct of which each took an active part.

That in pursuance of their said business they were in the practice of sending out to members of the public, circulars, advertisements, handbills, and betting cards in the terms of those produced, and that these were sent, some through the post and others delivered by special messenger.

That on 15th August 1906 the said John Hepburn received through the post the three documents mentioned in the first charge, which were produced and extracts from which are given in Schedule A annexed to the complaint, and that these were sent to him by the appellants.

That on 14th September 1906, in Links Place, Leith, about 1 p.m., the said John Ward was observed handing the betting cards mentioned in the second charge, to workmen who were then passing along the street, and fifteen of said cards were given to the said Thomas Donachie. The names of the others who received said cards were unknown to the respondent. In possession of the said John Ward were found 150 of said cards, which were produced at the trial and extracts from which are given in Schedule B annexed to the complaint.

That the said John Ward was in the employment of the appellants, and that it was by their instructions he delivered said cards to the persons referred to.

That the appellants, in the documents referred to both in the first and second charges, invited the persons to whom these documents were sent, exhibited, or published, to make bets with them on the events or contingencies therein mentioned.

That any money for bets was to be sent to the appellants at their said business premises, and on the circular or advertisement mentioned in the first charge appeared the following statement :—"All business done by letters or telegrams. No callers," and on the betting cards relating to football matches there was a note in the following terms :—"All business is done by letters or telephone. No transactions are entered into by Messrs Stott & Shaw with persons resorting to their premises."

I held in law that as the documents referred to in the first and second charges of the complaint were such documents as are mentioned in sect. 3 of the Betting Act 1874, and were sent, exhibited, and published by the appellants inviting the persons in question to bet with them on the events or contingencies mentioned in said documents—being such bets on such events or contingencies as are mentioned in sect. 1 of the Betting Act 1853—the appellants were guilty of the contraventions charged, and that it was not necessary for the respondent to libel and prove that the appellants kept a betting house within the meaning of the Betting Act 1853, and that the persons to whom they sent invitations to bet were invited to resort to such premises for the purpose of betting. I therefore fined them each £20, being £10 for each offence, which fines were paid.

The Questions of Law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary were :—

1. Should the preliminary pleas hereinbefore set forth, or either of them, have been sustained ?
2. Was it necessary in order to a conviction for a contravention of sect. 3 (3) of the Betting Act 1874, that the respondent, in addition to the facts proved, should also prove that the appellants kept a betting house within the meaning of the Betting Act 1853, and invited the persons to whom they sent invitations to bet, to resort there for the purpose of betting ?

The Betting Act 1853 provides :—

Sect. 1. "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by, or acting for or on behalf of, such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid, as for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race, or other race, fight, game, sport or exercise, or as or for the consideration for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency as aforesaid. . . ."

The Betting Act 1874 provides :—

Sect. 3. "Where any letter, circular, telegram, placard, handbill, card or advertisement is sent, exhibited or published . . . .

"(3) inviting any person to make or take any share in or in connection with any such bet or wager ;

"every person sending, exhibiting or publishing, or causing the same to be sent, exhibited or published, shall be subject to the penalties provided in the 7th section of the principal Act with respect to offences under that section."

Argued for Appellants: The Betting Acts did not make it criminal for one person to invite others to bet. There must be an invitation to bet at a betting house in order to come within the provisions. It was not necessary, however, that there should be physical presence at the betting house, provided there was resort there. The resort might be either physically or by letter. The Act of 1853 struck at the keeping of a certain class of house. That Act was to be read along with the Act of 1874, and the provisions of the later Act were all subsidiary to the ruling provisions as to the keeping of betting houses. The invitation to bet prohibited by sect. 3, sub-sect. (3), of the 1874 Act must be an invitation to bet at a betting house. That element was wanting in the present case, because the persons who were asked to bet were specially warned against going to the address mentioned in the circulars. The bets were not to be made there. That was the interpretation of the statute laid down as correct in Cox v. Andrews, 1883, 12 Q.B.D. 126. That case was directly in point and had never been overruled, although there were dicta in Hawke v. Mackenzie [1902], 2 K.B. 225, which seemed difficult to reconcile with it. But in Hawke's case the Court found in the advertisement a place to which persons were invited to resort, and therefore the decision there was not in point.

Argued for Respondent: There was no limitation in sub-sect. (3) as regards either person or place. The Act of 1853 was referred to, not with any reference to the place where the bet might be entered into, but merely with reference to the nature of the bet to be made. It was not every bet to which the Act referred, but only what might be called sporting bets, which were enumerated in the first section of the 1853 Act. What sub-sect. (3) struck at was the mode in which the bet was entered into. It was the advertising of betting opportunities that was prohibited. The fact that the word "person" was extended by sub-sect. (1) to include persons outside the United Kingdom showed that this was what the statute meant. The distinguishing point in Cox's case was that there there was no actual invitation to bet at all. What the advertiser did was to offer betting information to all who might apply for it, but he did not ask them to bet with him. The present case was exactly in line with the second case in Hawke v. Mackenzie. If resorting was necessary, there was an invitation to resort here, viz., to the address given in the circular. It was well settled that resorting might be by letter (Hart v. Nisbet, 1900, 3 Adam 144; The Queen v. Stoddart [1901], 1 Q.B. 177).

The Court answered both questions in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

High Court of Justiciary

Stott and Shaw v. Renton.

The Lord Justice-General.

The Lord Justice-General.—In this case the complaint is against two persons who call themselves football and turf accountants, who send out handbills and cards in which they invite persons to bet upon the result of races or football matches. The Sheriff-Substitute convicted them of an offence against sect. 3, sub-sect. (3), of the Betting Act 1874; and the conviction is sought to be suspended on the ground that there is not set forth in the Acts charged any true contravention of the statute, in respect those handbills and cards do not invite persons to make bets at any particular place. It is quite true that in the circulars an address is given, but the persons to whom these circulars are given or sent are told that their presence there is not desired; indeed, that they will not be admitted there. It is true they are to make their communications there, but after a communication is made there is no certioration that the bet will be accepted there; and if it is not, say the complainers, there is no bet made at a betting-house, and any betting that may take place is in the same situation as betting between private persons.

I cannot say I have any difficulty about the case, viewing it upon the complaint and the statute. The only difficulty I have arises upon some of the decisions to which we have been referred. It seems to me that the Act of 1853 started with a prohibition against keeping a house for betting. It then went on to penalise a person who advertised a betting house. That Act was felt not to be sufficient, and the Act of 1874 was passed. The third section of that act is in these terms: [His Lordship read the section]. I quite agree with what was said by Mathew, J., in Cox v. Andrews, that the two Acts are to be read together, and the decision in that case was, if I may respectfully say so, perfectly right. The advertisement there struck at was one in which the person said he would send his selections, that is to say, he would tell the names of the horses that were most likely in his opinion to win. But he did not in any way indicate that he desired to make a bet with any person who might come to him for such information. Whether they might make use of the information for betting elsewhere was a matter with which he was not concerned. If sect. 3, sub-sect. (1), was read absolutely literally, the species facti in that case would come within its terms. But of course it was perfectly properly held that the principal Act controls that section, and accordingly, as there was no invitation to bet, it was held that no conviction was allowed.

The other case was Hawke v. Mackenzie. The first case there I do not think causes any difficulty. It was really a repetition of The Queen v. Stoddart, and the point of that case was that a person had advertised in a newspaper that he sent out a coupon on which people might guess the horse which would win a race, and the one who guessed correctly would get a sum of money. That is not, on the face of it, a bet, but the Lord Chief-Justice said truly that in substance it was making a bet.

Stott and Shaw v. Renton.

The Lord Justice-General.

The second case does cause me difficulty, and I am unable to understand it, because in the report the precise character of the advertisement is not disclosed. But, inasmuch as the Lord Chief-Justice says he approves of the decision in Cox v. Andrews, I am bound to guess that the advertisement in the second case was so related to the advertisement in the first that, although in terms it was a proposal to send what are called "tips," taken along with the other it was an invitation to bet. If it was the case of a "tip" pure and simple, it would have fallen under the decision in Cox v. Andrews.

I do not think this case causes such a difficulty, because here there was an invitation to bet. The fact that the precise place where the bet will eventually be made is not disclosed does not affect the question. Mr Craigie had really to surrender his case when he admitted, as he had of course to admit, that personal presence at the place was not necessary, but that receipt of correspondence there would be sufficient. I do not think it possible to say, after the correspondence has been received, that the bet will take place somewhere else than where it is received. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

(The Lord Justice-General, Lords M'Laren and Kinnear.)

34. M'Allister v. Abercrombie.

Justiciary Cases — Crime — Driving in Culpable and Reckless Manner — Held Not To Be a Crime at Common Law Unless it Be to the Danger of the Lieges.

Bill of Suspension.

This was a Bill of Suspension of a conviction obtained in the Justice of the Peace Court for the County of Renfrew at Paisley on a complaint which charged:—

That Patrick M'Allister, motorman, 27 New Street, Paisley, did on 7th December 1906, on the Paisley and Johnstone Road, opposite Glenview Place, Elderslie, in the Parish of Paisley and County of Renfrew, drive an electric tram car westwards, in a culpable and reckless manner, and fail to keep a proper look-out and to signal the approach of said car when approaching a horse and lorry then and there standing on the south side of said road, under the charge of Henry Muir, carter, 19 Steeple Street, Kilbarchan, whereby said car came into violent contact with said horse and lorry, overturning said lorry and damaging it, and throwing said horse violently against the iron railing in front of the house there, occupied by William Ballantyne, bricklayer, injuring said horse and knocking down and destroying or injuring about 9 feet of said railing.

The grounds of suspension and the answers thereto for the respondent were as follows:—

Stat. 2. On said complaint being called in Court on 14th December 1906, the complainer, through his agent, objected to the relevancy and competency of the complaint in respect, inter alia (1) That the offence charged is not a crime at common law; (2) that assuming it is, the Justices had no jurisdiction to try it; and (3) that the complaint is wanting in specification. These objections were noted and repelled by the Justices sitting on the bench, namely, David Wilson and John Armour Brown. Evidence having, on 21st December 1906, been thereafter led in support of the complaint, and in exculpation the Justices then sitting, namely, David Wilson, John Armour Brown, and Edmund Sharer, convicted the complainer of the crime charged, and fined and amerciated him in the sum of Twenty shillings sterling, and, in default of immediate payment thereof, decerned and adjudged him to be imprisoned for the space of fourteen days, unless the fine be sooner paid, and thereafter to be set at liberty, and for that purpose granted warrant to officers of Court to convey the said Patrick M'Allister to the prison of Glasgow, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law. The complainer at once paid said fine. He maintains that said sentence of conviction is illegal, and that it ought to be set aside.

Ans. 2. Admitted that at first diet certain objections were stated. These objections are set forth in the record of proceedings, which is referred to. Said objections were noted by the Clerk of Court and read over to and approved by complainer's agent at the time. No other objections than those noted by the Clerk were taken to the complaint or to the proceedings before the Justices. Admitted that the objections taken were repelled as stated. Admitted that evidence was thereafter taken on 21st December, and that the complainer was convicted and fined, all as set forth in the conviction. Admitted that the fine was paid. Quoad ultra, denied.

Stat. 3. The complainer is charged with driving an electric tram car on the Paisley and Johnstone Road in a culpable and reckless manner, and failing to keep a proper look-out and to signal the approach of the car, so that a lorry was damaged and a horse injured. The complaint does not bear that his conduct was in any way to the danger of any of the lieges, and the charge made does not constitute a crime by the common law of Scotland. The Paisley District Tramways, which are laid on, inter alia, the Paisley and Johnstone Road, are regulated by the Tramways Act 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 78, the Paisley District Tramways Order Confirmation Act 1901, 1 Edw. 7. ch. CCLXXXI., and the Regulations and Bye-Laws dated April 11, 1905, enacted by the Board of Trade with reference to the said Paisley District Tramways. By these Acts and Regulations and Bye-Laws are created obligations on the part of the servants of the Tramway Company towards the public and enforceable in the manner and subject to the penalties specified therein. These statutes, and particularly the said Bye-Laws, make provision for regulating the speed at which cars may be driven, the manner and methods of approaching, signalling, and stopping in cases of danger, and enact penalties for the breach of such regulations. They provide a code whereby the duties and responsibilities of drivers fall to be determined, and any complaint against a driver in the course of his duty for such a crime as was charged should have been brought under one or other of these statutory enactments. Further, assuming that the offence charged was a common law crime or a statutory offence, the Justices had no jurisdiction to try it.

Ans. 3. The complaint is referred to for its terms. Admitted that danger to the lieges is not libelled, and explained that this objection was not stated at either diet in the Court below, and is now taken for the first time. Explained further that no objection to the jurisdiction of the Court was taken at either of said diets. The said private Acts and the regulations and bye-laws mentioned are referred to for their terms. Quoad ultra, denied.

The Suspender pleaded:

The complainer is entitled to have the said sentence of conviction suspended in respect that (1) the Justices had no jurisdiction to try the offence charged; (2) the complaint is irrelevant; and (3) it is wanting in specification.

The Respondent pleaded:

The prayer of the bill ought to be refused, with expenses to the respondent, in respect—

(1) That the reasons for suspension are (a) irrelevant, (b) unfounded in fact, (c) unsound in law, and (d) were not stated in the Court below.

(2) That the complainer was rightly convicted.

Argued for Suspender: The charge of culpable and reckless driving was not a crime at common law unless it was to the danger of the lieges. That was not charged here, and there was no statement of facts contained in the complaint from which such danger was to be inferred. What was set forth was merely a ground for a civil action at the instance of the owner of the horse and cart. The authorities dealt with the subject of furious driving as a branch of the crime of culpable homicide (Hume on Crimes, Vol. I. p. 192; Bell's Notes, p. 76; Ersk., IV. 4, 5). In every case quoted by these writers there was death or injury to human beings. The lowest case at which such driving was a subject for the criminal courts was when it was only to the danger of some person. What was charged might be dealt with under different statutes. Either police or tramway Acts were available for the purpose. Counsel was stopped.

Argued for Respondent: What was done here, viz., driving culpably and recklessly to the injury of property, was laid down by Alison to be a crime. Danger to the lieges was not necessary (Alison's Criminal Law, Vol. I. pp. 120, 625). The facts set forth in the complaint showed potential danger to the lieges; because, if what was charged was proved, there must have been danger to anyone in the road. There was no reason why it should be a crime to drive in such a way as to endanger a person any more than it should be a crime to drive so recklessly as to do serious harm to property.

The Court suspended the conviction.

The Lord Justice-General.—This complaint is against a person called a motorman, but who may be more correctly described as an electric tramway car driver, and charges him with having driven an electric tram car in a culpable and reckless manner, and having failed to keep a proper look-out and signal the approach of the car when approaching a horse and lorry then standing on the side of the road, with the result that the car came into contact with the lorry and it was damaged, and also the horse and a garden railing. Upon that complaint the appellant was convicted, and he has appealed. I regret that we have to sustain the objection, but I do not think we have any other course. I cannot find that it is part of the law of Scotland that to drive a vehicle culpably and recklessly is a crime, unless there is danger to the lieges. If, from the statement of facts in the complaint here, we had been able to gather that there was such danger, it would have been different; but I think that what is here set forth does not constitute a crime at common law.

There are other ways in which what was charged may be attacked, such as under local police or tramway statutes. But the prosecutor has trusted himself to a statement of what was done being a common law crime, and I do not think he has set forth facts which come up to that.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree with all that has been said by your Lordship.

I shall only add that, while under the recent Criminal Procedure Act words of style, such as "feloniously," etc., may be omitted, and are taken to be implied, we must be careful not to carry that principle too far, especially where we have such words to deal with as "to the danger of the lieges," which are essential in order to make the act complained of a criminal one.

If the equivalent of these words could be found in the substance of the complaint we might hold that they were implied, but I cannot see anything here that can be read as a statement of danger to any one, and accordingly I find nothing here charged which amounts to a crime.

High Court of Justiciary

M'Allister v. Abercrombie.

Lord Kinnear.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree. The only doubt which occurred to me in the course of the discussion was caused by a citation from Sir Archibald Alison. But the authority to which Sir Archibald refers is the case of Bartholomew, decided on 21st November 1825; and the offence thus put in the major proposition in that case was "The culpable and furious driving of carts along the king's highway, to the terror and danger of the lieges."

Now it is clear that the extent to which that case goes is to decide that it is an article of dittay that a man has, "to the danger of the lieges," driven furiously along the king's highway—and that is exactly what the prosecutor here has not said. The conduct complained of may very probably be a police offence, but it is not so charged; and no authority has been shown for saying that it is a crime at common law.—31*st May* 1907.

35. Stirling & Kinniburgh v. Western District Committee of County Council of Haddington and Another.

Arbitration — Scope of Reference — Docqueted Account Relating to Matters Referred — Whether Exclusive of Arbiter's Jurisdiction or Subject to Construction by Him.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 731.)

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—I agree with the result to which the Lord Ordinary has come. The arbitration clause between the parties is an arbitration clause of what may be called the most ample character. It is one of those which I think upon the cases covers all disputes, and not only disputes which may arise absolutely during the progress of the work. The argument presented to us depended upon this, that it was said by the complainers that there was really no dispute here at all, because all that they wished to do was to adhere to the measurement of the work which, under sect. 51 of the contract, fell to be made by the engineer, and which measurement was approved of by the document which we have before us, and which bears that the docquet upon it is dated 1st March 1905.

To a certain extent I was impressed with that argument, because I certainly thought that justice would not be done in a case like this, if, as a matter of fact—the engineer having truly devoted his attention to the question of measurement—it was sought afterwards to rip up everything that he had done. But, then, what prevents me from giving effect to that argument is this, that the de quo queritur, or one of the de quo querituns, is whether the engineer has truly put his mind to it in that sense. Parties are not at one as to what was truly done at the time when that account was docqueted; and, besides, the party on the other side points out with some force that that so-called measurement of the work was not only a measurement of the work, but also includes at least one sum as an allowance for claims which is not measurement at all but something of the nature of damages. Parties having gone before the arbiter on that matter, it seems to me there is a dispute pending before the arbiter, and it is impossible to take the whole matter away from the arbiter by means of an interdict. I, of course, do not prejudge the question of what the arbiter may do. It is possible that the arbiter will act ultra vires, but we never ab ante suspect the arbiter of doing that unless something is brought before us to make us think so. I think, therefore, the arbitration must go on, and I hope the arbiter will keep in view that on a just construction of the contract—as I hold—the measurement was to be done by the engineer, and anything done by the engineer ought not to be lightly interfered with.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur. I am satisfied with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. The reclaimers' case clearly came to this, that there was no question between the parties to go before the arbiter, but it seems to me that there is quite clearly a question both as to the scope and the effect of the particular article in the specification, and as to what the engineer really did do. And since there is a dispute it must be decided by somebody, either by the Court or by the arbiter; and it is my clear opinion, with your Lordship, that it is a dispute which falls within the arbitration clause.

Lord Pearson.—I was much impressed by the argument for the reclaimers, but upon full consideration I am of the same opinion as your Lordship.—1*st June* 1907.

36. Allan's Testamentary Trustees v. Allan's M.-C. Trustees.

I. Marriage Contract — Provisions for Children of Former Marriage—Circumstances in Which Held That Provisions to Children of Former Marriage Conferred Spes Successionis in Obligatione, and Were Irrevocable.

II. Succession—Husband and Wife—Marriage Contract—Jus Relictæ—Legitim—Conveyance by Husband of Whole Estate at Date of his Death to Marriage-Contract Trustees for Children of Former Marriage—Held That Widow and Children of Subsequent Marriage Entitled to Jus Relictæ and Legitim Respectively, Before Husband's Executors Denuded in Favour of Marriage-Contract Trustees.

This was an action of multiplepoinding in which the testamentary trustees of the late Mr James Allan were pursuers and real raisers. The late Mr Allan was three times married. Claims were lodged in the competition by the children of the first marriage, by the marriage-contract trustees of the second marriage, by the said testamentary trustees, and by the widow and children of the third marriage.

The circumstances of the case are thus narrated in the Lord Ordinary's Note.

"The fund in medio in this multiplepoinding is the estate which belonged to the late James Allan at the time of his death. The whole fund is claimed, on the one hand, by the trustees acting under a contract of marriage entered into by Mr Allan in 1877, in contemplation of his marriage with his second wife, and, on the other hand, by the trustees and executors acting under a testamentary settlement executed by him in the year 1905. The latter claim is supported by Mr Allan's widow, his third wife, for herself, and also as guardian of the pupil children of her marriage with Mr Allan, she and they being beneficiaries to a large extent under the settlement. Mrs Allan claims, in the alternative, that she and her children are entitled to payment of their legal rights out of Mr Allan's estate.

"Mr Allan was, as already indicated, three times married. By his first wife, with whom he had no marriage contract, he had children of whom three survive. The contract of marriage already referred to was entered into in contemplation of his second marriage with a Mrs Mackail, who had children of her own by a former marriage, who still survive. By this contract, which is dated 4th September 1877, Mr Allan, in contemplation of the said marriage, and in consideration of the conveyance by his prospective wife thereinafter written, assigned and conveyed to certain trustees the whole heritable and moveable property that might pertain and belong to him at the time of his decease. After payment of his debts, funeral charges, and expenses of the trust, the trustees were directed to pay over to his intended spouse, in case she should survive him, the whole annual produce and rents of the residue of his estate during all the days and years of her life, which provision should be held and applied as an alimentary provision for behoof of herself and the children of the said intended marriage, as well as the children of her previous marriage to Mr Mackail, and the children of the said James Allan by his previous marriage, so long as such children should be unable to provide for themselves and continued to reside in family with her. On the death of his said intended spouse, the trustees were directed to hold and apply, pay, divide, and convey the residue of the estate to and for behoof of the whole of the foresaid children as follows, videlicet, the children of the said James Allan by his said previous marriage, the children of Mrs Mackail by her said previous marriage, and the child or children who might be born of the then intended marriage, and the survivors and survivor of them and the lawful issue of such of them as might die leaving issue, in such proportions, at such periods, and under such restrictions and upon such terms and conditions, as the said James Allan and Mrs Mackail might jointly appoint by any writing under their hand; and failing any such writing, then to and in favour of the said children in manner thereinafter mentioned. Mrs Mackail, on her part, conveyed to the same trustees the whole property, means, and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, then belonging and resting owing to her, or that should pertain and become resting owing and belonging to her, during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, and Mr Allan renounced and discharged his jus mariti and right of administration in relation to all such property, means, estate and effects. It was declared that her said estate and effects, and the proceeds or annual produce thereof, should be held and applied by the trustees for behoof of Mr Allan and herself during the subsistence of their marriage in alimentary liferent, and for behoof of the survivor of them also in liferent, and as an alimentary provision for behoof of himself or herself and his and her respective children as aforesaid as well as the child or children that might be born of the said intended marriage; and that the fee thereof should be held and applied for behoof of the children of Mr Allan by his said previous marriage, the children of Mrs Mackail by her said previous marriage, and the child or children who might be born of the then intended marriage, and the survivors and survivor of them and the lawful issue of such of them as might die leaving issue, in such proportions, at such periods, and under such restrictions and upon such terms and conditions, as Mr Allan and Mrs Mackail might jointly appoint by any writing under their hand; and failing such writing, then to and in favour of the said children in manner thereinafter mentioned; and it was further declared that unless otherwise directed in any writing which might be jointly executed by the said spouses as aforesaid, the fee of their respective estates should fall to and be equally divided by the trustees among the children of Mr Allan by his said previous marriage, the children of Mrs Mackail by her said previous marriage, and the child or children that might be born of their said intended marriage, or the survivors of them jointly with the issue of such of them as might decease leaving issue (the division being per stirpes), and the same should be payable to such children at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring after the death of the longest liver of the said spouses, and after the said child or children should respectively attain majority, or be married, whichever of these two events should first happen. It was, by the said contract, further provided that, in consideration of the foregoing provisions in favour of the children of Mr Allan, and of the children of the said intended marriage, the right of the said children to legitim was thereby discharged.

"On 14th December 1885 Mr Allan and his said second wife executed a deed of division and apportionment, whereby, on the narrative of the said marriage contract, and that there were no children of the marriage between them, and that they had then resolved to exercise the power of division conferred upon them by said contract, they, with joint consent and assent, agreed to exercise the said power in manner set forth. With reference to Mr Allan's estate, the spouses appointed that the fee should, at the death of the survivor of them, be payable to the extent of £5 to each of the children of Mrs Allan by her former marriage or the survivor of them and the issue of such of them as might predecease the survivor of the spouses; and that the remainder and residue of Mr Allan's estate should be divided among his children by his former marriage, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the lawful issue of such of them as should predecease the survivor of the spouses, and that in such proportions, at such periods, and under such restrictions, and upon such terms and conditions, as Mr Allan might appoint by any writing under his hand; and failing such writing, then equally among his said children, and the survivors or survivor. With reference to Mrs Allan's estate, the spouses correspondingly appointed that £5 should be paid to each of Mr Allan's children by his former marriage and the survivors and issue of predeceasers, and that the residue should be divided amongst Mrs Allan's children by her former marriage in the proportions and subject to the restrictions, and upon the terms and conditions in the said deed set forth, or should be divided in such proportions and upon such conditions, etc., as she might appoint.

"No children were born of Mr Allan's second marriage. After the death of his second wife he married for the third time. He entered into no marriage contract upon this occasion; and died on 13th December 1905, survived by his widow and three children of the third marriage, all in pupillarity."

The following authorities were cited in the debate besides those referred to by the Lord Ordinary. For the widow and children: Fraser, Husband and Wife, II. 976, 994; Fisher, 1840, 2 D. 1121; Grant, 1679, M. 3596. For the M.-C. Trustees: M'Laren, Wills, I. 165 and 126; Rait, 1892, 19 R. 687.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Finds (1) that, upon a sound construction of the marriage contract libelled, and in the events which have happened, Mr Allan's three sons by his first marrage took a spes in obligatione which his trust disposition and settlement was inept to defeat; (2) that they are entitled to legitim, if they should elect to claim it, in preference to what they would receive under the said marriage contract, but not to both of these rights; and (3) that Mr Allan's executors, before denuding of the trust estate as at the date of his death in favour of the trustees under said marriage contract, must satisfy out of the same the claims of his widow and her children to jus relictæ and legitim respectively."

Lord Dundas [after stating the facts as above quoted].—The first question for consideration is as to the effect, so far as regards Mr Allan's estate, of the marriage contract entered into by him in contemplation of his second marriage. The trust thereby created was, as I have pointed out, for behoof of his then intended wife, and of his own children by his first marriage, his wife's own children by her first marriage, and the child or children to be born of the intended marriage. As that trust was not to take effect until Mr Allan's death, it seems clear that the beneficiaries had a spes successionis only, and nothing in the nature of a jus crediti. It seems also clear enough that, as regards his second wife and her own children by her first marriage, and also as regards the issue of the contemplated marriage, this spes was in obligatione and not in destinatione merely; and, as such, was contractual and irrevocable. But it is not clear, and must now be considered, whether, as regards the children of Mr Allan's first marriage, their spes successionis was, like that of the other beneficiaries, in obligatione and irrevocable, or in destinatione only, and revocable at pleasure. It is certain that these children were strangers to the marriage, so that, if the marriage contract had called them as substitutes to the children of the marriage, they would have had no more than a bare spes. Mr Erskine in an often quoted passage (Inst., III. viii. 39) lays it down that "the father lies under no degree of restraint in favour of the substitutes who are called by the marriage contract after the issue of the marriage, and who acquire no right by such substitution (Stewart, Ans. p. 145). For no contract can have effect beyond the interest of the parties contracting; and the wife and her relations, who are the only contractors with the husband, are not interested in the succession, except in so far as it is provided to the wife's issue. As to the remoter substitutes, if the husband contracted, it was with himself alone; and therefore the substitution must be accounted a simple destination as to them, which may be altered by him at his pleasure." But Mr Allan's children are not called as substitutes to the issue of the marriage. They are co-ordinated as institutes along with such issue, and with the existing issue of Mrs Mackail, the provision for whom was, I apprehend, part of the consideration of that lady's second marriage. If the trust created by the marriage contract had been one of divestiture, to take immediate effect as regards Mr Allan's estate, his existing children would,

I think, have been vested in a jus crediti along with the issue of the marriage and the Mackail children. This view seems to be in conformity with the judgment of the House of Lords, agreeing with the opinion of Lord Rutherfurd Clark, who dissented in the Court below, in the case of Mackie, 1883, 10 R. 746, reversed 1884, 11 R. (H.L.) 10. See also Lord Watson's observations upon that case in Macdonald v. Hall, 1893, 20 R. (H.L.) 88, at pp. 94, 95. Here, however, there is no jus crediti in any of the beneficiaries, but only a spes successionis; and I must determine whether the right of Mr Allan's children is, equally with that of the issue of the marriage (if there had been any) and the Mackail children, a spes in obligatione or only a spes in destinatione, revocable, and (if revocable) revoked by Mr Allan's trust settlement. The point is not, I think, actually covered by any of the decisions, and is not unattended with difficulty; but my opinion is in favour of the former of the alternative views just indicated. The question comes, in my judgment, to depend upon the intention of the parties to this marriage contract, as it may be gathered from the language which they have used. I find it impossible to resist the conclusion that they intended to make of the three families of children mentioned one single class, and that the nature of the right conferred upon all of them should be the same. There is, so far as I am aware, nothing unlawful, nor is there anything unnatural or surprising, in a man making his second marriage the occasion to provide for his existing as well as for his contemplated children, and placing the two families upon an equal footing; and in a question of construction, it seems to me to be immaterial that, in point of fact, no children were born of Mr Allan's second marriage. If the issue to be born and the children of Mrs Mackail took, as I think they did take, a spes in obligatione, it must, in my opinion, follow that Mr Allan's first family, who are included in the same destination, took a similar right, and no less. The reasoning of the noble and learned Lords in Mackie's case, though I realise that the deed there under consideration was radically different from that with which I am now dealing, appears to me to afford support for the conclusion at which I have arrived. The doctrine laid down is expressed in wide and general terms, and seems to me to be applicable, by parity of reasoning, to the present case. Thus Lord Watson announces (11 R. (H.L.) at p. 16) that the authorities do not, in his opinion, give the least countenance to the proposition "that when a provision is made not only to the children of the marriage in contemplation, but also to the children of a former marriage, the provision in favour of the one must be held as onerous and irrevocable, and the provision in favour of the other as revocable and testamentary." The opinion of the Lord Chancellor (Selborne) is to the same effect; and his Lordship proceeds (at the foot of p. 13): "Is there any law which says that because it is a marriage contract, and because the previously born children are outside the matrimonial consideration as such, therefore a deed conceived in apt and proper terms and form, with a plain intention that they should take pari passu inter se, is not to prevail? My Lords, no principle has been stated for that, no positive rule of the law of Scotland, and no authority." I think that we have here a deed in apt and proper terms and form, with a plain intention that Mr Allan's first family should take pari passu along with the Mackail children and the issue of the marriage, subject to apportionment as provided. It was argued that the spouses intended the provision to be revocable by themselves jointly. But the contract itself contains no word to this effect; and further, I presume that it was delivered to the marriage trustees, and acted upon by them, as regards Mrs Mackail's fortune, and it was recorded in the Books of Council and Session. The spouses themselves do not appear to have regarded it as revocable. They did not revoke, but, on the contrary, proceeded to exercise the power of apportionment which they had reserved to themselves by the marriage contract. In my opinion, therefore, Mr Allan's trust disposition and settlement was inept to defeat the right which his first family took under the marriage contract.

If this view is correct, it remains to consider whether or not the widow and her children are entitled to receive payment of their legal rights out of the estate before the executors denude in favour of the marriage-contract trustees. I am of opinion that they are so entitled. It is well settled that a father may, notwithstanding that he has by antenuptial marriage contract settled on the children of his first marriage his whole estate as at the date of his death, in entering into a second marriage, make a reasonable provision for the children of that marriage, having regard to the amount of his estate, and to any other provisions the children of both marriages may have. On the other hand, I do not think that such provision can effectually be made by testament (Haldane, 1885, 13 R. 179; Arthur & Seymour v. Lang, 1870, 8 M. 928; Ersk. Inst., III. viii. 42). But Mr Allan's conveyance to the marriage-contract trustees of his whole estate at the date of his death must, in my opinion, be limited to the dead's part, and could not have the effect of defeating the right of his widow and her children to their jus relictæ and legitim respectively as creditors of the deceased. The old case of Grant, 1679, M. 3596, carries one some way towards this result, at all events as regards the widow. See also Inglis, 1869, 7 M. 435. The executors must therefore, in my opinion, before denuding of the estate of Mr Allan, satisfy the claims of the widow and her children to their legal rights. If Mr Allan's first family elect to claim legitim in preference to what they would take under the marriage contract, they are, in my judgment, entitled to do so, but not to receive both legitim and the amount of the provision.

I have omitted to notice an argument which was advanced for the testamentary trustees, to the effect that, upon a sound construction of the marriage contract, the provisions contained "in the third place" thereof (as well as those "in the second place") were only intended to take effect in the event, which did not happen, of Mr Allan's second wife surviving him; and that they accordingly became inoperative and ineffectual upon her predecease. I do not think that that is an admissible construction of the contract, looking to its language as a whole. It would, in my judgment, be strange indeed that the provisions of Mr Allan for, inter alios, the issue of the marriage should be entirely dependent upon the contingency that he should be survived by his wife. Much reliance was placed, in support of the argument, upon the case of Somerville's Trs., 1865, 3 M. 602, affd. 1867, 5 M. (H.L.) 69. But that case, though similar in some ways to the present, appears to me to be materially dissimilar in others, and throws little or no light upon the matter.—29*th May* 1907.

37. Millar & Lang v. Poole.

I. Diligence — Arrestment Jurisdictionis Fundandæ Causa—Subjects Arrested of No Marketable Value—Book of Samples of Gilt Designs Accompanied by Invoice for 1s. 6d. — Arrestment Insufficient to Found Jurisdiction.

II. Diligence — Arrestment Jurisdictionis Fundandæ Causa—Subject Arrested Book of Samples Obtained from Foreign Defender by an Agent of Pursuers for the Purpose of Arrestment to Found Jurisdiction—Personal Bar—Arrestment Held Invalid.

In this action Millar & Lang Ltd., art publishers in Glasgow, sued Poole, a manufacturing stationer in London, for damages in respect of the alleged infringement by the latter of the pursuers' copyright in certain designs used in connection with the manufacture of Christmas cards. The pursuers alleged that jurisdiction had been founded against the defender by certain arrestments used in the hands of a certain James Brown & Son. The defenders averred—

On 10th November 1906 the defender, in response to a letter from Messrs James Brown & Son, calling themselves nautical and engineering publishers of 52 Darnley Street, Pollokshields, Glasgow, sent them one of his pattern books of Christmas cards, containing, inter alia, specimens of the three mottoes complained of. Said pattern book has not been returned to the defender, nor has any order been given to or accepted by him from the said James Brown & Son for any of the cards therein contained. The defender believes and avers that said letter was written at the request and on the instructions of the pursuers, with the sole object of entrapping the defender into sending to Scotland the mottoes complained of, and of founding jurisdiction against him in Scotland thereby, and also by arrestment. The said pattern book is the only property of the defender which is in possession of the said James Brown & Son, and is the only property attached by the arrestments used by the pursuers for the purpose of founding jurisdiction in this action. Said pattern book is of no commercial value, and accordingly no jurisdiction has been founded against the defender by said arrestments.

And pleaded: "1. The defender is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and no jurisdiction has been founded against him."

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof on the question of jurisdiction.

After hearing counsel on the evidence, his Lordship sustained the defender's first plea in law, and dismissed the action.

Lord Dundas. . . .—It appears from the evidence that the defender received a letter (No. 27 of process), dated 10th November 1906, from James Brown & Son, nautical and engineering publishers, Pollokshields, Glasgow, of whom he had no previous knowledge, stating that "as we have had your name given to us as being sellers of gold ornaments, devices and initials, we shall be glad if you will kindly forward samples along with prices." The defender was in possession of some samples of such articles, which he had received from a Yorkshire firm, without request by him or any payment, in the course of trade. On 12th November he sent Messrs Brown the samples No. 19 of process, with a letter, No. 20 of process, and an accompanying invoice, No. 26 of process. On 16th November arrestments No. 6 of process were used by the pursuers in the hands of Messrs Brown to found jurisdiction against the defender. It is, I think, plain upon the evidence that the sample cards No. 19 of process are of no mercantile value whatever. The defender pleads that upon this ground the arrestment is invalid to found jurisdiction against him. So far as I am concerned, the matter is concluded adversely to the pursuers upon this defence, by the opinion which I expressed, and to which I adhere, in a recent action raised by the present pursuers against a different defender (Millar & Lang Ltd. v. Polak, 13th February 1907, 14 S.L.T. p. 788). I take leave to refer to my opinion in that case, and to the comments there made upon some of the decisions affecting the question. But the pursuers' counsel founded upon the invoice No. 26 of process as distinguishing Polak's case from the present. They argued that there is here a sale of goods, at a price fixed by the defender himself, viz. 1s. 6d., and that what was arrested was not merely the sample cards No. 19 of process, but that sum of money. In my opinion, this argument is not well founded. I wish to repeat what I said in Polak's case as to the determination of the Scots Courts not to extend the artificial doctrine of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa further in any case than is expressly warranted by authority and precedent. I do not think that the invoice No. 26 of process, coupled with the letters Nos. 27 and 20 of process, constituted a sale of goods at the price of 1s. 6d. It is clear from the evidence that the purpose and intention in the trade of sending such invoices are merely for protection against "idle curiosity"; and that traders do not, as matter of fact and custom, trouble themselves to exact payment of such trifling sums, at all events in dealing with possible customers. Putting the case at its highest from the pursuers' point of view, the matter amounts, in my judgment, to no more than a submission by the defender of samples for Messrs Brown's approval, and an indication that they should be returned, with the option, in case of non-return within a reasonable period—which had not, I think, expired at the date of arrestment—of paying 1s. 6d. by way of a sort of penalty. Assuming, therefore, that the arrestment of 1s. 6d. is not "illusory" in the sense of the decided cases, I am of opinion that what was here arrested was not a money debt of 1s. 6d., nor a liability to account for money, but simply the sample cards No. 19 of process, which were and are of no mercantile value, nor capable of attachment by diligence in execution, and therefore not a proper subject of arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

If this view is correct, there is an end of the case. But even if it is wrong, the defender has, in my judgment, another ground upon which he is entitled to succeed. He avers (Ans. 4) that Messrs Brown's letter No. 27 of process "was written at the request and on the instructions of the pursuers, with the sole view of entrapping the defender into sending to Scotland the mottoes complained of, and of founding jurisdiction in Scotland thereby, and also by arrestment." This averment is, I think, fully established by the evidence. Mr Brown depones that he knows Mr Macaleese, who is works manager to the pursuers; that before November 1906 Mr Macaleese suggested to him to write to Polak, the defender in the other case, for designs similar to whose which form the subject of the present arrestment; that he also gave him the defender's name, and the witness proceeds thus:—"When I wrote the letter of 10th November, I was aware that an action had been raised by the pursuers against Polak, founded upon an arrestment which had been used in our hands. Q. To attach a similar book? A. They were called samples. Q. Is it the case that you understood perfectly well that the object of Macaleese was to get the book into your hands so that he might attach it in a similar way to the way in which it had been attached in Polak's case? A. He did not say as much, but I may have thought that. By the Court.—I did think it. Cross-examination continued.—Macaleese was a business friend of mine. Q. And you were not unwilling to help him? A. No; you always help a business friend if you can. . . . I did not tell Macaleese that I had written to Poole. I told him I had got the samples, and showed him the samples one day when he was in the shop two or three days after they came in. I think that must have been before the arrestments." It is thus made very clear that Brown was throughout acting in this matter as the pursuers' agent, with the object of obtaining from the defenders samples which were, upon their arrival, to be arrested in Brown's hands, in order to found jurisdiction for this action. Now it is well settled that a particular creditor may be barred from claiming the advantage of an arrestment which he has used, and which would have been valid, if it had been used by another creditor, when he has obtained it in mala fide, or by something in the nature of "a trick." I had occasion to consider this question, and to deal with the principal decisions bearing upon it, in the recent case of The Old Park Forge Ltd., 22nd March 1907, 15 S.L.T. p. 3. For the sake of brevity, I content myself with referring to the opinion which I then delivered. The circumstances under which this defender was induced to send samples to Scotland, which were at once made (as it was intended by the pursuers that they should be made) the subject of arrestment to found jurisdiction against him, seem to me to afford a good illustration of the sort of actings on the part of an arrester or his agent which the Court will discountenance by refusing to the arrester the advantage he seeks to obtain by virtue of the arrestment which he has procured.

For the reasons which I have stated, I shall sustain the defender's first plea in law, and dismiss the action.—29*th May* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court at Glasgow.

This was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow at the instance of Mrs O'Brien, wife of Michael O'Brien, master mariner, and, at the time of the accident after mentioned, chief officer on board the s.s. "Cousins Arbib," against Enrico Arbib & Co., owners of the said vessel. The action concluded for £500 damages for injuries sustained by the pursuer on 31st January 1906 while leaving the vessel, which was then lying in Prince's Dock, Glasgow, alongside the quay. The following narrative of facts is taken from the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

"The pursuer, who is the wife of the mate of a steam vessel belonging to the defenders, and which was just about to start on a voyage, came to the vessel with linen which she had been dressing for her husband. But as her husband was about to go on a voyage, she desired to see him before leaving, and to spend a little time with him, along with their child, which she had brought with her. Accordingly, she spent an hour or two in her husband's cabin. She and her husband left the cabin with a view to her going on shore. On their way to the side of the vessel the mate stopped to speak to the pilot, and the pursuer having gone forward, a rigger put a plank across to the quay, and was assisting her to cross by it, when it broke and they fell into the water, and she suffered the injuries of which she complains. The plank was rotten, and this was the cause of its giving way. It was a plank which had not been provided to be used for a gangway, but was being used at the time as a fender to prevent pieces of coal which might fall in the work of coaling the vessel from breaking the glass of the deck skylights."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia—

"1. The pursuer's statements are irrelevant."

On 29th March 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who, on 26th May 1906, recalled the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute and allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session for trial by jury. Parties were heard on the question of relevancy, and thereafter a proof was allowed, which was led before Lord Kyllachy. Parties were subsequently heard, their contentions sufficiently appearing from the opinions of the Court.

The Court sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.

The Lord Justice-Clerk [after the narrative of facts above quoted].—These being the facts, the question is whether there is any case against the defenders as having a duty towards the pursuer, as being on board in circumstances making them responsible to give safe conduct.

Now, the circumstances do not, in my opinion, disclose two important facts which are necessary to the pursuer's case. The pursuer has not made out that it was necessary for her to go on board at all. Bringing her husband's clean clothes was quite a legitimate proceeding; but they might have been delivered by hailing the deck hand on duty, and handing them to him. I cannot hold that she had any right to go on board, or any invitation to do so. This is on the assumption that she did go on board with the clothes. But in point of fact her husband got men from the vessel to go on shore and carry the clothes to his cabin. The pursuer had brought them in a cab. There was a box and a bag, and she could not have carried them on board.

Therefore the object she had in going on board was, not to bring the clothes to her husband, but to visit him as her husband, for her and his pleasure. The visit lasted for some hours, and had no connection with business or duty of any kind. She was in no different position than if she had gone to a house where her husband was staying temporarily, in order that they might enjoy one another's society. The defenders, therefore, had no duty towards the pursuer. She was not there on their invitation, any more than a visitor to a servant is invited into the servant's master's house by the master. In such a case the master would have no duty to take care of the safety of the servant's friend. That, as it appears to me, is the import of the decisions, which are numerous.

It may be said that even assuming what I have said, that it will not apply. Where a person is by permission in premises, there may be liability if some part of the premises, or appliances in premises, be in a state which constitutes a danger in use, if an invitation to any person permitted to be on the premises to use it can be inferred. However far that doctrine may have been carried, I am unable to see that it has any application here. It cannot be said that the defenders, in having this plank on board, intended it to be used, or gave any invitation to any one to use it, as a gangway. It was quite suitable for the purpose for which it was being used. The mistake made was in using it for a purpose for which it had not been intended. I think it may safely be assumed that if the pursuer's husband had not stayed behind to speak to the pilot he would not have allowed the plank to be used as it was. The placing of the plank by the riggers was a volunteered act of courtesy on their part, and not part of their duty. They had no duty, as serving the owners, to the pursuer at all. If a servant makes a mistake by which a visitor is injured it is well settled that the owner of the premises is not liable for the servant's act. Such actings are not within the scope of the servant's employment, and the master does not take any such risk. Whatever liability might have been maintained against a master if servants in using proper appliances use them in a dangerous way, this is not a case of that kind at all. Here I think the riggers went outside the scope of their employment in doing, not an act of duty, but a friendly act, for which the defenders are not responsible. What they did was not done "in the course of the service and for the master's benefit" (Barwick v. English Joint-Stock Bank, 1867, L.R. 2 Ex. 259).

I do not think it necessary to notice the contention of the pursuer that under certain public regulations those in charge of the vessel should provide a proper gangway between it and the shore. In my opinion these regulations do not apply in the circumstances of the case.

I am therefore in favour of a decree of absolvitor.

2nd Div.

O'Brien v. Enrico Arbib & Co.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I have given anxious consideration to this cause, and I own I was at one time disposed to think that the shipowners had incurred liability to pay damages to the pursuer, chiefly owing to their failure to comply with the regulations, dated 24th October 1904, made by the Secretary of State under the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, which regulations have statutory force. By Part II. sect. 4 of these regulations it was provided that, if a ship is lying at a wharf or quay for the purpose of loading or unloading or coaling, there shall be means of access for the use of persons at such times as they have to pass from the ship to the shore or from the shore to the ship, (a) by a gangway wherever reasonably practicable; and (b) in other cases by a secure ladder of adequate length, meaning, as I understand the regulation, a ladder to be used as a ladder. I further thought, and still think on the evidence, that in fact there was no such gangway on board, and that the very desire of the master and carpenter to make out, contrary to all the other evidence, that there was such a gangway (though nobody else saw it), shewed that it was "reasonably practicable" to have one.

But having read the opinion of my brother Lord Low I have come to be satisfied that this regulation was intended solely for the use of persons employed in the processes of loading or unloading and coaling, and that it cannot affect the liability of the shipowners towards persons not so employed, though otherwise in the position, as this lady was, of being lawfully there. I therefore concur with Lord Low on this point, and indeed in the whole case.

Lord Low.—I am of opinion that the defenders are not liable in damages to the pursuer in respect of the accident which occurred when she was leaving their ship.

The pursuer was lawfully on board the ship, but in my judgment she was there merely by permission and not by invitation. I do not think that she came on board ship upon any business in which the defenders had an interest. It is averred upon record that the pursuer required to go on board with her husband's clothes. If that had been established the pursuer might have been regarded as having been on board by invitation, and on business upon which the defenders were, although remotely, interested, in which case the latter would have been bound to use reasonable care for her safety. In the first place, however, although the pursuer did bring her husband's clothes to the ship's side, she did not require to go on board in order to deliver them; and indeed it is plain from the evidence that she did not in fact herself take them on board, or see that they were brought on board.

In the next place, her main object in going to the ship was to see as much as possible of her husband before he sailed. She accordingly took their child with her, and remained on board for several hours, and until shortly before the ship left the harbour. The pursuer, therefore, was on board ship simply in the capacity of a visitor to one of the defenders' servants, and I do not think that it makes any difference that she was the wife of that servant, and that he was an officer. A mere visitor to any member of the crew would, in my opinion, have been in the same position as the pursuer in a question with the defenders.

In such circumstances I think that the authorities shew that there was no duty on the defenders to see that the condition of the ship did not subject the pursuer to danger. I may refer to Smith v. London and St Katherine Dock Co., 1868, L.R. 3 C.P. 326; Indermaur v. Dames, 1867, L.R. 1 C.P. 274, 2 C.P. 311; Heaven v. Pender, 1883, L.R. 11 Q.B.D. 503 (the opinion of Cotton, L.J., and Bowen, L.J.); and Devlin v. Jeffray's Trs., 1902, 5 F. 130, and especially Lord Kinnear's opinion.

It was, however, argued that, even assuming that the pursuer was merely a volunteer or licensee, the defenders are liable because their servants used as a gangway, when the pursuer was leaving the ship, a plank which was decayed and dangerous.

Now the owner of premises may be liable to a mere licensee if the latter is injured by something which is in itself dangerous being used or left upon the premises in such a way as to be dangerous, or even if there be upon the premises a hidden danger or trap, at all events if the circumstances imply an invitation to use the trap.

The plank was certainly not a dangerous thing in itself. It was quite fit for the purpose for which it had been brought from the hold, namely, to protect a skylight when coal was being shipped, and it was dangerous only when used for an improper purpose, and one for which it was never intended. The case would have been the same if a sound plank had been used which was not strong enough to support the weight of the pursuer and of the rigger who was helping her.

In regard to the theory of invitation and trap, it may very well be that the plank, when used as a gangway, was of the nature of a trap, because I assume that to outward appearance it was sound; and admittedly the pursuer was invited to use it by one of the defenders' servants. But these facts are not in themselves sufficient to render the defenders liable. If there had been a regular gangway which the pursuer used, but which had become so decayed that it broke under her, the case would have been very different, because the very appearance of the thing would have been an invitation to use it, and a representation that it might be safely used, and it would have been part of the equipment of the ship for which the defenders were responsible. But I fail to see any sound principle upon which the defenders can be held liable, merely because when a visitor was leaving the ship one of the ship's hands took it upon him to use a plank which was neither intended nor suited for such a purpose, as a means of communication with the quay.

It is not unimportant to remember what the actual circumstances were. The pursuer's husband intended to take her on shore, as he had brought her on board, by means of a ladder and plank, but when she was ready to leave the ship he was engaged on ship's business, and two riggers put out the plank, and one of them was leading the pursuer across it when it broke. The riggers were merely doing an act of civility to a visitor who was leaving the ship, and I do not think that the defenders are responsible for the result. It is settled that the master of a house is not liable for injuries received by a visitor through the fault or carelessness of one of his servants. That is one of the risks of the place which the visitor takes, and the fact that the visit is paid to a ship and not to a house can make no difference.

Further, I do not think that the riggers can be said to have been acting within the scope of, or in the course of, their duty. Assuming that, so far as the defenders' responsibility for their acts is concerned, the riggers were in the same position as members of the crew, it was no part of their duty to select the means by which strangers who were leaving the ship should reach the quay. If there had been a gangway which the riggers put out, and if the accident had happened because it was not placed securely, it would not have been contended that they were not acting within the scope of their duty. But they took upon themselves to select and use as a means of access to the quay a plank which was not supplied or intended for that purpose, and which, even if sound, would not have been suitable for that purpose, seeing that it was to be used by a lady. Although the riggers only intended to do what was civil and courteous, I think that they went outside of, and beyond the scope of, their duty. Willis, J., in delivering the judgment of a very strong Court in Barwick v. English Joint-Stock Bank, 1867, L.R. 2 Ex. 259, stated the law thus: "The general rule is that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved." Again, in Storey v. Ashton, 1869, L.R. 4 Q.B. 476, it was laid down that the question in such cases is, "Whether the servant was doing that which the master employed him to do?" I do not think that these statements of the principle to be applied have ever been questioned, although difficulty has been frequently found in applying them to the facts of a particular case. In the present case it seems to me to be impossible to say that the riggers were doing what the defenders employed them to do, or that they were in any reasonable sense acting for the defenders' benefit.

The pursuers, further, founded upon certain regulations in regard to gangways to be used when ships are lying at a wharf or quay. I think that it is sufficient to say that these regulations apply only in the case of persons employed in the loading, unloading, or coaling of a ship, and do not, in my judgment, affect the liability at common law of a shipowner to third parties.

I am therefore of opinion that the defenders should be assoilzied.

Lord Ardwall.—I have found this to be a case of some difficulty. The pursuer obtained access to the vessel "Cousins Arbib" on the day in question by means of a ladder laid horizontally from the quay to the ship's bridge deck and a plank laid upon the ladder, and with the assistance of her husband, who was the first officer on board the said ship. Unfortunately, when she came to leave the ship, her husband was detained for a few minutes speaking to the pilot. While he was so engaged, a person, in the employment of James Gray, a foreman rigger, and who was at the time working on the ship, instead of getting a ladder, took a plank which was lying near and laid it down between the bridge deck and the shore, and was in the act of giving the pursuer his hand to steady her when the plank broke and both of them were precipitated into the water. The proximate causes of the accident, accordingly, were, first, the unsafe condition of the plank; and second, the use of that plank without any other support to form a means of egress to the pursuer from the ship.

With regard to the first, I think it was thoughtless on the part of the defenders to have on board the ship a plank in such a rotten state as that which gave way under the weight of a woman and a man over a stretch of such a short distance as four or five feet, and I thought at the discussion that there was a good deal to be said for the view that where there is a plank of that kind on board a ship where it may be readily used for the purpose of being laid between the ship and the quay for the passage of visitors or otherwise, it was the defenders' duty to have a sound plank; but, on the other hand, there is no evidence as to the history of this plank or how it came to be on board, or even what was the cause of its breaking, the plank itself having been lost by falling into the water at the time of the accident. But there is no evidence to show that the plank was not perfectly sound when supplied by the defenders to the ship, or to show that the defenders failed to put at the disposal of the officers or others in charge of the ship, plenty of planks and other materials to supply the place of those that had suffered from long usage, so that for all that appears in the case it may well have been that the plank was good when originally supplied, and that the defenders throughout had put it in the power of the captain and others in charge of the ship to replace worn-out planks with new ones whenever that was necessary. But further, there is no evidence to show that this plank was intended for any other purpose than merely as a fence or fender to be hung along the port-holes and sides of the ship to prevent injury to the glass through coal falling on it in the course of loading. Indeed, as the pursuer's husband explains, that was the purpose for which that and other similar planks were got out of the vessel's hold. Now, it is impossible to say that the defenders were legally in fault in having old planks for such a purpose, provided they did not put them to other purposes for which they were not fit.

O'Brien v. Enrico Arbib & Co.
Lord Ardwall.

This brings me to the second point, as to whether the defenders are responsible for the rigger who was using the plank for the purpose of assisting the pursuer out of the ship. Now, undoubtedly at the time he did so, Linton was on board the ship as a rigger, and in the employment of the defenders as such for the purpose of doing a rigger's work. He was therefore their servant to that effect; but otherwise he was not in their employment but in the employment of Gray. Now, what he did in the way of putting the plank down for the pursuer to walk across was not, in my opinion, any part of his duty as a rigger in the defenders' service. He was voluntarily, and as an act of kindness, assisting the first officer's wife to leave the ship, but it was no part of his duty to determine what means should be used for that purpose; and if he had not so hastily put out this plank, which had been brought on deck for a totally different purpose, the pursuer's husband would have made the same arrangement for his wife leaving the ship as he had for her entering it, by placing the ladder between the bridge deck and the shore, and placing a plank on the top of it, which would have kept her perfectly safe. I accordingly am unable to hold that the defenders were liable for supplying the said plank as a means of egress from the ship. The fact that it was so supplied was, in my opinion, due to the unauthorised and mistaken, though well-meant, action on the part of Linton, for which, for the reasons I have above indicated, I do not think the defenders can be held legally responsible.

I have examined the cases which were quoted at the discussion as more or less resembling the present, and, in particular, the cases of Heaven v. Pender, 1883, 11 Q.B.D. 503; Indermaur v. Dames, L.R., 1867, 2 C.P. 311; Smith v. The London and St Katherine Dock Co., 1868, L.R. 3 C.P. 326; Miller v. Hancock [1893], 2 Q.B. 177; and Brady v Parker, 1887, 14 R. 783. In all these cases it was held that liability attached to the defenders in respect of a duty towards the pursuers or plaintiffs which they had failed to perform, such duty arising from invitations, express or implied, to enter on certain premises or use certain works or ways. In my opinion the pursuer has failed to show that there was in the present case any duty upon the defenders to furnish means of access and egress to and from their ship for visitors to members of the crew, especially considering that the ship had finished loading her cargo and was ready to sail. It may be true that the pursuer was legitimately on board the ship; but, on the other hand, I am of opinion that it must be held that she was there as what has been called in England a mere "licensee," that is, voluntarily and for her own purposes, and having no business there in which the defenders were interested, or which imposed any duty upon them in relation to her. If this be so, it would appear that there are no grounds for fastening legal liability for the accident on the defenders, or for holding that the rigger, in going forward and placing an unsafe plank for the pursuer to walk upon, was engaged in the performance of an act within the scope of his employment by the defenders. It would rather seem that when the pursuer went on board in the way and at the time she did, she took all the risks of the situation, and had just to obtain by herself, or by the aid of her husband, under whose guardianship she was when she entered the ship, such means of egress as he or she herself deemed safe. Unfortunately, her husband having left her, for a minute or two, to her own guidance, she accepted the proferred services of a rigger to assist her on shore, and these, however well meant, led to the accident for which she now claims damages from the defenders. For the reasons I have stated I do not think the defenders are liable in such damages.—31*st May* 1907.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

40. Glenboig Union Fireclay Company Limited v. Wallace.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (2) (c)—"Serious and Wilful Misconduct"—Death of Workman Through Explosion of Gas in Coal Mine — Breach of Rule — Accident Held Not Attributable to Serious and Wilful Misconduct.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by way of Stated Case against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute

(Glegg) in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 raised in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie at the instance of Mrs Wallace, widow of the deceased Joseph Wallace, against the Glenboig Union Fireclay Co. Ltd.

The case stated as follows :—

1. The locus of the accident is a cross-cut mine in a fireclay pit.

2. On proceeding along the mine from the pit bottom, and about 760 yards therefrom, there is met a wooden frame "A" carrying two wheels, over which the haulage rope passes ; 7 feet 6 inches farther on there is a similar frame "B" ; 11 feet 6 inches farther there is a pump, and beyond the pump the mine extends about 120 feet to the working face.

3. The mine dips to the pump at 1 in 12, and rises from the pump to the face at 1 in 4.

4. The bratticing for separating the inlet and outlet of air is continued to within a short distance of the working face.

5. On the night of 1st June 1906 some repairs to the pump had been finished, but a space of about 8 feet of the bratticing which had been removed to effect these repairs had not been replaced.

6. On the morning of 2nd June the deceased, Wallace, who was oversman in that section of the pit and in charge of the repairs, was to fill in the hole in the bratticing, and took for that purpose three men, Gilson, Paterson, and a Pole called Simon Peter.

7. Prior to the commencement of work on said morning, the fireman, John Beattie, had inspected said mine and found gas at a point about 115 feet from the pump towards the face.

8. Beattie duly marked this, and on returning towards the pit bottom marked "Gas found in mine" on the frame "A," and nailed two boards across so as to prevent passage farther into the mine.

9. He proceeded to the pit bottom on his way to enter this in the Report Book.

10. He did not stop the workmen who were then going to their work at various places on the return air course between the frame "A" and the pit bottom from proceeding to their places, but he warned Wallace, whom he met, that he had found gas in the mine, and said that no one was to go beyond the fence he had put up till his return.

11. It does not appear that Beattie led Wallace to understand that the gas was likely to reach out as far as the pump or near it while the ventilation remained as it was.

12. Beattie had no authority to prevent Wallace, who was his superior, from passing this fence, and, to perform the necessary work of repairing the bratticing, Wallace required to take down and pass the fence, and to take others with him.

13. Wallace with his three assistants proceeded, with naked lights, taking down the fence on their way to the pump, when Gilson and Paterson were sent back towards the pit bottom for tools or material, leaving Wallace and Simon Peter at the pump.

14. A few minutes thereafter, and before anything had been done to close the hole in the bratticing, an explosion occurred, by which Simon Peter was severely burned, and Wallace was killed by being dashed against the frame "A," but was not burnt.

15. Simon Peter had proceeded up the mine towards the face with his naked light till about 18 feet from the face, when his lamp ignited the gas.

16. Wallace had in the meantime gone towards the pit bottom, and was somewhere between the two frames when he was caught by the force of the explosion.

17. The pit is not a fiery one, though gas is occasionally found in it, the last occasion being 14th May 1906, and is in use to be worked with naked lights.

18. On the occasion in question Wallace had been told by the manager, as a precautionary measure, though he was not then aware that Beattie had found gas, to take safety lamps with him, and Wallace had taken two, which were found hanging at the pump, but had not been used.

19. While the bratticing remained unrepaired at the pump there was no danger of the gas actually in the mine, as shown by the locus of the ignition, finding its way to the pump, and the men were in no danger in using naked lights there until they began to close up the hole.

20. The gas, being lighter than air, ascended the mine, and consequently accumulated at the working face, and unless it had enormously increased in volume would not extend as far as the pump.

21. When the hole in the bratticing was closed, the air current, which had been making a short circuit through it, would be forced past the working face, and would sweep the gas along the return side of the bratticing, and thus out of the mine.

22. When the hole was so far closed as to send part of the air current past the working face it would have been dangerous to use naked lights, and it would have been obligatory to have extinguished these and to have used the safety lamps.

23. When the air current was restored all the workers on the return air course between the frame "A" and the pit bottom would also have been in danger, and it was Beattie's intention to have them removed after signing the Report Book.

24. Beattie considered that it was unnecessary to remove them at once on his finding gas, as this danger would not arise till the bratticing was repaired.

25. It was admitted that Simon Peter, who was not called, was ignorant of English, and was unable to give any explanation of his going up the mine

26. It is not proved that Wallace sent him up the mine, or that Wallace knew that he had gone there.

27. The General and Special Rules were duly posted, and Wallace was acquainted with them.

28. I also found that it would have been prudent of Wallace to have regarded General Rule VIII. of the Coal Mines Regulation Act as applying to the mine at and near the pump, and to have prevented workers taking naked lights there, but the application of the rule was a matter of opinion, and it was not proved that Wallace disregarded the rule.

29. Wallace was not in breach of any other rule.

On these facts the Sheriff-Substitute found in law that—

(1) Wallace was fatally injured by accident arising out of and in course of the employment ; (2) his injury was not attributable to his serious and wilful misconduct. He assessed the compensation payable by defenders at the agreed-on amount of £290, 10s. sterling.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was :—

> Was the injury to and the death of the said Joseph Wallace attributable to his serious and wilful misconduct ?

2nd Div.

Glenboig Union Fireclay Co. Ltd. v. Wallace.

The following cases were referred to: Dobson, 1905, 8 F. 241; Johnston [1906], A.C. 409.

The Court answered the question of law in the negative.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of opinion that the respondents in the arbitration have failed to show ground for answering the question in this appeal in the affirmative. The Sheriff-Substitute has stated the facts of the case very clearly and fully. It appears that the deceased Wallace, who was oversman, and the Pole Peter were at a place where it was quite safe to carry naked lights; that the deceased was alone with Peter; that Peter moved further forward, and thus caused the explosion by his naked light firing an explosive mixture. This he did when Wallace had gone towards the pit bottom. It was not proved that Peter went forward as he did by any instruction from the deceased, nor that the deceased had any knowledge of his going forward. In these circumstances the arbitrator held in law that the deceased's injury was not caused by his serious and wilful misconduct. These are the words of the statute, and are used obviously to make sure that a workman suffering from an accident shall not lose his claim to compensation merely because his conduct may not have been absolutely prudent, or strictly in accordance with the rules imposed upon him. The act must be both a wilful act of misconduct and must be not trivial or doubtful as regards quality, but must be serious. I cannot hold that the Sheriff was wrong in law in deciding that the circumstances of this case do not disclose serious and wilful misconduct, and therefore I would move your Lordships to answer the question in the negative.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—A fatal accident occurred on 2nd June 1906 to an oversman named Wallace in one section of a fireclay pit, and in the arbitration which followed between his dependants and the employers, the latter stated the plea that the claim should be disallowed, in respect that the injury was attributable to Wallace's serious and wilful misconduct. Sheriff Glegg, who heard the case as arbiter, found (1) that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment; (2) that it was not attributable to Wallace's serious and wilful misconduct; and he assessed the compensation at an agreed-on amount. The question of law submitted to us is whether the second of these findings is correct.

Now, in order to justify an affirmative answer to the question it might be enough to say that the arbitrator being final on the facts, a finding by him which negatives the contention of serious and wilful misconduct ought not to be overturned, provided the arbitrator had any evidence at all to support his judgment. But as I not only think that there was such evidence, but also that his conclusion was the right one in the circumstances, I will shortly state my reasons for so thinking.

The defence that a workman (or his representatives) otherwise entitled to statutory compensation has lost his right to it by his own "serious and wilful misconduct" is a defence which requires proof, and the onus of proof undoubtedly lies upon the employer. The first thing required is that the employer must prove that the injury was "attributable" to the misconduct; the second is that he must prove it to have been "serious and wilful," in the sense of being something far beyond mere negligence, and more than bare misconduct. If there is any reasonable doubt about these two matters, the proof fails, and the rule of the statute (to which this provision forms an exception) must have its way. I think the case of Johnson v. Marshall, Sons & Co. Ltd. in the House of Lords [1906], App. Ca. 409, settles all that, and settles it in a way which is quite consistent with the previous decision of Seven Judges of this Court in Dobson v. United Collieries Ltd., 1905, 8 F. 241. I concurred in that decision, and am very far from suggesting any doubt of its soundness, even if I were not bound by it, which I am. But the feature of that case was that it was a naked light carried by the workman himself which ignited a cartridge, and so caused the injury for which he claimed compensation; and the sole question was whether his ignorance of the duly published rule prohibiting such conduct, and his following a practice in breach of that rule, had the effect of excusing him. We held that it had not that effect, and so that his injury was attributable to his own serious and wilful misconduct. But I fail to see how that advances the argument where the question is, as here, not whether the workman was excusably or inexcusably ignorant of a rule, but whether he himself broke any rule at all to the breach of which his death was directly attributable. I am justified in using the adverb "directly" as qualifying the statutory adjective "attributable," because I find in a case in the First Division which has been reported since the debate in the present case—Broxburn Oil Co. v. Praties, S.L.T. (Vol. XIV. p. 866)—the Lord President, while adhering to the language which he used in Dobson's case, expands that language by adding the words "and the accident (which happens in consequence) is directly attributable to the breaking of the rules." His Lordship accordingly takes the view that the man who was killed did "do a thing which was rash, and which in a civil case would have amounted to contributory negligence, but is not wilful misconduct." Lord M'Laren in the same case adopts as the test of serious and wilful misconduct (at least in certain circumstances) whether moral blame could have been imputed to the workman, and, holding that there was no moral blame, agrees that he does not come within the scope of the statutory exception.

Now, I say the same here. I say that Wallace's death was not directly attributable to the breaking by him of any rule of the pit, but to the wandering away of the Pole Simon Peter with a naked light till he got within 18 feet from the face, when his lamp ignited the gas, and so caused the explosion which killed Wallace. The Sheriff finds (Art. 28 of the case), and he is final on fact, that "it would have been prudent of Wallace to have regarded General Rule VIII. of the Coal Mines Regulation Act as applying to the mine at or near the pump, and to have prevented workers taking naked lights there, but the application of the rule was a matter of opinion, and it was not proved that Wallace disregarded the rule," and (Art. 29) that "Wallace was not in breach of any other rule." Now, what is that but to say that the worst that can be charged against Wallace is that he perhaps, to use the Lord President's words in the Broxburn case, "did do a thing that was rash . . . . but was not wilful misconduct"? If moral blame be sometimes the test of serious and wilful misconduct, where was the moral blame of what he did?

The wording of General Rule VIII. makes the danger of using naked lights so much a matter of opinion that I cannot doubt that the Sheriff was within his right in holding, as a matter of proof, that it was not proved that Wallace disregarded the rule. The fireman (Beattie) had no doubt found gas in the mine, and had marked a notice to that effect on the frame A, and had told Wallace, when he met him, that no one was to go beyond the two boards which he had put up there as a fence till his return. But Beattie did not think it necessary himself to stop the workmen who were then going to their work at various places on the return air course between the frame A and the pit bottom, or to prevent them from proceeding to their places (Art. 10); and he did not lead Wallace to understand that the gas was likely to reach out as far as the pump or near it while the ventilation remained as it was (Art. 11). Now, the explosion occurred from the Pole's lamp, igniting the gas before anything had been done to close the hole in the bratticing (Art. 14), and it is found as a matter of fact that the men were in no danger in using naked lights at the pump until they began to close up the hole (Art. 19). It must be remembered that Wallace, who was oversman in that section of the pit, was in charge of the repairs to the pump, in connection with which the hole (of about 8 feet) in the bratticing had been made, and it was to fill in this hole that he had taken three men, including Simon Peter, with him. There was, therefore, nothing wrong in his taking these men past Beattie's fence, and on to the pump. Indeed, it is found as matter of fact (Art. 12) that he required to take down and pass this fence and to take others with him, in order to perform the necessary work of repairing the bratticing. The Pole was wrong, as the event proved, in wandering up the mine to the face with a naked light. But Wallace did not send him up the mine, and did not know that he had gone there (Art. 26), and he was not of course to blame for Simon Peter being a Pole, ignorant of English, and unable to give any explanation of why he went up the mine (Art. 25). If anybody is to suffer for his ignorance of English, it must surely be those who employed him.

But then it is urged, strangely enough, by those very employers that, though it was not any act of Wallace's own which caused the explosion, though he was perfectly safe in being where he was (between the two frames) at the time of the explosion—though, in short, his injury and death were in no way attributable to his own serious and wilful misconduct—still, in some roundabout way, he was to blame for allowing Simon Peter to be where he was. I asked Mr Hunter, as counsel for the employers, on what rule he relied as fixing that duty on Wallace the oversman, and his answer was to point to Special Rules Nos. 7, 67, 71 and 100. Rule No. 7 merely requires that the oversman "shall see the General and Special Rules faithfully and vigorously enforced." But the oversman cannot be at more places than one at a time, or stand over each individual worker who has to obey the rules. Rule 67 forbids miners and other workers to proceed into travelling roads or working places until it shall have been reported to them by certain officials that such places are safe to be entered. Rule 71 (speaking generally) contains a similar prohibition against miners going into or improperly near any place throughout the whole mine where danger is known or suspected to exist. And Rule 100 is to the same effect, although it is more specific than Rules 67 and 71, in providing that workers of all descriptions are not to proceed through any fence or pass any notice erected to indicate that danger exists. But none of these rules can apply to Wallace and his three assistants in passing the fence erected by Beattie, when it is found as a fact in the case that, to perform the necessary work of repairing the bratticing, Wallace "required to take down and pass the fence, and to take others with him," and that, so long as they remained at or near the pump, they were perfectly safe in using naked lights until they began to close up the hole. The whole gravamen, therefore, of this charge against Wallace resolves itself into the Pole having been allowed—or rather not forcibly prevented—from passing up the mine towards the face with a naked light when Wallace's back was turned. A more slender or captious ground on which to base a charge of even bare misconduct against Wallace I cannot conceive, and the charge becomes, in my opinion, grossly unreasonable when it is carried so far as to be not merely misconduct, but "serious and wilful misconduct." I take leave to say that nothing at all approaching it has ever been sustained since the Act was passed. It is no light matter to bring a charge of that kind against a superior workman in a pit, and in my opinion it cannot be justified unless the employer can bring clear proof of a deliberate infraction by the workman so accused of some general or special rule of the pit. Without attempting any precise or exhaustive definition of what will constitute "serious and wilful misconduct," I think it is at least safe to say that it must be something positive and personal.

Glenboig Union Fireclay Co. Ltd. v. Wallace.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

It was said in the course of the argument that the fireman (Beattie) was the proper person to judge of the safety of the mine as regards the presence of gas. I do not recapitulate the findings of fact which show that even Beattie did not consider it necessary to remove the men at once on his finding gas, as no danger would arise till the repair of the bratticing was begun. But on this matter I am content to rely on the Sheriff's finding in fact that Beattie had no authority, even if he had desired, to prevent Wallace, who was his superior in the mine, from passing the fence which he had erected, for the purpose of performing a necessary work. I am therefore for answering the question of law in the negative, and so for upholding the Sheriff-Substitute's decision.

41. Gilchrist v. Whyte.

I. Contract—Loan—Proof—Contract to Accept Loan on Bond and Disposition in Security Held Not Proved by Correspondence Between Parties.

II. Recompense—Heritable Loan—Refusal of Borrower to Complete Proposed Loan—Expenses Incurred by Lender in Connection with Loan—Action to Recover Expenses Dismissed.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court at Glasgow.

This was an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow at the instance of Miss Gilchrist and another, Stirling, against W. M. Whyte, architect, Glasgow, for payment of the sum of £53, 10s. 3d.

The pursuers' averments were as follows :—

Cond. 1. On or about 7th May 1904 the defender, through his agent . . . . entered into negotiations with the pursuers . . . . for a loan of £2000 over certain heritable subjects in Marlborough Crescent North, Crow Road, Partick, as the result of which the pursuers agreed to give the defender, and the defender agreed to accept from them, a loan of £1700, to be secured over the said subjects by a bond and disposition in security in the usual terms. In the course of the negotiations, which extended over several months, and for the details of which reference is made to the correspondence [the import of which sufficiently appears from the opinion of Lord Low, infra], the following additional conditions, inter alia, were agreed to, viz. :—

(1) The conditions set forth in Article 2 of the Condescendence.

(2) That a valuation of the security subjects should be procured by the pursuers at the defender's expense; and

(3) That as there had been considerable delay in settling the transaction, for which the lenders were not responsible, the interest on the sum in the bond should run as from 15th September 1904. According to the established practice in such transactions, it is incumbent on the borrower to relieve the lender of the expense incurred to the lender's law agent for professional charges and outlays. Acting on the arrangements made with the defender, and in accordance with the said practice, the pursuers, with the knowledge and consent of the defender, procured a valuation from James Barr, property valuator, Glasgow, and incurred expenses to their said law agents in carrying out the said transaction. . . .

Cond. 2. When the said loan was arranged, it was a condition of the arrangement that the defender should, prior to the settlement, procure and exhibit to them a discharge by the superior of certain real burdens on the said heritable subjects with reference to the formation of pavements and sewers. . . .

Cond. 3. The bond and disposition in security by the defender in favour of the pursuers was prepared by the latter's law agents, revised by the defender's law agent, and, afterwards, signed by the defender. When the pursuers' agents attended on the agent of the defender to settle the said loan, they were informed by the latter that the defender declined to procure and exhibit the discharge by the superior before referred to, and, as the pursuers declined to relieve him of his obligation on this point, the defender, on 2nd November 1904, finally refused to go on with the transaction.

Cond. 4. The pursuers thereupon, on 3rd November 1904, consigned the amount of the proposed loan on deposit receipt, and endeavoured to get another investment for the money, but were unable to get a suitable investment until Whitsunday 1905. Had the said bond and disposition in security been duly delivered to the pursuers, in terms of the arrangement between the parties, the earliest date at which the pursuers would have been obliged to accept repayment of the loan was Whitsunday 1905. The said bond and disposition in security and the adjusted draft thereof are in the possession of the defender or his law agents, and he is called upon to produce them. During the period from 3rd November 1904 to 15th May 1905 the said sum of £1700 was only earning interest at deposit receipt rates.

Cond. 5. In consequence of the defender's breach of contract, the pursuers have sustained loss and damage to the extent of the sum sued for, which is made up as follows :—The interest on the said sum of £1700, at 4 per cent., from 15th September 1904 to 15th May 1905, amounts to the sum of £44, 12s. 4d., which, after deduction of £11, 18s. 5d., being the amount of deposit receipt interest on the said sum, leaves a balance of £32, 13s. 11d. of a loss of revenue to the pursuers on the said sum. The pursuers also incurred an account to their law agents, for the preparation of the said bond, amounting to £20, 16s. 4d. The said two sums of £32, 13s. 11d. and £20, 16s. 4d. make up the sum sued for. Or otherwise the pursuers, in reliance on the defender's representations that the said bond would be granted and the said conditions specified in Articles 1 and 2 of the Condescendence implemented, incurred the said account to their law agents, and also lost the said sum of interest in consequence of their being unable to obtain another investment as condescended upon.

The Pursuers pleaded:

"1. The pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the extent of the sum sued for, through the defender's breach of contract, decree should be granted as craved.

"2. The pursuers having incurred expense and sustained loss in consequence of their reliance on the defender's representations as condescended on, are entitled to decree as concluded for."

The passage in italics in Cond. 5 and the second plea in law were added by way of amendment at the close of the debate in the Court of Session.

The Defender pleaded, inter alia:—

"1. The action is irrelevant."

On 9th December 1905 the Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe) sustained the first plea in law for the defender and dismissed the action.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who, on 13th June 1906, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, found that the pursuers, in reliance on representations made by the defender, incurred certain expenses in connection with the proposed loan for which the defender was liable, and allowed a proof of the damages claimed.

The Defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued: (1) Any contract relating to sale of, or loan on, heritage must be holograph or tested (Goldston, 1868, 7 M. 188; Scottish Lands Co., 1880, 7 R. 756; Woddrop, 1906, 14 S.L.T. 319; Mowat, 1895, 33 S.L.R. 203; Bryan, 1892, 19 R. 490; Dickson on Evidence, sects. 549, 550). Further, it must be stamped. The writings relied on as constituting the contract in the present case satisfied none of these conditions. (2) The pursuers had stated no relevant claim for recompense, and the cases cited by them in this connection did not apply.

Argued for the Pursuers: (1) The correspondence between parties' agents instructed a completed contract to borrow on the conditions therein specified (Westren, 1879, 7 R. 173; Anderson, 1901, 4 F. 68; South African Territories Ltd., [1898], A.C. 309). (2) In any case the defender was bound to recoup the pursuers for the loss suffered by them in consequence of the representations made by him: (Walker, 1823, 2 S. 379; Heddle, 1846, 8 D. 376; Dobie, 1873, 11 M. 749; Allan, 1875, 2 R. 587; Hamilton, 1899, 1 F. 478).

The Court sustained the appeal, recalled the judgment appealed against, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of 9th December 1905, and dismissed the action.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This is an action of damages by two ladies who had money to lend on heritable security, and who say that all the essential terms of an agreement to lend £1700 over certain heritable subjects in Partick belonging to the defender had been arranged with him between May and November 1904, when he suddenly drew back and refused to go on with the transaction. The consequence is, according to the pursuers, that they have lost the sum of £53, 10s. 3d., made up (1) of £32, 13s. 11d., being the difference between deposit receipt interest and interest at 4 per cent., which the loan was to have borne if the transaction had gone on; and (2) £20, 16s. 4d., being the account which they have incurred to their law agents for the preparation of the bond. The action was originally laid on breach of contract alone (though specific implement was never demanded), but since the appeal was brought the pursuers have amended their condescendence and pleas by founding alternatively on their having incurred expense and sustained loss by their reliance on the representations of the defenders. In other words, they rely alternatively on the class of cases of which Walker v. Milne (the Melville Monument case), 2 S. 379, is the best-known example.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe), dealing with the case as it then stood, sustained the plea of irrelevancy and dismissed the action. The Sheriff recalled this interlocutor, pronounced certain findings as to the effect of the admitted correspondence between the agents of the parties, including a finding that the pursuers had relied on the representation made by the defender, and that the defender was liable to pay the expenses, if any, which the pursuers had incurred in consequence of their so relying, and the learned Sheriff concluded with allowing a proof of the specific damages alleged, which proof, by a subsequent interlocutor, he remitted to the Sheriff-Substitute to take. It is obvious, both from the Sheriff's findings, and still more plainly from his note, that in his view the real case for the pursuer is founded on the Melville Monument case—that view is, by the amendment which we have allowed, now formulated by the pursuers themselves.

It still has to be considered, however, whether the pursuers have succeeded in making a relevant case even on this ground. Now, the whole point of a claim of this kind is that the pursuer, despairing of making out a contract of which he can demand implement, falls back on a claim of indemnification for any actual loss or damage which he may have sustained "through the representations and inducements recklessly and unwarrantably held out to him by the other party." I take these words from the opinion of Lord Deas in Allan v. Gilchrist, 2 R. at p. 590, where he analyses all the cases on this exceptional branch of the law from Wallace v. Milne downwards.

Where, I ask, is the averment of any such representations and inducements? Not certainly by merely saying that "according to the established practice in such transactions, it is incumbent on the borrower to relieve the lender of the expense incurred to the lender's law agent for professional charges and outlays"—which is one head of the claim in this case—or by merely saying that on a particular date "the pursuers consigned the amount of the proposed loan on deposit receipt, and endeavoured to get another investment for the money, but were unable to get a suitable investment until Whitsunday 1905"—which is the other head of the claim. Neither of these averments is an averment of representations and inducements held out by the defender to the effect that, whether the proposed transactions went on or not, the defender would reimburse the pursuers. The first of these averments is simply an averment of the pursuers' understanding of the alleged practice, not an averment of any representation made by the defender; and unless it can be maintained that in every negotiation for a loan on heritable security the proposed lender is entitled to run up an account with his own law agent at the expense of the borrower, I fail to apprehend the relevancy of the averment. Similarly, with regard to the second averment, can it be said that the moment the lender thinks proper to consign the money, he is entitled to charge against the proposed borrower the difference between deposit receipt rate and the rate of interest on the loan, without any special stipulation to that effect? I agree with the Sheriff Substitute that possible borrowers would be rather startled by the suggestion.

On the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that, waiving all questions as to the mode of proof in a case raising purely the question whether there had been an agreement to make a loan on certain conditions, there is here no relevant averment either of breach of contract, or of right to reimbursement of actual outlay incurred on the faith of representations made by the defender. I am therefore of opinion, with all respect to the Sheriff, that we should find that the pursuers have not stated a relevant case in support of either of their pleas in law, and dismiss the action.

Lord Low.—The defender was proprietor of two tenements at Broomhill, near Partick, over each of which he was desirous of borrowing. The pursuers were willing to lend a sum not exceeding £1800 upon the security of one of the tenements, and the defender was willing to accept a loan of that amount. Ultimately the precise amount of the proposed loan was fixed at £1700.

It appears that the tenements were not quite completed when the negotiations commenced, and further, the ground on which they were built appears to have been part of a larger area, the whole of which was subject to certain conditions and obligations in regard to the erection of building, the formation of pavements, and the repayment to the superior of the cost of making certain roads and sewers. These conditions and obligations had only been partially fulfilled, and accordingly the pursuers' agents very properly insisted that arrangements should be made which would free their clients from the risk of the security subjects being liable to claims at the instance of the superior of an unascertained amount. In such circumstances it is not surprising that the negotiations should have been both complicated and prolonged.

Shortly after the commencement of the negotiations, namely, on 18th May 1904, the pursuers' agents wrote to the defender's agent specifying a number of points which a perusal of the titles had suggested. One of these had regard to the conditions and obligations to which I have already referred. In reference to these the pursuers' agents wrote: "The feuar is bound to form Marlborough Avenue, to form a pavement along Crow Road, to pay interest at five per cent. on £421, 8s. 8d., being half cost of formation of Broomhill Drive and sewer, and on completion of each tenement in Broomhill Drive to repay the capital sum applicable thereto. As these conditions are real burdens on the whole ground, non-fulfilment of which may result in forfeiture of the whole ground, it is necessary that the superior should free the two tenements of these obligations."

In reply, the defender's agent simply stated the position in which matters stood, which amounted to this, that the conditions referred to were, in so far as not already implemented, in course of being implemented.

After some further correspondence, to which it is unnecessary to refer, the pursuers' agents again wrote to the defender's agent on 1st July 1904, saying, inter alia, "The obligations to the superior regarding the formation of streets, the formation of foot pavements, etc., should be implemented before settlement of the bond, so that the security subjects may be cleared of any claim by the superior for these matters or for interest relating thereto."

In answer to that part of the letter, the defender's agent wrote: "Under this head I anticipate no difficulty whatever."

The pursuers' agents evidently regarded that answer as satisfactory, because they proceeded with the negotiations, and a bond and disposition in security was prepared, and apparently was actually executed by the defender. When, however, the time for settlement arrived, the conditions in regard to the formation of streets, etc., had not been completely implemented, and the pursuers' agents were not satisfied that the security subjects were free from the possibility of claims on the part of the superior. In these circumstances various proposals were made upon the one side and the other with the view of getting over the difficulty, but no agreement was come to—the pursuers' agents regarding the proposals of the defender's agent as inadequate, and the latter regarding the demands of the former as excessive. Negotiations were accordingly broken off, and thereafter the pursuers brought the present action, in which they demand payment from the defender of the sum of £53, 10s. 3d. being the amount (£20, 16s. 4d.) of the account which they have incurred to their law agents, and £32, 13s. 11d., being the difference between the amount of interest which they would have received if the transaction had been completed and deposit receipt interest, which was all that they actually received, until another investment for the capital sum was obtained.

As the action was originally laid, the pursuers' claim was based entirely upon alleged breach of contract: that is to say, upon breach of a contract for the loan of money by the pursuers to the defender upon the security of heritable property belonging to the latter. It is plain that no such contract was ever completed, negotiations being broken off because the pursuers' law agents were not satisfied with the state of the title. Accordingly the original ground of action fails. The pursuers have, however, amended the record to the effect of adding another ground of claim which they state thus:—"The pursuers, in reliance on the defender's representations that the said bond would be granted and the said conditions specified in Articles 1 and 2 of the Condescendence implemented, incurred the said account to their law agents and also lost the said sum of interest."

Now, I do not know what is meant by the statement that the defender represented that the bond would be granted; but the fact was that the defender was all along willing to grant the bond, and would have granted it, if the pursuers would have accepted it in exchange for the money.

In regard to the conditions which it is averred that the defender represented should be implemented, those which are specified in Articles 1 and 2 of the Condescendence, and to which it is averred that the defender agreed, are three in number. There is first the condition made by the pursuers' agents in their letter of 18th May 1904, that it was "necessary that the superior should free the tenements" of the obligations in regard to the formation of streets, sewers, and so forth, or, as they put it in their letter of 1st July, that the obligations should be "implemented before settlement of the bond, so that the security subjects may be cleared of any claim by the superior for these matters, or for interest relating thereto."

I have already pointed out that in answer to the first of these letters the defender's agent merely stated how matters stood, and that in answer to the second letter he wrote—"Under this head I anticipate no difficulty whatever."

I do not doubt that the latter influenced the pursuers' agents in continuing the negotiations, because if the defender's agent had said that there was no chance of the conditions being implemented or of the security subjects being otherwise freed of possible claims on the part of the superior when settlement of the loan came to be made, I think that very probably the pursuers' agents would have declined to go on. I am of opinion, however, that the statement of the defender's agent did not amount to a representation upon the faith of which the subsequent expense of the negotiations must be held to have been incurred. Indeed, the statement was not a representation at all, but an expression of opinion (and I do not doubt of a perfectly honest opinion), and the pursuers' agents took the risk of that opinion not being confirmed by the event. I am therefore of opinion that, so far as the condition with which I have been dealing is concerned, this is not one of those cases in which a party who has incurred expense or performed operations in reliance upon representations made by another is entitled to be indemnified by that other, although there has been no actual contract between them.

The next condition founded on in the condescendence is "that a valuation of the security subjects should be procured by the pursuers at the defender's expense." Now the defender did agree that a valuation of the subjects should be "instructed by the pursuers in the usual way." My impression is that it is a matter of common occurrence for an agreement to be made that the proposed lender shall obtain a valuation of the security subjects at the expense of the proposed borrower, whether the loan is ultimately given or not. I think, therefore, that there would have been a great deal to be said for the view that the words "in the usual way" meant that the defender should in any event bear the cost of the valuation. No such argument, however, was stated for the pursuers, and it cannot be assumed that, if it had been stated, the defender would not have had a good answer. At all events, he was entitled to be heard.

The third condition founded upon is that interest should run from 15th September 1904. It is true that the defender agreed to pay interest from that date, but that was only in the event of the transaction being completed. He never agreed to pay, or represented that he would pay, interest if the money was not in fact lent to him.

I am therefore of opinion that the defender is entitled to absolvitor. I am not surprised that the pursuers should feel aggrieved that they should have sustained so considerable a loss without any corresponding benefit; but, with the exception perhaps of the cost of the valuation, the pursuers' losses are of a kind which a person negotiating a loan of money upon heritable security has always, in a greater or less degree, to face, and the fact that the loss has been perhaps unusually heavy in this case is simply due to the peculiar circumstances to which I have alluded.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with what has been said by Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Low as to the history and facts of this case, and it is unnecessary for me to go over them in detail.

The ground on which the action proceeded as first brought into Court was breach of contract, but it is clear that as concerns that ground the action is irrelevant, and that there was no completed contract of loan over heritage between the parties. But a plea was subsequently added to the effect that the pursuers, having incurred expense and sustained loss in consequence of their reliance on the defender's representations as condescended on with regard to a proposed loan, are entitled to decree as concluded for; in other words, damages are sought for expenses incurred in connection with an inchoate contract which has never been completed. I think that as such an action does not proceed on contract, it must proceed on one of two grounds, either on wrongdoing more or less flagrant, or on the ground which is expressed in the brocard nemo debet ex alieno damno lucrari.

The decided cases in which an action has been sustained in respect of damage caused by one of the parties to an inchoate contract not carrying it out are few in number and peculiar in their circumstances. All the cases up to March 1875 are ably analysed and reviewed by Lord Deas in the case of Allan v. Gilchrist, 2 R. 587. He points out that in the case of Walker v. Milne, 2 Shaw 338, the relevancy of the items of the alleged loss did not appear to have been settled or the case brought to any judicial conclusion. In the case of Heddle v. Baikie, 8 D. 376, the circumstances were very special, and the damage to which the pursuer was found entitled was, not for breach of contract, but for loss sustained after possession of a farm had been ceded to him, and while certain grossly illegal and oppressive proceedings had been going on; or, in other words, it was for actual loss sustained in consequence of the unjustifiable representations and inducements made and held out by the one party to the other, contrary to all good faith, and his unjustifiable conduct throughout the whole transaction. The case of Bell v. Bell, 3 D. 1201, rested on the second ground I have above alluded to, the damage claimed being for the loss caused by building a house on a piece of ground on the faith of a promise that it would be conveyed to the pursuer, and in respect that the defender had mala fide or fraudulently induced the pursuer to build, but the damages were limited to the specific amount expended on the house. Subsequent to the case of Allan v. Gilchrist, the case of Dobie v. Lauder's Trs., 11 M. 749 occurred, in which the pursuer averred that the defenders arranged to board certain children with her, and that both parties having contemplated that the arrangement should endure for a term of years, she had incurred certain expenditure, which she lost by the guardians suddenly and without any reasonable excuse bringing the arrangement to a close. There it was held that the pursuer was entitled to be reimbursed for actual loss, Lord Neaves putting the liability on the ground that when parties are engaged mutually in promoting an object of common interest, and the expenses of furthering that object are thrown on one of the parties, that when the expenditure fails in the end aimed at, the party-disburser must be reimbursed as being the disburser for a common object. But it may, I think with equal truth, be said that this was an action founded upon a wrong which consisted in the defenders leading the pursuer, by certain representations, to incur serious outlay, and then disappointing these expectations without any reason.

Again, in the case of Hamilton v. Lochrane, 1 F. 478, a proof was allowed of the pursuer's averments where a sum of £150 was claimed as the cost of certain alterations made by the pursuer on a villa that he was in course of erecting, on the request of the defender, who had an option of purchasing the house down to a certain date. This was, in my opinion, a very narrow case, and all that was decided was to allow a proof before answer; and the decision, such as it was, was a reversal of the decisions of a Sheriff and a Sheriff-Substitute, and the soundness of that reversal was strongly doubted by Lord Moncreiff.

From these authorities I think it may be inferred that an action of damages founded on the ground of recompense for loss caused through failure to complete or carry out a contract, but where there has been no breach of contract, will only be entertained by the Court in very special circumstances indeed, and for the most part only in cases where (1) loss has been wrongfully caused by one of the parties to the other, including, however, loss or expense incurred as part of the abortive negotiations between the parties; (2) where the wrong has been done without any excuse; and (3) where the losing party is in no way to blame for the loss.

But it need hardly be pointed out how inconvenient and ridiculous it would be if in any case where a person has been put to expense and trouble in the hope or expectation or anticipation of a contract being concluded and after all no contract is concluded, he should be entitled to ask a court of law to entertain and investigate a claim of damages against the party who withdrew from the negotiations, it being in law the right of every one to resile from a contract before final consents have been exchanged, or, in the case of heritage, before it has been concluded habili modo by writing or otherwise. If such actions were to be allowed it would necessitate an enquiry in every case of the kind into nice and difficult questions as to which of the parties had behaved reasonably or unreasonably in order to determine the question of who was to blame for the contract not being proceeded with. Such actions, accordingly, will not as a rule be entertained by a court of law.

Applying these remarks to the present case, I am of opinion that the pursuers have presented no relevant case, for I entirely agree with what has been said by your Lordships as to there being no blame on the part of the defender leading to loss of such description as the Court will take cognisance of. My impression is that the pursuers were unnecessarily anxious and troublesome regarding the settlement of a transaction in which it was the defender's interest as well as their own that there should be no forfeiture of the feu, and where, as far as I can see, there were no important practical difficulties in the way of the loan being concluded, except those raised by the pursuers themselves.

Grieve's Trustees v. Grieve and Others.

Petition to Apply Judgment of the House of Lords.

This was a motion in the Single Bills in a petition to apply the judgment of the House of Lords in an action of multiplepoinding raised by the trustees of the late John Grieve, hotelkeeper, Edinburgh, who died in 1903, for the distribution of his estate.

The question raised in the case, which turned on the interpretation of an agreement between the testator and his son James Grieve (and is not reported), was whether by said agreement the prior testamentary writings of the testator were impliedly revoked. These writings included a codicil under which Mrs Grieve, the testator's widow, claimed the liferent of a sum of £10,000. In the Outer House Lord Kyllachy held, by interlocutor dated 22nd June 1904, that the agreement between the testator and his son operated as a revocation of his prior testamentary writings, including the said codicil. On 16th November 1904 the First Division (The Lord President (Lord Kinross) and Lords Adam and Moncrieff) recalled that interlocutor, and found, inter alia, that Mrs Grieve was entitled to the liferent of the sum of £10,000. On 30th December 1904, Mrs Grieve having made application to the trustees, received from them the sum of £500 to account of her liferent of the sum of £10,000, and granted a simple receipt in those terms. In May 1905 James Grieve, the testator's son, appealed to the House of Lords, and in July 1906 the House sustained the appeal and restored the interlocutor of Lord Kyllachy. Mrs Grieve and the other claimants asked for their expenses out of the fund in medio, in view of the fact that the litigation was caused by the way in which the testator had left his testamentary writings. The House allowed all parties their expenses out of the fund.

On the petition by the trustees of James Grieve (who had died since the appeal) to apply the judgment of the House of Lords, Mrs Grieve moved that the decree in her favour for expenses (as taxed at £421) should go out in name of her agents as disbursers of the expenses.

The trustees of James Grieve opposed the motion, and argued that as Mrs Grieve had received £500 out of the fund in medio which, under the judgment of the House of Lords, she was not entitled to, and had not repaid that money, decree should go out in her own name. [The Lord President referred to the case of Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair, 1907, 14 S.L.T. 783.]

Argued for Mrs Grieve: The purpose of a decree in name of agent disburser was to protect the agent against compensation between the expenses for which decree was given, and any other debt due by the party in whose favour expenses had been awarded. The doctrine was well established, and the only exception allowed to it was where there were two awards of expenses in favour of different parties, in which case the one might be set off against the other, and decree in the agent's name would not be allowed. Here the £500 had been paid direct to Mrs Grieve and spent by her, and the agents had themselves disbursed the expenses of the House of Lords appeal. The Lochgelly Iron Co. case and all the cases cited in it were cases of two sets of expenses, and the judgment there had no bearing on the present question. Mrs Grieve might or might not ultimately be liable to pay the £500, but even assuming that decree had gone out against her to repay that money in the same interlocutor that awarded her expenses, compensation would not be allowed between the principal sum and the expenses (Munro v. Bothwell, 1846, Arkley's Just. Rep. 118; Bell's Com., II. 36; Bell's Prin., sect. 1389; Russell v. Greig & Peddie, 1826, 4 S. 403; Miller v. Geils, 1848, 10 D. 1384; Gordon v. Davidson, 1868, 3 M. 938, Begg on Law Agents, 193).

Grieve's Trustees v. Grieve and Others.

The Court refused the motion.

The Lord President.—The facts on which this controversy arises are these:—A certain lady, Mrs Grieve, was a claimant in a multiplepoinding which had to do with the estate of her deceased husband John Grieve. In the Court of Session there was a finding pronounced which affirmed her right to the interest on a sum of £10,000. After that finding was pronounced, Mrs Grieve made application to the trustees, and the trustees made a payment to her of £500. Another claimant thereafter took an appeal to the House of Lords, which reversed the finding of the Court of Session to which I have referred, and determined that Mrs Grieve had no right to any interest on the sum of £10,000. At the same time the House of Lords awarded expenses to all the claimants out of the fund in medio.

On a motion to apply the judgment the agent for Mrs Grieve asks that decree for expenses be pronounced in name of the agent disburser. This motion is resisted by the trustees, who point out that if decree is granted as craved they will lose their right to retain the sum found due as expenses against the £500 paid by them to Mrs Grieve out of the estate.

The point is really settled by the judgment in Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair, 14 S.L.T. 783. I had occasion in that case to go into the general principles determining the right of an agent to get a decree in his name, and the judgment in that case was based on the judgment of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Gordon v. Davidson, 13th June 1865, 3 M. 938. The point is found shortly stated in a sentence quoted in the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in that case from Lord Glenlee: "I have no idea that the agent in a cause is in any better situation than the principal party, barring extrinsic claims of compensation." Applying that, I have no doubt that this is not an extrinsic claim. Part of the fund in medio has been paid to this lady, and it is difficult to see why the trustees should be deprived of their right to claim retention or compensation. We are not deciding as to whether the lady herself may not have a good defence against this claim.

I may add that the case of Munro v. Bothwell, 16th September 1846, Arkley's Justiciary Reports 118, is in conflict with the other decisions, and cannot be looked on as an authority. That judgment, though by a judge of great eminence, was given on circuit, where there is naturally less time for deliberation than in cases determined by a Division of the Court. In view of other decisions, I think that that case is not law.

Appeal against a Decision of the First Division (The Lord President (Lord Dunedin), Lords M'Laren and Kinnear).

The Clippens Oil Co. Ltd. appealed against the interlocutor of the First Division awarding £27,000 damages, and the Edinburgh and District Water Trustees lodged a cross appeal.

The argument turned on the question of liability and the amount of damages due. No argument was presented against the judgment of the Court of Seven Judges as to the date till which the interim interdict subsisted.

The House dismissed both appeals, with costs.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Clippens Oil Co. Ltd. v. Edinburgh and District Water Trustees.

The Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor.—This case comes before your Lordships under conditions of exceptional difficulty. Both the Lord Ordinary and the First Division have found in favour of the pursuers. Nor is there any dispute in regard to liability. It is merely a question of damages. But the amount of damages, so far from admitting of precise calculation, depends upon a series of conjectures as to what would or might have happened in the way of working a shale mine if the defenders had not obtained a wrongous interdict to prevent or hinder its being worked. And the learned judges who heard this case in the Outer and the Inner House have not specifically found one way or another upon a variety of issues of fact, in regard to which a Court ought to be satisfied before it can assess damages with accuracy. No doubt these matters were duly weighed in the Courts below, but we have not their conclusions upon all of them, and this House can hardly review with any sense of confidence the great mass of detailed evidence without seeing and hearing the witnesses, and judging for itself of their trustworthiness.

In substance the story of the dispute is as follows. Defenders, as the water authority for the city of Edinburgh, own two water pipes which run over the surface of land beneath which are the pursuers' mines. If any subsidence should occur, these pipes would be injured, and the mines themselves might be flooded. Accordingly the pursuers wished the defenders to purchase under the Waterworks Clauses Acts a strip of the mines of forty yards in width on either side of the track upon which the water pipes ran. Defenders refused to purchase. Upon this the pursuers, thinking that this refusal entitled them, under the Waterworks Act, to work out their mines beneath the pipes, and remove the pillars which had been left from previous workings, notified their intention of so doing. This was in the year 1897.

Now it so happened that both parties were at that time under a misapprehension of their legal rights. In law (though the point was not finally determined until it came before this House in 1903) the defenders were entitled to common law support for one of their two pipes. Therefore the pursuers had no right to work their mines so as to let down the surface, and their view that they had such a right was wholly erroneous. On the other hand, the defenders, though ignorant of their true title to support, erroneously thought that the pursuers were precluded from working within a space of forty yards on either side of a line vertically beneath the track of their water pipes, because of their having already worked within that space before giving notices under the Waterworks Clauses Act. In this mistaken belief the defenders applied for and obtained, in March 1897, an interdict prohibiting pursuers from working their mines or removing shale within the said space of eighty yards. Now, if the interdict had merely prohibited working so as to let down the surface, it would have been quite proper, for one of the pipes was in fact entitled to support. But instead of doing that, the interdict went further, and forbade all removal of shale within the forbidden area. The reason of this blunder was that defenders misconceived their legal position; but the result of it is that they are liable in damages for whatever loss was sustained by pursuers in consequence of the interdict being in excess of what it ought to have been.

This interdict was granted in March 1897. In September 1897 the Lord Ordinary recalled it so far as the points now in issue were concerned. But the defenders appealed against this recal; and here, unfortunately, another error arose. It was held by the Lord Ordinary, erroneously, as is now admitted, that the interdict did not continue operative until the appeal was heard in the Inner House. In Scottish law this interdict did in fact check the pursuers' mining operations from March 1897 till February 1898, when it was finally recalled by the Inner House.

When pursuers first brought their action they thought that the interdict was wrong from beginning to end, and claimed that they had suffered damages to the extent of £137,000 by reason of being prevented from working the mines under the track of the pipes for a space of eighty yards in width. When they learned from the decision of this House in 1903 that the interdict was only in part wrong, they adapted their claim to the altered legal conditions and said that the interdict wrongously prohibited them from driving levels through the eighty yards strip so as to get at and work shale lying outside of that strip. The claim for damages remained, as before, £137,000. It is not disputed that the interdict did prohibit driving such levels, and was to that extent wrongous, for such levels might have been driven without letting down the surface. And the real controversy in this case is narrowed down to the question, What damages have pursuers suffered by reason of the interdict stopping them from driving such levels and getting at the shale beyond during the eleven months from March 1897 to February 1898?

I do not think any useful purpose would be served by a minute examination of the claim. It is based upon the theory that the pursuers had a prosperous future before them, and that they incurred ruin because of this interdict. I must say that the particulars of the claim seem to me most unsatisfactory. And the foundation on which it rests is highly speculative. I find it very difficult to believe that this Company had any but the most remote prospects of success, and it seems at least doubtful whether it was to any considerable extent affected by so much of the interdict of March 1897 as was wrongous. There is a great deal to be said for the view that the Company would in no case have succeeded, and that the grievance of not being able to drive levels is a mere afterthought, conjured up to sustain a claim of damages when the original claim had broken down. But I do not feel myself at liberty to depart on such points from the opinion of the learned judge who saw and heard the witnesses. And though he does not in detail deal with the evidence which has awakened my misgivings, he does find that a wrong was done, and that substantial damage has ensued. Your Lordships, as it seems to me, are in this case practically bound to accept that conclusion.

House of Lords.

Clippens Oil Co. Ltd. v. Edinburgh and District Water Trustees.

The Lord Chancellor.

In assessing the damages, Lord Pearson arrived at the figure £15,000, upon the footing, which is not now sustained, that the interdict was operative only till September of 1897. No materials are given that enable me to discover how this figure was arrived at. The First Division found that the interdict was operative till February 1898, and fixed the damages at £27,000. So far as can be surmised, for here again materials are wanting for a definite opinion, the First Division adopted Lord Pearson's basis, and merely gave an additional sum for the additional months during which the interdict continued in force. Where everything, or nearly everything, rests in conjecture, there is room for infinite diversity of view.

This is like the common case where a jury are asked to assess damages with no fixed rule and few ascertained facts to guide them. In such cases very strong ground must be laid for disturbing the verdict. I think your Lordships can only apply the same principle here. I have not been satisfied that the sum of £27,000 does not fairly represent the damages.

For these reasons I am of opinion that both the appeal and the cross appeal should be dismissed with costs.

I am requested by Lord Macnaghten, who is unable to be present, to say that he concurs.

Lord Ashbourne.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor. Yet, although the liability of the defendants is clear, the question, in my opinion, resolves itself into consideration of the amount of the damages to be awarded. The case is one of much difficulty, and it is far from easy to make anything like a precise calculation of the sum to be assessed as damages. The amount asked for by pursuers is the large sum of £137,000, and Lord Pearson has awarded the substantial sum of £15,000, which the First Division has increased to £27,000. We have no means of knowing how these figures were worked out, but once the First Division decided that the interdict continued until the final disposal of the case in February 1898, instead of terminating, as the Lord Ordinary thought, in September 1897, it was obvious that the damages must be largely increased. It is not easy to see why the Lord Ordinary fixed the sum of £15,000 as being the appropriate figure, or why the First Division considered £12,000 as being the proper increase. Possibly accepting the £15,000 fixed by Lord Pearson after seeing the witnesses, as being reasonably sufficient to satisfy the damage sustained during the period in which he considered the injunction was in operation, the First Division thought £12,000 would about represent the addition which should be made for the period between September 1897 and February 1898. There is great scope for speculation and uncertainty as to the figures, but I see no reason why the decision of the First Division should be dissented from. In my opinion the judgment of the Lord Chancellor is correct.

Lord James.—My Lords, I concur in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Robertson.—My Lords, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Collins.—It seems to me that the question on this appeal resolves itself into one of fact upon which we are invited to differ, not only with the judge of first instance, who heard and saw the witnesses, but also with the Lord President and the First Division judges, who elaborately reviewed his decision. It would be very difficult for this House, upon an examination of the materials before them, to differ upon a question of fact unless it were made to appear that some wrong principle of law had been brought to bear on the facts. And the appellants have accordingly sought to point out one or more misconceptions on the part of their Lordships in dealing with the facts.

Now, it seems to me impossible to contend that the interdict of the 16th March 1897 was not wrongous, in that it put too rigorous a restraint upon the working of their mine by the appellants. In fact, the defenders hardly contended the contrary before us, in view of the consensus of opinion below upon this point. But they urged one main contention with respect to it, viz., that by reason of the independent obligation on the Company to safeguard the Crawley pipe, the interdict placed no larger limitation upon their working than that which already bound them in respect of the Crawley pipe. This is a question of fact, and lies at the bottom of the appeal, since there could be no claim for damages in respect of interdiction from doing that which they were not free to do if there had been no interdict. I am of opinion that this point has been completely and satisfactorily disposed of in the judgments of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President, and that accordingly the pursuers sustained not merely nominal but substantial damages by reason of the interdict.

The next point urged by the respondents in their case was that the interdict must be taken to have ceased to be effective after the 18th September 1899, when the Lord Ordinary repelled the interdict as to the shale, leaving that as to the limestone perpetual; and this was the view taken by the Lord Ordinary himself. The point turns upon a nice question of Scottish practice, on which the opinion of the Seven Judges was taken, and is elaborately dealt with by the Lord President in the First Division, holding that the interdict continued effective until the final disposal of the case in February 1898. The respondents abandoned this point at the hearing.

The appellants, therefore, it seems to me, have established their right to claim substantial damages, treating the interdict as continuing in operation down to the latter date. But have they succeeded in showing that, having so far made good the position accorded them by the Court below, they are entitled to still further damages? They have not, as it seems to me, succeeded in pointing out any reasons which would justify us in interfering with the conclusions of fact arrived at below on questions of mining practice and business management, nor, indeed, have we the materials before us which would enable us to review these findings were we otherwise competent to do so. But they do take one point which they contend shows that a wrong measure of damages was applied, and that in consequence the amount awarded was improperly reduced. For this point they found mainly on a passage in Lord Dunedin's judgment: "The defenders are not to be prejudiced by the fact that the times were bad and that the Company was not rich. Accordingly a claim upon total loss is, I think, inadmissible." It was contended that this implied that the defenders were entitled to measure the damages on the footing that it was the duty of the Company to do all that was reasonably possible to mitigate the loss, and that if, through lack of funds, they were unable to incur the necessary expense of such remedial measures, the defenders ought not to suffer for it. If this were the true construction to put upon the passage cited, I think there would be force in the observation, for, in my opinion, the wrongdoer must take his victim talem qualem, and if the position of the latter is aggravated because he is without the means of mitigating it, so much the worse for the wrongdoer, who has got to be answerable for the consequences flowing from his tortious act. On the other hand, the victim being in fact a poor man is not entitled to claim damages in respect of lost opportunities which he could not have utilised unless he had been rich. A company whose financial position was such that it could not have availed itself of the opportunity of placing its goods in substantial quantities on a rising market cannot claim damages on the footing that it might have done so. If the pecuniary disability were traceable to the wrongdoer the case would, of course, be different. But I think the words in their context do not imply more than I have stated, and I think this is made clearer by comparing a passage in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary which was probably in Lord Dunedin's mind in the passage referred to. The passage in Lord Pearson's judgment is on page 885 of the record, where he says: "The evidence leaves in considerable doubt whether they would have been able, if all had gone on uninterruptedly, to take advantage of the rise in prices and to hold their own with other companies." This seems to me a perfectly legitimate consideration. They cannot claim to be placed in a better position by reason of the wrong than they would have been in had it never been committed.

House of Lords.

Clippens Oil Co. Ltd. v. Edinburgh and District Water Trustees.

Lord Collins.

Another point in the judgment of Lord Dunedin is, I think, open to criticism, viz., that the pursuers might have reverted to the Broxburn seam, and cannot rely upon the contention that they were advised by their expert not to do so. I think the wrongdoer is not entitled to criticise the course honestly taken by the injured person on the advice of his experts, even though it should appear by the light of after events that another course might have saved loss. The loss he has to pay for is that which has actually followed under such circumstances upon his wrong. However, I feel that it is impossible, on the materials before us, to measure approximately what sum has been deducted in the calculation on this point from what otherwise might have been allowed, and I am not prepared to say that the sum awarded to the Company is not, on the whole, enough.

One other point ought to be noticed. The appellants pressed upon us the view that the Trustees had acted maliciously in procuring the interdict; that is to say, that their object had been, not so much to protect their pipes, as to force the appellants into bankruptcy. I agree with Lord Dunedin that there is evidence in support of this view, but I am at a loss to see what bearing it has on the actual facts of this case. It is not essential to the cause of action, which rests on the grant of the interdict on caution, and therefore I think it is not a case for exemplary or punitive, as distinguished from compensatory damages. Nor, as it seems to me, can it have any effect upon the measure of damages in the events that have happened. The defenders do not, as I understand them, dispute that if what Lord Dunedin described as "total loss," or what Mr Clyde called "bleeding to death," were legally traceable to the wrong done by the defenders, they would be liable to pay damages measured by that standard, and the introduction of malice could not possibly entitle them to more. In the result I agree with the conclusions of the First Division, and am of opinion that the appeal and the cross appeal must be dismissed.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The facts of the case appear from the previous report. The pursuer (Mrs Burgh-Smeaton) reclaimed, and argued: In the marriage contract there was no express destination of the fee to the children, and no words from which a grant of fee could be inferred by implication. Accordingly, the radical right of fee remained in the truster, Mrs Burgh-Smeaton, and she was entitled to declarator to that effect and to reconveyance of the subjects (Higginbotham's Trs., 1886, 13 R. 1016; Scott's Trs., 1902, 10 S.L.T. 122; Ralph, 1879, 11 Ch. D. 873).

Argued for the Respondents: There was an implied grant of fee in the marriage contract in favour of the issue of the marriage in the event of their surviving their parents. Accordingly Mrs Burgh-Smeaton had not an unqualified right in the fee of the subjects, and was not entitled to have them reconveyed to her (Douglas, 1843, 6 D. 318; Campbell, 1852, 15 D. 173; Dolphin's Trs., 1888, 15 R. 733; Bate's Trs., 1906, 8 F. 861).

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against in so far as it assoilzied the defenders from the first conclusion of the action, and in lieu thereof dismissed the action in so far as the said first conclusion was concerned; and with this variation, adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Lord Low.—I agree substantially with the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, and the reasons upon which he proceeds.

It is not unimportant to remember that the instrument under construction is an antenuptial marriage contract which purports not only to regulate the rights of the parties in regard to their respective estates, but to make provision for the children of the marriage should there any be; and I do not think that anyone could read the contract without coming to the conclusion that the intention of the parties—that to which they had agreed—was that the children of the marriage should have a right to the estate, heritable and moveable, of the wife, at all events if they survived both their parents, or if they survived their mother and the second marriage of their father, which, so far as the right of the children was concerned, was made equivalent to his death. Unfortunately, however, the conveyancer who prepared the contract omitted to insert any express gift of the wife's estate to the children, and the question is whether the implication from the language actually used is sufficiently plain to supply the place of, and be equivalent to, an express gift, to the extent, at least, of disentitling the pursuer to have it declared now that she has the sole right and beneficial interest in the fee of the estate of Coul, and is entitled to dispose thereof?

I am of opinion that that question falls to be answered in the affirmative, and I shall shortly state the reasons which have led me to that conclusion.

The third and fourth purposes of the trusts upon which the wife conveyed her estate to trustees provided for the case of the dissolution of the marriage by the death of the husband. The third purpose provided that upon that event, "if there be issue of the marriage or children of predeceasing issue alive," the trustees should continue to hold the estate and pay the income to the wife during her lifetime, "or until the failure of the issue of the marriage, should they all predecease her"; and by the fourth purpose it was provided that in the same event (the predecease of the husband) the trustees should, "if there be no issue of the marriage, or on the failure of such issue by predeceasing the wife, re-convey the whole heritable estate" to the wife and a certain series of heirs, and hand over to her the moveable estate.

Now the contracting parties must have had some purpose in view in agreeing that the extent and character of the right of the wife to her own estate after the death of her husband should depend on whether there were or were not surviving children of the marriage. They agreed that if and so long as such children existed the wife should have only a liferent of her estate; and they agreed that in the event, and only in the event, of there being no issue, or of the issue failing during the wife's lifetime, the trustees should be directed to re-convey the estate to the wife. It seems to me that the Lord Ordinary is right in saying that there was no conceivable object in so limiting the rights of the wife unless the parties intended and had agreed that if the wife was survived by issue her estate should pass to them at her death.

These are the trust purposes in the event of the predecease of the husband, and those applicable to the event of the predecease of the wife are to the following effect:—If issue of the marriage survives the wife, the husband is to have a liferent of the whole estate, under burden of the maintenance and education of such issue, until such issue shall fail or until he marries again; if there is no issue, or if the issue fails during the husband's life, his right is restricted to an annuity of £200, and the trustees are directed to hand over the moveable estate to the wife's heirs in mobilibus, exclusive of any right on the husband's part, and to convey the heritable estate, under burden of the husband's annuity, to such persons as the wife may direct by settlement or other writing; and failing such direction, to the person entitled to succeed under the destination in a certain disposition; finally, in the event of the husband marrying again his right to the annuity is to cease, and in that event, or in the event of his death, the trustees are directed to hand over the moveable estate to the wife's heirs in mobilibus, exclusive of the husband's rights, and "failing issue of the marriage or children of predeceasing issue," to convey the heritable estate as directed in the event of failure of issue.

The most important of these purposes is the last, which provides for the disposal of the wife's estate upon the second marriage or death of the husband survived by children. In either of these events the moveable estate is to be handed over to the wife's heirs in mobilibus; and, of course, children who had survived her, and who also survived the husband, would be among the heirs in mobilibus of the former. Whether, however, they would be entitled to the whole moveable estate might depend upon whether other children had predeceased leaving issue, and upon the question whether the expression "heirs in mobilibus," as used in the contract, means the persons answering to that description at the wife's death or at the husband's death or second marriage.

In regard to the heritable estate the nominee of the wife, or the heir under the destination referred to, is only given right "failing issue of the marriage, or children of predeceasing issue," and would therefore not be entitled to a conveyance of the estate if issue existed at the death or second marriage of the husband. Here, again, I can imagine no reason for making the right of the wife's nominee, or of the heir under the old destination, depend upon whether or not there were surviving children of the marriage, unless it was that the parties intended, and had agreed, that if there were surviving children they should have right to the estate. What precisely are the nature of the rights may be a question; but the implication from the whole trust purposes read together, that surviving children should have a right to the heritable estate which would be preferable to that of the wife's nominee or the heir under the destination, seems to me to be sufficiently plain to make it impossible to give the pursuer the declarator which she seeks. I am inclined to think, however, that it would be premature to do more than to hold that in existing circumstances the pursuer is not entitled to decree, because a change of circumstances—as, for example, the predecease of all the children without issue—might entirely alter her position and rights. It therefore seems to me that instead of assoilzieing from the first conclusion of the summons, it would be safer simply to dismiss it. I think, however, that the Lord Ordinary was right to assoilzie from the first alternative of the second conclusion and from the third conclusion, because under them it is sought to have the judicial factor ordained "forthwith" to denude of the estate in the pursuer's favour.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I entirely agree with Lord Low and in substance with the Lord Ordinary. I only desire to add two things. First, it is a peculiarity of this case that the pursuer, Mrs Burgh-Smeaton, seeks, by her first conclusion, to have it declared that she has the sole right of fee in the estate of Coul (which she conveyed to her marriage-contract trustees for the purposes therein set forth) at a time when not only her husband survives and has not married again, but her three children survive, and when the only thing that has occurred to dissolve the marriage has been her divorce for adultery. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this kind of dissolution of the marriage is not equivalent to its dissolution by the death of the offending spouse, and, in particular, that the rights of third parties and, inter alios, of the issue of the marriage, are not affected thereby. It is true that the pursuer does not now ask for declarator of her right to sell and dispose of her beneficial interest in the fee. But the whole conception of the first conclusion being, at all events, premature, I agree that the best way to deal with it is to dismiss it, and to assoilzie from the first alternative of the second conclusion and from the third conclusion, both of which ask that the judicial factor should "forthwith" denude of the heritage. The second thing which I would add is that in my view the cases cited are all too special to have any application.

2nd Div. Burgh-Smeaton v. Whitson and Others.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with your Lordships. I am satisfied that the conveyance by the wife tied up the estate while issue should be alive, and that, given children alive, she could only enjoy a liferent, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the purpose evidently was to secure the fee to the children, should they or any of them survive the spouses, or should predeceasing children leave descendants. This, I agree with Lord Low, applied to both classes of estate.

I also agree that the judgment should not go beyond what has been proposed by Lord Low at this stage in the history of this trust.

The result will be to recal the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and to substitute dismissal for absolvitor, and, quoad ultra, to adhere.—6th June 1907.

IV. Expenses — Expenses Occasioned by Mental Incapacity of Party to be Borne by His Estate.

The facts of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary held (1) that the inscribed stock registered in joint names of Mrs Buckle and her son truly belonged to the former, and was carried by her universal settlement; (2) that Cuthbert Buckle, the son, was entitled to legitim out of his mother's estate. He further held, upon a motion to adjourn the proof to take the evidence of Cuthbert Buckle, who had been for eleven years in an asylum, that upon medical evidence as to his state of mind, which showed that in addition to specific delusion he suffered also from impaired intellect, he was unsuitable as a witness upon questions involving legal deductions. In the whole circumstances he held that Cuthbert Buckle's estate must bear the whole expenses occasioned by his mental incapacity, and that Mrs Buckle's trustees having acted unreasonably as regards the giving of information to the pursuers, should bear the expense occasioned by their appearance as defenders.

Lord Johnstone.—The late John Buckle and Mrs Dorothea Blackwell or Buckle were married in 1834. They entered into an antenuptial marriage contract, whereby Mr Buckle made certain provisions for his wife and children, and which contained a clause declaring the provisions for Miss Blackwell to be in full of all claims competent to her or her next of kin according as she survived or predeceased Mr Buckle; and the provisions in favour of children "to be in full satisfaction to him, her, or them, of all bairns' part of gear, legitim, portion natural, executry, and everything else they can claim through the decease of the said John Buckle their father, leaving any further provision to his good will alone."

The settlement was silent as regards any estate of Miss Blackwell.

In 1844 Mr Buckle executed his trust disposition and settlement. As Mr Buckle was twice married, Miss Blackwell being his second wife, and had families by both marriages, his settlement was somewhat complicated. But shortly put, it provided for the children of the first marriage, by apportioning among them a certain settled fund, and for his second wife and family, by conveying his general estate, so far as it did not fall under that settlement, to trustees for his second wife Mrs Dorothea Blackwell or

Buckle in liferent, and his children by his marriage with her in fee. And there followed this clause: "Which provisions in favour of my said spouse I hereby declare to be in full satisfaction to her of all terce of lands half or third of moveables and every other claim which she has jure relictæ or otherwise could have in consequence of my predeceasing her, or which her nearest in kin might have against me if I should happen to survive her: And which provisions in favour of my said children shall be in full satisfaction to them of all legitim, executry and every other thing which they might claim in consequence of the decease either of me or my said spouse."

I quote this clause in full, because one of the main questions in the case depends upon its effect.

Mr Buckle died in 1863, leaving Mrs Dorothea Blackwell or Buckle and several children surviving him. Mrs Buckle survived till 25th October 1905. She was predeceased by all her children except one, Cuthbert Buckle, who at the time of her death was an inmate of Mavisbank Lunatic Asylum. Mr Cuthbert Buckle's history was this: Delicate in youth, he had gone to Australia in early life, had made some little money there in sheep-farming, and had returned to this country about twenty years before his mother's death. Having a reasonable competency, he took up his abode with his mother at 12 Duncan Street, Edinburgh, where he lived without further occupation till 1895. He then manifested symptoms of mental aberration, which required that he should be confined to an asylum, towards the end of that year, and he has continued an inmate of Mavisbank accordingly. He is now over seventy years of age. At the time of his confinement Mr Cuthbert Buckle had estate of his own amounting to about £9000, which had increased to about £10,000 before his mother's death. By her death he came in for about £7000 more, which had been held in settlement, under his father and his mother's marriage contract and his father's will, during her life. He was maintained in the asylum from the income of his own funds, Mr William John Kirk, W.S., having been since 1901 his curator bonis.

Mrs Buckle, who as above mentioned survived till 1905, executed a trust disposition and settlement on 4th September 1902, by which she conveyed to trustees "my whole estate both heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever description and wherever situated, belonging to me or which shall belong to me at the time of my death, or over which I have now or may at the time of my death have the power of disposal."

The trust purposes were payment of a number of small legacies, personal and charitable, and division of the residue equally between Miss Bella Buckle, Wimbledon, and Evelyn Buckle or Greenfield, London, described as "grandnieces of my late husband"; but really I believe granddaughters by his first marriage, and therefore step-grandchildren of Mrs Buckle. No mention was made of her son Cuthbert Buckle.

The pursuers of the action are the residuary legatees Miss Buckle and Mrs Greenfield, and the defenders are Mr Cuthbert Buckle's curator bonis and the testamentary trustees of Mrs Buckle.

The first question which arises has reference to an item of £900 Cape of Good Hope 4 per cent. Consolidated Inscribed Stock, which stood at Mrs Buckle's death registered in the joint names of Mrs Buckle and her son Mr Cuthbert Buckle in the books of the London and Westminster Bank, Ltd., Lothbury, London, as agents for the Colony. It is claimed by the pursuers as being truly part of Mrs Buckle's estate, notwithstanding the terms of the registration, and it is claimed by the defender Mr Kirk, as Mr Cuthbert Buckle's curator, as belonging to Mr Cuthbert Buckle on his survivance of his mother by virtue of the destination involved or implied in the registration, to the extent of one-half, if the terms of the registered title are to be interpreted by Scots law, and of the whole, if by English law.

The circumstances of the investment, so far as they can now be ascertained, are these. Mrs Buckle had in 1894 a sum of rather over £1000, the produce, it is believed, of her savings, to invest. Her son Mr Cuthbert Buckle was in London in June 1894, on a visit to Mr Greenfield and his wife, who is one of the residuary legatees and pursuers. Mr Greenfield is a stockbroker in London. One evening after dinner Mr Buckle mentioned that his mother had this money to invest, and some conversation ensued regarding the class of investment to be selected, in course of which Mr Greenfield suggested the registration of the stock to be purchased in the joint names of Mrs Buckle and her son. Mr Greenfield says that he naturally concluded that Mr Cuthbert Buckle, as his mother's only surviving child, would succeed to her means, and that he made this suggestion with a view to saving trouble and expense at her death, which he assumed in all human probability would occur before that of her son. Mr Buckle undertook to write him when he got home. This he did on 26th June 1894, and a short correspondence passed, ending on 7th July. Mr Buckle's letters are extant, those of Mr Greenfield or his firm are not, and their letter books have been destroyed. The result of this correspondence was the purchase of £900 of the Cape of Good Hope Inscribed Stock for £1020, its payment entirely out of Mrs Buckle's monies, and its registration in the books of the London and Westminster Bank as agents for the Colony, in the joint names of Mrs Buckle and her son Mr Cuthbert Buckle. Mr Greenfield had no communication with Mrs Buckle. She wrote nothing with reference to the matter. The only thing under her hand is the signature, along with her son, of a mandate to the London and Westminster Bank to pay the dividends on the stock to the Bank of Scotland, to whom instructions to credit them to Mrs Buckle's account must have been given, as they were so credited from the date of the investment onwards. From this mandate it must be taken that Mrs Buckle knew that the investment stood in the joint names of herself and her son. But of what explanations were given to her by her son there is no proof whatever. At the close of the rest of the evidence for the curator bonis, I was asked to adjourn the proof that Mr Cuthbert Buckle might be examined. I heard Dr Joseph Bell, who had known him throughout the whole period of his malady and longer, Dr Batty Tuke, who had had him under his charge for about a year, and Dr Clouston, who had seen him recently, and the conclusion that I came to was that Mr Cuthbert Buckle was not in a condition to justify his being examined as a witness in the cause, in respect that it appears that he now suffers not merely from a specific delusion, but from general impairment of intellect, and because it now very clearly appears that Mr Buckle's evidence is wanted, not on simple matters of fact, but on communications involving resulting legal deductions, and could not be taken without a close cross-examination. Accordingly I refused the motion to examine Mr Buckle, and the case must be decided on such information as it has been possible to adduce without him.

Outer House. Lord Johnston.

Buckle and Another v. Kirk (Buckle's Curator) and Others.

All that is clearly known is that the investment in question was made with Mrs Buckle's money, that it was in her knowledge made in the joint names of herself and her son, and that she drew the income of it during her life.

It is also known that the suggestion to put the investment in joint names did not emanate from Mrs Buckle herself. But emanating as it did from Mr Greenfield, and having been made on a definite hypothesis that Mr Cuthbert Buckle would in natural course be his mother's heir, and with the definite object of saving, as was thought, trouble and expense at his mother's death, it is not known how far Mr Cuthbert Buckle, or even Mr Greenfield, knew the legal result of such registration in joint names, and still less how far this was explained to Mrs Buckle.

The only other surrounding circumstances which it is necessary to note are that Mr Buckle was, compared with his mother, comfortably off at the date when the investment was made, and would, independently of her, receive at her death a considerable accession to his fortune, and that within a year of the transaction he had become an inmate of Mavisbank Lunatic Asylum, where he continued till his mother's death ten years after.

It was maintained by the curator that the case was concluded by the authority of Connell's Trs., 1886, 13 R. 1175. But while I must consider that authority, its application is not so easy or simple as may at first sight appear. There is no doubt that what I may call a destination has, on the analogy of feudal conveyancing, received effect in the case of a proper personal bond, as, for instance, a bond of the Dundee Harbour Trust, Walker's Trs., 1878, 5 R. 965, and that the same principle was extended to the indefinite sort of obligation undertaken in connection with, for instance, the Greenock Harbour Funded Debt, and also to shares in railway companies and in registered joint stock companies in the case of Connell's Trs., supra. But it would be a still further step to extend the principle to stock the sole title to which is the registration in the books of the agents of a Colonial Government. For in cases of these inscribed stocks no certificate is issued, at any rate by the London and Westminster Bank. As, however, the true title in the case of stocks of a company is not the stock certificate, but the company's register, I think that it would be difficult on this score alone to draw a distinction between Connell's Trs. case and the present. There is, however, another, and a serious, difficulty experienced in applying the authorities to the case in question, viz., that in the case of an inscribed stock it is impossible to conceive of any equivalent for delivery to the destinee of the writ of title as his own proper writ.

As I understand the decision in Connell's Trs. case, a personal bond, registration of shares and the accompanying certificate, and a fortiori inscription of stock without a certificate, cannot be regarded as documents of a testamentary nature, for one reason, at least conclusive, that a testament must bear the signature of the testator. Yet judge after judge in the various decisions on the subject speaks of them as having "testamentary" effect. In truth I think that they must be regarded as capable of being one of two things, as regards the person in the destination from whom the fund is not derived, viz., either first a mandate or trust for the purpose of convenient administration; or, second, a title capable from its nature of giving an ultimate beneficial right, but requiring something of the nature of delivery to give it that effect, remaining therefore under the control of the person who takes the title by way of such destination, until the delivery or equivalent of delivery is complete. It is clear, therefore, that the terms of the destination or title are not in themselves conclusive—that the rights therefrom arising are a question of circumstances varying in each case, and that there may be cases in which the mere death of the person who has taken the destination and retained the control, leaving the destination standing, is a sufficient equivalent of delivery to raise the inchoate right of the destinee into an absolute right. I accept what is said by Lord M'Laren, with the concurrence of Lord Kinnear, in the case of Paterson's Factor, 1899, 24 R. 499, both as to whether such destinations ought to have received this effect, and as to the question being foreclosed to me.

But if I have read the decision in Connell's Trs. aright, the first question is, quo animo the destination was taken, and indeed the question of intention is the first thing to which Lord Adam applies himself in the leading opinion in that case. Now here the only evidence available leads to the conclusion that the destination was taken for the purpose of convenient administration, in the event of the natural supposition that Mr Cuthbert Buckle would be his mother's heir should be fulfilled. It may be that more was intended, but this is not known, and I do not think that there is enough from which safely to infer it. The nature of the investment differs from that of the deposit of money in a bank in joint names, and yet the circumstances of the investment really bring it into the category which is prima facie implied in such deposit.

At the same time the nature of the investment and title made it possible that what began as a mandate or trust might be developed into a beneficial destination. But be it so, the circumstances of the present case make it exceptionally necessary to find satisfactory evidence of the equivalent of delivery as the destinee's proper deed, and the abandonment of control by the party taking the destination in joint names. Every circumstance in addition to the peculiar form of the title is against this. From the day the mandate to pay interest was executed Mr Cuthbert Buckle had nothing to do with the stock. Within a year he was confined as a lunatic, and continued so during the eleven years that his mother survived the investment. Moreover, there was no call on his mother to do anything for his support, as he had ample means in possession and more in prospect.

Hence, apart from the consideration of her will, I should have concluded that there was nothing in this case to justify my giving to the inscription in joint names of this stock the effect of a mortis causa disposition, either in whole or in part, to the surviving son unrevoked at the mother's death.

But when I come to regard the settlement of Mrs Buckle, the circumstances in which it was made, and its universality, covering as it does everything over which she had power of disposal, I am satisfied that any apparent right which Mr Cuthbert Buckle might have had, had his mother died intestate, was abrogated. I am therefore relieved of the question whether the alleged destination is to be construed by Scottish or English law. But it is one of two considerations creating extreme difficulty in sustaining the curator's contention that the result of the alleged destination might depend upon whether it is to be construed by Scots or English law.

There remains the question whether Mr Cuthbert Buckle is entitled to legitim out of his mother's estate. It is admitted that this would now be so under the Act of 1881 but for the clause above quoted in the settlement of his father. I do not, however, think that this clause deprives him of his right. The case bears to be distinguished from that of Dunbar Dunbar, 1905, 7 F. (H.L.) 92. There the clause of satisfaction occurred in a marriage contract. The mother being possessed of means made provision for children, which she declared to be in full satisfaction of all bairns' part of gear, executry, and everything else to which they could succeed by or through her decease on any ground whatever. The marriage was in 1848, when children had no rights of legitim in their mother's estate, though they had a right to a share of the goods in communion on her predeceasing their father. The Court, however, held the clause wide enough to cover rights in their mother's estate emerging through legislation supervening before the dissolution of the marriage and Mrs Dunbar's death. But the present clause occurs, not in a contract, not in the mother's settlement, but in the father's settlement, who wrote in 1844 and died in 1863, eighteen years before the passing of the 1881 Act.

I think, first, that Mr Buckle's clause, when read in connection with its context, is intended to apply to any claims against him and his estate which should arise at or prior to his own death.

Second, that even if it could be extended further it must be read as applying to things as they stood fixed at the date of his death, and cannot be read to cover claims which could not have had any existence at the date of his death, and only emerged forty-two years after his death, owing to legislation supervening eighteen years after his death. But

Third, that no jus quæsitum is conferred on Mrs Buckle's representatives by the clause. If it had the intention, it has not the effect, of putting Mr Cuthbert Buckle to his election between provisions under his father's settlement and legitim out of his mother's estate. The case is the obverse of Kerr v. Thomson's Trs., 1865, 4 Macph. 179.

I shall therefore grant decree in terms of the first alternative of the first conclusion of the Summons, and assoilzie the defenders from the second declaratory conclusion of the Summons.

I have considered the contentions of the parties on the subject of expenses. I think that Mr Cuthbert Buckle's estate must bear the expenses occasioned by the misfortune of his mental condition, and in these I include not merely the costs incurred in determining whether he was in a fit state to be examined as a witness, but the costs of the proof generally. Quoad ultra, as in a case of divided success, I think that the curator and the residuary legatees of Mrs Buckle should each bear their own expenses.

Buckle and Another v. Kirk (Buckle's Curator) and Others.

There is a separate question as to the costs of Mrs Buckle's trustees. I have read a considerable portion of the correspondence which preceded the action, and I think that the attitude of the trustees throughout has not been reasonable, and has compelled the residuary legatees to take the action which they ultimately did. It was, I think, most unfortunate that the trustees were in this matter advised and represented by a firm of which Mr Buckle's curator was a partner, though he appears in these judicial proceedings by a separate agent. I think, therefore, that these trustees should be made liable to the pursuers in any expenses incurred by their appearance, and should not be allowed to charge their own expenses against the estate, in the residue of which the pursuers are alone interested.—5*th June* 1907.

46. Goldberg v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company.

Reparation — Negligence — Railway—Invitation to Alight—Train Stopping at Station and Moving On Again—Injury to Passenger Preparing to Leave the Train.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

In this action, the pursuer, Hyman Goldberg, sued the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for damages for personal injuries which he alleged he had sustained while a passenger in one of their trains. The averments on which the claim was based were as follows:—

Cond. 2. . . . . The pursuer . . . . went from Yarmouth to London and travelled from there to Glasgow by the express from St Prancas, due to arrive in Glasgow on the morning of 7th of November 1906.

Cond. 3. The pursuer travelled in a third-class compartment, with his back to the engine, and he had a travelling bag in the rack overhead. When the said train came into St Enoch Station at the arrival platform, it stopped, and the pursuer and another traveller, who was in the same compartment, rose from their seats to leave the train. While the pursuer was in the act of taking down his said travelling bag from the rack, the train, without any warning having been given, gave a sudden and violent jerk. In consequence of this unexpected and violent movement of the train, the said travelling bag fell from pursuer's hand on the seat, and the pursuer was thrown down on the floor of the compartment, sustaining the injuries after mentioned.

Cond. 4. The pursuer was rendered unconscious by said fall, and was taken home. A doctor was called in, and on his advice the pursuer was removed to the Royal Infirmary, Glasgow, when it was found that his right leg was broken at the thigh. . . . He is still unable to attend to business, and in consequence of this inability, which is owing to said accident, he has sustained serious business losses. . . .

Cond. 5. The pursuer's said injuries were caused by the fault of the defenders, or of their servants in charge of said train, for whom defenders are responsible. The driver of the engine attached to said train was in fault in starting it or otherwise causing it to move suddenly and unexpectedly, and without any warning having been given, after the train had come to a stop at the arrival platform, and thereby causing the carriages to jerk violently at the moment when the passengers were in the act of leaving or were preparing to leave the said carriages. In consequence of this culpable and negligent act the pursuer was injured as before mentioned.

The Pursuer pleaded—

"The pursuer having been injured through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to reparation."

The Defenders pleaded—

"The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusion of the Summons, the action should be dismissed."

The Lord Ordinary approved an issue for the trial of the cause.

The defenders reclaimed.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and dismissed the action, with expenses.

Lord M'Laren.—This is a claim by a passenger in a train of the defendant Company for injuries said to be sustained while he was travelling in one of the Company's carriages. The circumstances under which the injury was sustained are thus set forth. [His lordship read Cond. 3 as quoted above.] It is then stated that the pursuer was rendered unconscious by his fall, and that on being removed to the Glasgow Royal Infirmary it was found that the pursuer's leg was broken. The averment of fault is thus stated. [His lordship read Cond. 5 as quoted above.]

Now it is matter of common and familiar experience that if a railway traveller rises from his seat when the train stops at a station, whether for the purpose of changing his seat or for getting hold of any of the small articles which he is allowed to take into the carriage with him, he is liable to be incommoded by the unexpected starting of the train, or it may be by a movement of the train for some other purpose, such as the shifting of the place of the train in the station, the detachment of a carriage, or the putting on of additional carriages. Fortunately for the travelling public, these unexpected movements do not in general result in injury to any one. They may be said to be ordinary incidents of railway travelling, and I suppose that people who rise from their seats are to some extent on their guard against a sudden starting of the train by which the passenger might be thrown off his balance.

I have not been able to find anything in the pursuer's narrative which distinguishes the occurrence he describes from the ordinary case of a traveller who is jostled or shaken by the starting of the train, except the serious nature of the consequent injury which he sets forth. It is not said that there was an invitation to alight, and on the pursuer's statement he was not in the act of alighting; he had only risen from his seat in order to take his travelling-bag from the rack, as he might have done at any other place in the course of the journey.

In the ordinary case of an accident resulting from a supposed invitation to alight, the passenger is led to believe that the train has come to rest; and if it is started when he is in the act of alighting, he is liable to be thrown down and injured by the relative movement of train and platform for which he is not prepared. But a prudent passenger is supposed to be able to take care of himself when within the carriage in which he is travelling, and if he is unable to do so, I can see no other solution of the difficulty except that he may stay at home, because if a train is stopped whether in transit or at the arrival terminus it must sometimes be necessary that it should be started again, and then all the passengers are more or less exposed to be jostled or shaken by the start and the reaction of the carriages against the springs by which they are coupled together.

In these circumstances I have looked carefully into the pursuer's averment of fault to discover, if possible, what is the wrong of which he complains. But the only fault alleged is that the engine-driver was in fault in starting the train without any warning having been given after the train had come to a stop at the arrival platform. I do not think that the action of the engine-driver thus described was necessarily, or even probably, faulty. It is quite consistent with the pursuer's statement that the train had stopped short of the place where it was intended that passengers should alight, and that a further movement of the train was necessary to bring it to its proper position alongside of the platform. The pursuer's statement does not negative that supposition, and therefore it is quite consistent with the case as stated, that the engine-driver in starting the train was only performing his accustomed duty of bringing the train up to its place of discharge.

It is, no doubt, a very great misfortune to the pursuer that he should sustain this serious injury, but I cannot find in the record any averments of fact leading to the conclusion that the railway company had failed in its obligation to use reasonable care and skill in carrying the pursuer to his destination.

Goldberg v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

Lord Kinnear.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. I am reluctant to criticise a record which has been made up in the Sheriff Court, or even in this Court, in actions of this kind too rigorously, if the averments disclose a substantial ground of action although the averments may not be very skilfully framed. But there is nothing to suggest that the deficiencies of the present record are due to any want of skill on the part of the framer, or to anything but the unsubstantial character of the case itself. The averment of what actually happened seems to me to come to nothing more than this—that the train stopped and went on again. There is no averment that anything was said or done by officers of the Company to induce the pursuer to believe that he was in safety to alight, or that he did, in fact, believe it. All that is said is that when the train stopped the pursuer stood up to take his bag off the rack. There is nothing in that to shew that he had any reason to suppose that the train had come to a final stoppage, or that he had even adverted to the contingency of its being set in motion. He may, or may not, have been prudent in this action, but for all that appears from his statement the moving of the train may have been perfectly right, and may also have been just such an event as a prudent passenger taking care for his own safety would have anticipated. I therefore agree that there is no issuable matter in this record.

Lord Pearson.—I think it important to keep in view that there is no question here as to the stoppage of a train at a platform, regarded as an invitation to alight. The case has to do with a passenger still within his compartment, and engaged in taking down his hand-luggage from the rack. It is said that he was justified in assuming without anything more, that when the train stopped it had stopped finally. I observe that there is no specific averment as to duty on the part of the driver; but the averment of fault on the part of the defenders is that the driver was culpably negligent in starting the train suddenly and unexpectedly after it had stopped at the terminal platform. I cannot hold that in the circumstances averred that is a sufficient averment of fault to infer liability against the defenders.—13*th June* 1907.

REVENUE — INCOME TAX — DEDUCTIONS—STEAMSHIP COMPANY — LOSS OF SHIP— SHIP PARTLY INSURED—BALANCE OF LOSS RECOUPED FROM COMPANY'S INSURANCE FUND—PAYMENTS TO INSURANCE FUND NOT DEDUCTIBLE—LOSS OF CAPITAL—BALANCE OF LOSS HELD NOT DEDUCTIBLE IN MAKING RETURN—INCOME TAX ACT 1842 (5 & 6 VICT. CAP. 35), SECT. 100, SCHEDULE D, FIRST CASE, RULES 1, 3, SECT. 159.

Case.

This was a case under the Taxes Management Act 1880, between the Surveyor of Taxes, Glasgow, and the Western Steamship Co. Ltd., on appeal from the Commissioners, who had allowed a deduction of £2465, 4s. 1d. claimed by the Company.

The case stated :—

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and for executing the Acts relating to the Inhabited House Duties for the City of Glasgow, held at Glasgow on the 30th day of October 1905 :

The Western Steamship Company, Limited (hereinafter referred to as "the Company"), appealed, under the 133rd section of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, as amended by the 6th section of the Act 28 and 29 Vict. c. 30, against an assessment for the year ended 5th April 1905 on the sum of £13,637 (duty £681, 17s.), made upon it under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts, in respect of the profits of the business carried on by it, after allowing a deduction of £1860 for the wear and tear of machinery and plant, and craved to have it restricted to £8400, and having paid a sum of £461, 2s. to account of the duty, claimed repayment of £41, 2s.

The assessment was made under the Acts 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, Schedule D, First Case ; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, Schedule D ; 28 and 29 Vict. c. 30, s. 6 ; and 4 Edw. 7, c. 7, s. 7.

The following facts were admitted or proved :—

1. The Company was incorporated on 28th January 1898 under the Companies Acts, as a company limited by shares, and its registered office is situated at No. 24 Saint Vincent Place, Glasgow. The capital of the Company is £100,000, divided into 20,000 shares of £5 each.

2. The objects of the Company, as set forth in the third article of its memorandum of association, are, inter alia, as follows :—

"(a) To carry on the business of shipowners in all its branches."

. . . . . .

"(c) To purchase, charter, hire, or otherwise acquire, build, equip, and maintain steam or other ships, and other vessels of every description, or shares in the same ; and to work, let out to hire, or otherwise employ, sell, exchange, dispose of, or deal with the same."

. . . . . .

"(f) To insure, if the Company see fit, and for such sums as it deems proper, the ships, vessels, freights, goods, and property of the Company, or in which the Company is interested with other companies or persons, or by joining any association for mutual insurance, or otherwise."

3. The Company's articles of association provide, inter alia,—

"54. The managers shall carry on the business of the Company, and shall have and may exercise all such powers, and do all such acts and things as are not hereby, or by statute, expressly directed or required to be exercised or done by the Company in general meeting."

. . . . . .

"56. The Company shall, at the first statutory meeting, and at every annual meeting thereafter, appoint a committee of three members of the Company with whom the managers shall consult regarding the purchase and sale of steamers, the financing of the Company, the stating of accounts for general meeting after same have been examined by auditors, and any other matters the managers may see fit. The managers shall not conclude a sale or purchase of a steamer or steamers without the consent of the committee, or of a meeting convened for the purpose."

. . . . . .

"62. The managers shall resolve, after consultation with the committee, what portion of the profits, after payment of interest and transfer to the insurance and reserve or other funds of such sums as they consider expedient in respect of depreciation or otherwise, is available for division as dividend, and shall declare the same."

. . . . . .

"65. The amount from time to time at the credit of any insurance and reserve fund may be applied by the managers as they may think expedient for the purposes of the Company, including, among other purposes, to pay any claims or losses arising on risks undertaken by the Company ; to improve, alter, repair, or renew the ships or property of the Company ; to meet contingencies, redeem debentures, or equalise dividends ; or they may pay for new steamers or old ones wholly or partially, from the said fund."

4. The Company makes up its accounts annually on 31st December.

5. The profits of the Company for the year of assessment, estimated in accordance with the provisions of the 133rd section of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, as amended by the 6th section of 28 and 29 Vict. c. 30, on the average of the three years ending the 31st December 1904, after allowing a deduction of £1860 for wear and tear as aforesaid, but disallowing the deduction of £2465, 4s. 1d. (referred to under article 14 hereof) claimed by the Company, were £9222.

6. The Company owned two steamships, the prime cost of which was £84,919. The prime cost of one was £46,510, and the prime cost of the other, named "Kenmore," was £38,409. The written-down value of both steamships on 31st December 1903, as entered in the balance sheet of the Company, was £45,400. The proportion of the said written-down value effeiring to the "Kenmore" was £21,000.

7. The "Kenmore" was bought by the Company in the year 1898. It was wrecked on 11th January 1904, and became a total loss. Its market value immediately before being wrecked was £37,000.

8. The company claimed and was allowed for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, by way of deduction from the profits of each year, a sum for the diminished value of the "Kenmore" by reason of wear and tear. The total sum so allowed from 1898 to 11th January 1904 was £9229.

9. The value at which the "Kenmore" stood in the Income Tax books on 11th January 1904 was £29,180, being the difference between the prime cost (£38,409) and the total amount (£9229) of the sums allowed for wear and tear.

10. The "Kenmore" was insured with underwriters to the amount of £34,500 on a valuation in the policies of £37,000. The Company, in accordance with a common practice of shipowners, took upon itself a risk of loss to the amount of £2500, and claims that to that extent it insured itself and ran a risk of loss on trading account.

11. The amount actually paid by the Company to underwriters for insurance premiums was allowed as a deduction from the profits of each year in arriving at the amount of the assessable profits of the year.

12. The Company, in accordance with its practice, transferred from its revenue account to its insurance fund a sum equivalent to the amount of premium that would have been payable to an underwriter on a risk of £2500, the amount of the risk undertaken by the Company itself. No deduction from profits in calculating income tax was allowed for the sum so transferred. The sums so transferred, and on which the Company paid income tax, amounted in all to £1557, 5s. 2d.

The proportion of said sum of £1557, 5s. 2d. effeiring to the "Kenmore" was £252, 17s. 8d.

13. The Company recovered from the outside underwriters the full amount of £34,500. The commission paid by it on that amount to the insurance broker was £305.

14. In arriving at the amount of the assessable profits for the year ending 31st December 1904, the Company claimed to deduct from its revenue for that year the sum of £2465, 4s. 1d., being the amount of the risk of £2500 undertaken by itself, less £34, 15s. 11d. received from the Salvage Association as the proportion of the proceeds of the sale of the wrecked "Kenmore" effeiring to the risk of £2500. The Company transferred the said sum of £2465, 4s. 1d. from its insurance fund to its capital account.

Argued for Appellant: There was no authority in the Income Tax Acts for allowing the deduction claimed. It was a loss of capital, and that could not be deducted (Income Tax Act 1842; Smith v. Westinghouse Brake Co., 1888, 2 Tax Cas. 357; Granite Supply Association Ltd. v. Kitton, 1905, 8 F. 55, 5 Tax Cas. 168; Alianza Co. Ltd. v. Bell [1906], A.C. 18. The amount was not a disbursement by the Company in earning its profits, but was transferred from revenue account and really capital. It was not connected with a contract of insurance, and, if it was, it was not lost and therefore not deductible. The Act did not say what deductions were allowable, but prohibited certain deductions. As to the meaning of "loss not connected with or arising out of" in Rule 3 of First Case, Schedule D, counsel referred to Brown v. Watt, 1886, 23 S.L.R. 403, 2 Tax Cas. 143.

Argued for Respondents: The deduction claimed should be allowed, as it was necessary to earn freight (Moore v. Stewarts & Lloyds Ltd., 1906, 8 F. 1129). It was not capital but accumulated revenue. The respondents were not allowed to deduct the yearly sums put aside in this way as insurance money, and they ought not to be penalised, as they would be if this deduction was not allowed now. If this money had been paid to an outside underwriter they would have been allowed to deduct it.

The Court reversed the determination of the Commissioners, and remitted to them to disallow the deduction of £2465, 4s. 1d. claimed by the Company, and to refuse a certificate of overpayment of duty.

Lord M'Laren.—The ship "Kenmore," whereof the respondents are owners, was wrecked, as we are informed, on 11th January 1904, and became a total loss. It was insured with underwriters to the amount of £34,500, on a valuation in the policy of £37,000.

It is stated in the case that the market-value of the "Kenmore" immediately before being wrecked was £37,000, and it must be taken for the purposes of this appeal that the valuation in the policies of insurance represents the true value of the ship. Accordingly the sum of £37,000 is the "measure of indemnity," and to the extent of £2500 it must be taken that the "Kenmore" was uninsured.

It is true that the owners for their own protection against losses had established what is called an "insurance fund," into which they were in the practice of paying every year sums equal to the premiums of insurance which would have been payable to an underwriter in respect of the uninsured fraction of the value of each ship. The fund thus provided was then liable to be drawn upon for losses, and the respondents say that by payments into this fund in respect of the "Kenmore" they insured themselves to the extent of the sum of £2500, which was not covered by underwriters' insurances.

I do not doubt that it is a common practice, and I may say a very laudable practice, of shipowners to take upon themselves a certain proportion of the risk of losses, and to provide for the distribution of such losses over a term of years by means of a so-called insurance fund. But I must point out that this is not marine insurance in the legal sense of the term; because there is no contract of insurance, but only a reservation of a sum out of the profits of the business to provide for future losses.

In this state of the facts the respondent company claim, in a question with the Inland Revenue Department, to be entitled to a deduction from the profits of the year of the sum of £2500, less a small sum recovered as salvage, on the ground that they have lost this sum in the course of their trade during the year. This contention, as I think, is not consistent with the view which they put forward, that they have insured themselves to that extent, because if they are insured, then they have sustained no loss, and at most they could only claim deduction of the amount which they had paid as the equivalent of a premium into their own insurance fund. It is not a satisfactory answer to say that they have not been allowed to deduct these quasi-premiums in the income tax accounts. I do not, as at present advised, see how they could maintain a claim for such deduction, because under the Income Tax Acts, sums which are set apart out of gross profits to meet future contingencies are not allowed as deductions from assessable profits. In any case we must assume that the sums set apart as the equivalent of premiums were rightly treated as subject to income tax, because the company has paid the tax and has not appealed under this head.

Thompson v. Western Steamship Co. Ltd.
Lord M'Laren.

But now, if we reject the theory that the Company has insured itself to the extent of £2500, it follows (on the assumption that the ship was not overvalued) that a loss has been sustained to the extent of £2500. But then I am afraid that in this view the Company is in no better position to maintain its claim, because this is a loss affecting its capital account; and if anything is clear in the income tax rules for assessment, it is that losses affecting capital are not allowed as a deduction from the profits of the year.

The most favourable view of the case for the respondents' argument is, that a sum of £2500 had to be provided by way of reinstatement in order that the Company should be enabled to complete the purchase of a new ship. But I think the conclusive answer is, that this is just a replacement of a capital sum which has been lost. If it can be replaced out of the Company's insurance fund the Company's capital account does not suffer diminution. If it cannot be replaced in this way, the capital of the Company is less by £2500 than it was before the ship was wrecked; but that is a loss of capital, and is a loss which does not enter into the trading account on which income tax has to be assessed. I am accordingly of opinion that the appeal of the Surveyor of Taxes should be allowed.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord Pearson.—The sum of £2465, 4s. 1d., which is sought to be deducted from profits before calculating the income tax, represents the uninsured part of the loss incurred by the Western Steamship Company on their ship "Kenmore." When the loss occurred, the Company transferred that sum from its insurance fund to its capital account, so replacing the loss to capital. In my opinion that is not a case for deducting the sum from income in calculating income tax. The loss is really a loss of capital; and I think the fallacy of the view submitted by the Company results from a failure to distinguish between the Company's business and the Company's practice in carrying on their business. It is said that to the extent of the sum claimed they are their own insurers; that their insurance fund is the product of monies which had previously paid income tax; and that they should not be put in a worse position than an outside underwriter, who would have been allowed the loss, when it occurred, as a deduction from profits. It is a convenient expression to describe a shipowner in these circumstances as his own insurer; but that is a figurative expression, and there is no real analogy between his position and that of a person carrying on the business of underwriter.—5th June 1907.

REPARATION — MASTER AND SERVANT — LIABILITY AT COMMON LAW — RELEVANCY — DANGEROUS SYSTEM — FAILURE TO PROVIDE "REDCAP" DURING SHUNTING OPERATIONS.

The circumstances of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary allowed an issue at common law.

Lord Mackenzie.—In this case it is admitted that the pursuer cannot insist in his claim against the defenders under the Employers' Liability Act, because there was no timeous notice. The question, therefore, is whether he is entitled to an issue on the ground of liability at common law.

The pursuer's father was killed whilst in the employment of the defenders. He was a carpenter employed at their contract for the construction of a new railway. It is averred that the deceased was engaged, under the supervision of a foreman, in repairing a waggon which was standing on a line of rails at said railway works, and that, while he was engaged below the waggon, an engine belonging to the defenders and in charge of one of their servants shunted a number of waggons along the line of rails on which the waggon being repaired by the deceased was standing, and ran over him. The fault charged against the defenders is that their system of work was defective. The first particular in respect of which the system is said to have been defective is that the waggon which was undergoing repair should have been removed clear of the line of rails before the work of repairing was undertaken. This, in my opinion, plainly does not disclose a good ground of liability at common law, but concerns what was a matter of detail and cannot be described as a fault in the system.

The proper construction to be placed on the averments which immediately follow was matter of controversy. I have come to the conclusion that they are capable of being read in the manner contended for by the pursuer. In this view they contain two separate points. The first is set out as follows:—"It was the duty of the defenders, while said repairs were being carried out, to have had a signalman stationed to warn the pursuer and the other workmen engaged in executing said repairs of the approach of moving waggons upon said line; but their system of working was defective and dangerous in that they failed to provide any such signalman; they failed to take these precautions, and thus caused the accident to the pursuer." The second point is contained in the next two sentences, which aver "In the performance of such contracts as that at which defenders employed deceased, it is usual for the contractors to provide a signalman to precede an engine when shunting is taking place at lyes and sidings upon which workmen are engaged. This is a reasonable and necessary precaution, and if it had been adopted by defenders said accident to deceased would not have happened." The averment in the first sentence quoted above contains an allegation of fault on the part of the defenders, in that they failed to have a signalman stationed to warn the pursuer while the repairs were being carried out. The averment in the next two sentences is that it is a reasonable and necessary precaution in carrying out the ordinary operation of shunting at lyes and sidings upon which workmen are engaged in the construction of a new railway, to provide a signalman to precede the engine. This is irrespective of whether any repairs are being executed on a waggon. By such a signalman I understand is meant what is popularly known as a "redcap." The defenders maintain that the whole of these three sentences must be read as limited to the averment of a duty to provide what one may call an emergency signalman on the occasion when repairs are being carried out. If this were the true reading of the record I should agree with the defenders that this was not properly a defect in what could be called a part of their system. I consider, however, that the latter averment quoted above does properly aver a defect in the system, and does aver a failure to provide a servant necessary to carry out with safety the ordinary and everyday operation of shunting.

The defenders maintained that in any view the averment was irrelevant on the authority of the cases of Harper v. Dunlop & Co. (1902, 5 F. 208) and Thomson v. Baird & Co. (1903, 6 F. 142). It is therefore necessary to see what exactly was decided in these two cases. In Harper's case it is clearly pointed out in Lord Adam's opinion that there would be liability at common law if the defenders had failed to supply a sufficient number of men to carry out their work, but that in that case the pursuer's averments disclosed that there was a sufficient number of men supplied, though three of them had been sent elsewhere. That was not the fault of the defenders as distinguished from fault of persons in their employment. The defenders could not be expected to know that three men had been temporarily sent away to another job. The fault, if any, was that of the foreman. The case of Harper, therefore, appears to me to be different from the present. In that case there was no averment that a sufficient number of workmen had not been supplied. Here there is an averment of failure to supply a signalman who was necessary for the ordinary operation of shunting. I may also point out that the view taken in Harper of the nature of the operation which caused the accident (the unloading of a bogey) was that it was of the nature of a particular job carried out in a particular way, and was not a usual operation in the ordinary course of the defenders' work. This remark is not applicable to the operation of shunting in the present case, and it was the shunting, not the repairing of the waggon, that caused the accident.

The case of Thomson, though at first sight it bears some analogy to the present, is, in my opinion, when examined, really different. The pursuer there was engaged along with two other men in repairing a railway adjoining the defenders' works. Now that was not the case of a new railway under construction. There was no averment that any such person as a "redcap" was required to precede the engine. There is nothing to indicate that it was any more necessary to have a signalman to precede the engines on that line than it would be to have a signalman to precede any North British or Caledonian train. It was a case in which a gang of platelayers had to provide their own lookout man. In such a case, as Lord M'Laren pointed out, it would be preposterous to say that the directors of a company were bound personally to see that one of the gang was deputed to keep a lookout. The fault in that case was on the part of one whose business it was to superintend, in not having directed one of the men to keep a lookout. That is a question, not of administration, but of distribution, and therefore not relevant to raise a case of liability at common law. In the present case I am unable to see, taking the case solely on the averments of the pursuer, how it can be represented that there was a duty on the part of the defenders' foreman to detail one of the carpenters' squad to precede a shunting engine as signalman. That was a matter within the province of those who organised the arrangements for shunting. However sufficient the supply of workmen for the carpentering job, this would still, under the case made by the pursuer, leave the defenders minus a "redcap" for their shunting engine.

Of course it may turn out at the trial that there was no duty on the defenders to provide a "redcap," and that there was a duty on the foreman to provide a lookout man from his carpenters' squad. If the jury took that view, they would not be entitled to return a verdict for the pursuer under the only issue proposed, which is one at common law. The fault would then be, not one of administration, but of distribution, and the case would fall within the principle of that of Thomson. For the reasons stated above, I am of opinion that the pursuer has averred sufficient to distinguish his case from that of Thomson.

I should advert to another point which was made for the defenders, viz., that the record discloses in the later portions of Cond. 4 that the accident happened because the defenders' foreman ordered the deceased to do the work, when he knew, or ought to have known, that waggons were about to be shunted. If, however, the defenders had provided the "redcap" said to be necessary the pursuer would not have been injured. I am accordingly of opinion that the issue proposed should be approved.—4th June 1907.

II. Husband and Wife—Marriage—Impotency—Decree of Nullity—Marriage Held Null at its Date.

The question decided in this case was whether a widow, who had gone through a ceremony of marriage which was subsequently held to be null and void by a competent Court, had or had not "entered into a second marriage" in the sense of a provision in her first husband's trust disposition and settlement restricting her rights under the settlement in that event.

The following authorities were cited in the Procedure Roll in addition to those quoted in the Lord Ordinary's opinion:—Hume on Crimes, I. 456; Stair, I. 4, 6; Cavell v. Prince, 1866, L.R. 1 Ex. 246; A. v. B., 1868, L.R. 1 P. and M., 559; Eversley's Law of the Domestic Relations, pp. 59, 60; Wilson v. Wilson, 1846, 1 H.L. The Lord Ordinary held that on a sound construction of the words in the settlement the pursuer was entitled to declarator that she had not entered into a second marriage.

Lord Guthrie.—The only question I have to decide is raised by the proposed declarator "that the pursuer has not entered into a second marriage within the meaning of the said trust disposition and settlement." If I affirm that proposition, there must be an accounting under the alternative conclusion at the end of the Summons.

No marriage contract was entered into between the late Captain C. B. and the pursuer. There is one child of the marriage, a pupil, posthumous. Captain C. B. died on 8th April 1898. A ceremony of marriage was solemnised in the parish church of . . . . London, on 2nd October 1901, between the pursuer and Captain D. By final decree of the High Court of Justice in England, Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, dated 30th April 1906, this marriage was declared to be, and to have been, absolutely null and void. Down to 2nd October 1901, from the death of Captain C. B., three years before, the pursuer enjoyed the liferent of Captain C. B.'s estate under the provisions of his trust disposition and settlement. Since that date, the defenders have paid the pursuer for the past six years the restricted annuity of £300 a year (increased by certain payments for the child), provided to her by Captain C. B. in the event of her "entering into a second marriage and there being children or their issue then alive."

The pursuer maintains on a sound construction of Captain C. B.'s will that she did not enter into a second marriage on 2nd October 1901, and that she is now entitled to the difference between the sum she has received and the liferent of Captain C. B.'s estate.

I think the pursuer's contention is sound, whether the words of the will be construed popularly, or according to their strict legal signification. I do not consider how the testator himself would have construed them, for that might have depended on idiosyncrasies, of which I know nothing. Yet it is right to point out that there is nothing in the will to suggest that he would have given them any abnormally narrow or ungenerous construction. There is no appearance of a morbid wish to perpetuate his widow's retention of his name to the prejudice of her own desires or interests. There is no restriction if, ceasing her apparent allegiance to his memory, she becomes engaged to be married. Nor is a ceremony of marriage enough; she must "enter into a second marriage." From the trust deed I see no reason to think that Captain C. B., any more than other ordinary men, would have intended to cut down his wife's rights if she was ignorantly the unhappy victim of a ceremony of marriage with a eunuch. I say ignorantly, because, had she gone through the ceremony in knowledge of Captain D.'s condition, she would not have been entitled to the decree of nullity which she has obtained from the English Court.

But it was argued that the true question was, not what might be thought by the man in the street, but did not the pursuer, in the eyes of the law, enter into a second marriage on 2nd October 1901? I answer that question also in the negative. The decree of the English Court, referring to the "marriage in fact had and solemnized on 2nd October 1901," has pronounced and declared "the said marriage to be, and to have been, absolutely null and void, and that the said petitioner was and is free from all bond of marriage" with Captain D.

It was not disputed that the effect of this decree is the same in law as the corresponding Scotch decree. The result is that it has been declared by a final judgment of a competent Court that, as I read it, the marriage not merely is, but was at its date, null and void. If so, I cannot declare that on 2nd October 1901 the pursuer entered into what the law considers a second marriage. I do not find it necessary to embark on an examination of the numerous cases and authorities which were cited. There are two distinctions between nullity suits on the ground of impotency and nullity suits on the grounds of (a) incapacity from nonage, insanity, imbecility, or intoxication; (b) forbidden degrees; and (c) prior marriage. These are, first, restriction of the instance to the injured contracting party; and, second, the operation of personal exception to bar the remedy sharply distinguishing a case of personal incapacity from cases of legal or mental incapacity. There are institutional and judicial dicta so emphasising these distinctions as to take an impotency suit out of the region of nullity into that of divorce. But these views do not find expression in the decrees which are pronounced in nullity actions. I may add that none of the cases overthrow the authority of Erskine's statement, if there be substituted in the first sentence, copulation for procreation. I. 6, 7: "Marriage is in itself null when either of the parties is at the time of contracting it naturally incapable of procreation." I. 6, 43: "A marriage which is null from the beginning, and may be declared so by a sentence of a proper Court (instances of which have been mentioned ss. 2, 7), cannot be said to be dissolved, because it was never truly contracted: and as marriages in themselves void can have no legal effects, everything must, in a declaration of their nullity, return hinc inde to its former condition."—15*th June* 1907.

I. WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897 (60 & 61 VICT. CAP. 37)—AGREEMENT TO PAY COMPENSATION — AGREEMENT TO GIVE INJURED WORKMAN REGULAR EMPLOYMENT AT A FIXED WAGE—ACTION OF DAMAGES AT COMMON LAW AFTER RECORDING OF MEMORANDUM FOR ALLEGED BREACH OF OBLIGATION TO GIVE REGULAR EMPLOYMENT—ACTION HELD INCOMPETENT.

II. CONTRACT — DISCHARGE — BREACH — CONTRACT TO GIVE WORKMAN REGULAR EMPLOYMENT—DISMISSAL OF WORKMAN AFTER THREE YEARS — RELEVANCY OF ACTION FOR BREACH.

In this action Thomas Lawrie, head fireman, formerly in the employment of James Brown & Co. Ltd., Esk Mills, Penicuik, who had been injured while in their employment, sued the said James Brown & Co. Ltd. for damages for breach of an agreement by them to give him regular employment. After narrating his injury, which involved the loss of his right eye, the pursuer made the following averments as to the agreement and what had followed upon it:—

COND. 3. The defenders, recognising that the pursuer had a serious claim both at common law and under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, at once began to negotiate a settlement with him. They were well aware that he had a wife and family dependent upon him, and that he was seriously handicapped by the accident from being able to support them. Accordingly they proposed that the pursuer should make an agreement with them under the Workmen's Compensation Act, in order that the pursuer might be enabled to earn substantial wages, and promised that they would receive into their employment one of the pursuer's children who was then of an age ready for work, and the younger ones as they came to be of an age for working. The defenders, further recognising that their general work involved considerable risk to the pursuer's remaining eye, agreed to give the pursuer regular employment as a foreman over their workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills, paying him a fixed wage of twenty-three shillings per week, with the usual additional pay for extra work, which they promised would be equal to one day per week or three shillings and tenpence of additional wages. The pursuer's wages previous to the accident averaged from thirty-five shillings to thirty-seven shillings per week. In respect of the outlay, loss, etc., consequent on the injury to the pursuer's eye, the defenders further agreed to pay the pursuer £90 sterling. In so far as the said agreement related to the matters contemplated by the Workmen's Compensation Act, a memorandum of agreement was entered into between the pursuer and defenders (a copy of which is herewith produced), and was duly recorded in the Sheriff-Court Books at Edinburgh on 3rd December 1903.

Cond. 4. Acting under the said arrangement the defenders paid the said £90 and took the pursuer back temporarily into their service, but in all other respects they have grossly failed to fulfil their said agreement, and have acted in direct violation of its terms, being enabled to do so by taking advantage of the necessitous circumstances of the pursuer, and with the object of affording them some pretext to dispense with the services of the pursuer. In particular, the pursuer requested that two of his younger children should be given work as promised, but this the defenders refused. The defenders, in place of giving the pursuer the position of foreman of the settling ponds, compelled him to work as a general labourer, his duties mainly being the filling of carts and barrows with materials containing caustic soda and other dust which created a grave risk of accident to the pursuer's remaining eye. The defenders also refused to give the pursuer any opportunity of earning wages for overtime. The pursuer at first suggested to the defenders that they were not fulfilling their agreement with him, but they intimated they were having the agreement fully in view, and the pursuer, partly on this account and partly on account of said necessitous condition, performed the duties allotted to him by the defenders. The pursuer, however, frequently protested against the defenders' breach of agreement, and ultimately insisted (1) that his work should be the work of superintendence at the settling ponds, and (2) that he should be given ordinary facilities for working overtime. In consequence of the pursuer's attempting to hold the defenders to the said agreement, he was dismissed by them, without notice or reason assigned, on 3rd July 1906. During the whole period of the defenders' employment of the pursuer as foreman, they acted in gross violation of the said agreement in the hope that the pursuer might leave their service, but finding that he did not do so, they also, in gross breach of their obligations and the duty which they owed to the pursuer, turned him out of their employment, and now refuse both to implement their engagement to give him employment and to recognise his just claim for compensation arising in consequence of their violation of it.

In the Procedure Roll the defenders argued, inter alia—(1) That the action was incompetent, in respect that although the claim arose out of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, it sought to add a remedy not given by the Act; and (2) that it was irrelevant, in respect that their actings as averred by the pursuer did not constitute a breach of the agreement to give regular employment.

The Lord Ordinary held the action to be both incompetent and irrelevant.

Lord Guthrie.—The defenders plead incompetency and irrelevancy.

They say that the action is incompetent because the only claim stated by the pursuer against them arises out of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. That agreement, they admit, can be enforced in all its terms under the Act, but, according to them, no part of it can be made the ground for a claim for damages at common law, such as is made in this action. The pursuer has foreseen the difficulty and endeavoured in Cond. 3. to evade it by representing the statutory agreement as one contract and the agreement for regular employment, which is the basis of his present claim, as another and distinct contract. But this is not so, either in fact or in law. The whole stipulations are contained in one agreement. It is headed in the usual form, "In the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897," etc., and, after detailing the terms of the agreement, including the undertaking by the defenders to give the pursuer "regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds," ends with these words: "and these in full of his claims for compensation under the said Act in respect of the said injury." In these circumstances it is unsound to maintain, as the pursuer does, that the case is the same as if the stipulation as to regular employment was in a separate document containing no reference to the Act. If the contract founded on by the pursuer is part of an agreement under the Act, as I hold it is, it is not disputed that it cannot be enforced in this action.

I also sustain the plea to the relevancy. It is not necessary to consider the pursuer's averments as to the defenders' breach of a verbal contract to employ his children, and to afford him extra work, because it was explained that those are not matter of substantive claim. Nor is any case made of want of reasonable notice, if the pursuer was truly employed by the defenders, as alleged by them, at will. The pursuer's complaint is that while the defenders undertook to give him regular employment, they only did so for nearly three years and then dismissed him. I see no breach of contract by the defenders in thus acting, unless there be read into the agreement an obligation on the defenders to give the pursuer regular employment for life, or at least, as the pursuer contended, so long as he is able and willing to serve them and does his work properly. I see no warrant for reading any such terms into the agreement, and I therefore hold the pursuer's averments of breach of contract irrelevant.—15*th June* 1907.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

51. Dick's Trustees v. Cameron and Others.

Succession — Power of Appointment — Exercise of Power—Alternatives Offered —First Alternative Illusory and Intended to Force Acceptance of Second Alternative —Second Alternative Invalid—Held Power Not Exercised Bona Fide, and Appointment Wholly Invalid.

Special Case.

By their marriage contract, dated 23rd September 1873, Mr and Mrs Dick directed the marriage-contract funds to be divided among the children of the marriage in such proportions and under such conditions as the spouses or either of them should direct.

Mrs Dick died in 1902, survived by her husband and four children, viz., Mrs Cameron, Mrs Higinbotham, Henry and Alice.

Mrs Dick left a holograph settlement, by which she bequeathed £7000 in liferent to her daughter Mrs Cameron, and in fee to her children; £20,000 in liferent to her daughter Alice, and in fee to her children; an annuity of £50 to her daughter Mrs Higinbotham, and the residue of her estate to her son Henry, one-half in fee and one-half in liferent, with fee to his children.

Mr Dick died in 1905, survived by the said four children, leaving a trust disposition and settlement and codicils, by which he bequeathed legacies of £5000 each to his daughters Mrs Cameron and Mrs Higinbotham in liferent, and their children in fee; a legacy of £250 to his daughter Alice, and the residue of his estate to his son Henry in liferent with a power of disposal.

Mr Dick also left a deed of apportionment dated 20th July 1904, in the following terms:—

I, Henry Knox Dick of Torbrex, 61 Grange Loan, Edinburgh, considering that by my marriage contract with my late wife I have power to apportion the funds thereunder among my family and in terms of such power I hereby direct the trustees under the said contract to pay to each of my daughters the sum of £500, and to my only son Henry the whole residue of the estate. It being my desire, however, so far as consistent with my own private estate that my said daughters should benefit as far as possible and to such an extent as their mother under her holograph deed of settlement, dated 24th February 1901, desired they should, I hereby declare that my said daughters shall have the option of either accepting the foresaid £500 each or they shall have the right to claim the following increased amounts but that only on the conditions stipulated for in the said holograph deed of settlement of my said wife,—That is to say in the case of my daughter Mrs Cecilia Isabel Dick or Cameron the liferent of £7000, and in the case of my daughter Mrs Agnes MacKenzie Dick or Higinbotham the liferent of £3500 and in the case of my daughter Alice Helen the liferent of £20,000 which sums to meet said liferents shall be deducted from the residue of the said estate and they or each of them shall grant such deed or deeds necessary in favour of the trustees under the marriage contract to carry out the purposes contained in the said holograph deed of settlement which shall form the basis upon which the liferent and disposal of the fee are to be settled. In regard however to my daughter Agnes who under the will was only entitled to a half-yearly payment of £50 in the event of her electing to take the £3500 it shall be on the same conditions as are specially provided for in the said holograph deed as regards her sister Isabel. . . .

The amount of estate left by Mr Dick was upwards of £54,000, and the amount of the marriage-contract funds was about £60,000, of which £2500 was contributed by Mr Dick, and the remainder by his wife.

Questions having arisen regarding the disposal of the marriage-contract funds, this special case was presented, to which, inter alios, the parties were (1) the Marriage-Contract Trustees, (2) Mrs Cameron and Mrs Higinbotham, (3) Henry Dick, and (4) Alice Dick.

The first question which was raised was whether Mrs Dick's holograph settlement was a valid exercise of her power of appointment over the share contributed by her to the marriage-contract funds. It is unnecessary to refer further to this question, beyond stating that the decision of the Court was to the effect that her holograph settlement was not a valid exercise of her power of appointment, in respect that it limited the right of her daughter Alice — who was an object of the power—to a liferent, and gave a fee to persons who were not objects of the power.

The second question related to the validity of the deed of appointment executed by Mr Dick.

The second parties maintained and argued that it was wholly bad. The first alternative offered to the children was merely intended to coerce them into accepting the second alternative, and was not a bona fide exercise of the power. The second alternative was invalid; cf. Baikie's Trs., 1862, 24 D. 589.

The third party maintained and argued: The deed was valid in so far as it appointed £500 to each of the daughters and the residue to the son. The remainder was invalid, and fell to be regarded "pro non scripto" (M'Donald, 1875, 2 R. (H.L.) 125; Middleton's Trs., 1906, 8 F. 1037.

The fourth party maintained and argued: The deed was a valid exercise of the power of appointment, and under the option granted her, she was entitled to £20,000 free of all conditions (Matthews Duncan's Trs., 1901, 3 F. 533). Alternatively she maintained that the deed was wholly invalid.

The following question was, inter alia, submitted to the Court:—

2ND DIV.
Dick's Trs. v. Cameron and Others.

"As regards the marriage-contract funds . . . . (d) Is the deed of appointment by Mr Knox Dick, dated 20th July 1904, entirely ineffectual?"

The Court answered this question in the affirmative.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by Lord Low.

Lord Low. . . .—The next question is whether the deed of apportionment executed by Mr Dick was a valid exercise of the power? That deed is in a very peculiar form, because it gives the daughters the option of taking very small sums absolutely, or large sums in liferent only, with fee to their children if they have any, and failing children, to fall into residue which is destined to the only son of the marriage.

The deed commences with a narrative of the power conferred by the marriage contract, and proceeds: "In terms of such power I hereby direct the trustees under the said contract to pay to each of my daughters the sum of £500, and to my only son Henry the whole residue of the estate."

If the deed had stopped there I take it that the appointment could not have been challenged, although it would, considering the large amount at Mr Dick's disposal, have left the daughters (of whom there were three) very slenderly provided for. The trust funds amounted to some £60,000, and Mr Dick's means, which did not fall under the marriage contract, to over £54,000, and by his testamentary settlement he had left to each of two of his daughters—Mrs Cameron and Mrs Higinbotham—the liferent only of £5000, and to his daughter Alice only a legacy of £250.

Mr Dick recognised that to appoint to each of his daughters so small a share of the marriage-contract funds as £500 would leave them inadequately provided for, and accordingly he proceeds to give them the option to which I have referred, and he explains his reasons for adopting that course in the following words: "It being my desire, however, so far as consistent with my own private estate, that my daughters should benefit as far as possible, and to such an extent as their mother under her holograph deed of settlement desired they should."

Evidently some words have been omitted from that sentence, but I think that it is plain enough that what Mr Dick meant by the words "so far as consistent with my own private estate" was so far as consistent with the testamentary settlement which he had made of his own private estate. If that be a sound construction of the language used, then Mr Dick's reasons for giving his daughters an option were (1) that he did not wish to give them anything more from his own estate than what he had provided to them in the settlement which he had executed; and (2) that he desired that the wishes of his wife as expressed in her holograph settlement should be given effect to in the division of the marriage-contract funds.

The deed accordingly proceeds: "I hereby declare that my said daughters shall have the option of either accepting the foresaid £500 each, or they shall have right to claim the following increased amounts, but that only on the conditions stipulated for in the said holograph settlement of my said wife." He then gave to his daughters Mrs Cameron and Miss Alice Dick liferents of the same sums as those provided for them in Mrs Dick's settlement—namely, £7000 in the former case and £20,000 in the latter. To the third daughter, Mrs Higinbotham, he gave a liferent of £3500, whereas in Mrs Dick's settlement she was restricted to an annuity of £50. All these gifts were declared to be subject to the conditions specified in Mrs Dick's settlement, to which effect was directed to be given. The result was that the daughters were restricted to a liferent, that the capital sums were given to their children if they had any, and failing children were to fall into residue which by Mrs Dick's settlement was destined under certain limitations to the only son of the marriage.

Now it is plain that if Mrs Dick's settlement was invalid as an exercise of the power of appointment, the alternative which Mr Dick offered to his daughters was equally so; but it was argued that if they did not accept the alternative, they must content themselves with £500 each, because Mr Dick had undoubtedly power to restrict them to that amount.

I think that the best answer to that argument is that Mr Dick's deed of apportionment was not a bona fide exercise of the power. I take it that the power was conferred because circumstances might arise which would render it expedient and just that there should not be an equal division of the marriage-contract funds among the children, and that some of them should get more and others less. Mr Dick, however, was not actuated by consideration of that kind in appointing £500 to each of his daughters, because it seems to me to be plain that he never intended that his daughters' interest in the marriage-contract funds should in fact be restricted to that sum. In particular, it is absurd to suggest that he ever contemplated that the sole provision for his daughter Alice out of parental estates amounting to nearly £120,000, should be a capital sum of £750—that is, a legacy of £250 under Mr Dick's settlement and £500 under his deed of apportionment. The appointment of £500 to each of the daughters was therefore merely a threat, a weapon which he used for the purpose of concussing the daughters to agree to a disposition of the marriage-contract funds, which was contrary to the provisions of the contract, and which he had no power to make. I think that that was an illegitimate use—indeed, an abuse—of the power which the Court cannot sanction. Accordingly, Mr Dick's deed of apportionment was, in my judgment, altogether bad, and cannot receive effect. . . .—6*th June* 1907.

52. Sinclair v. Tod.

Landlord and Tenant—Removing—Ejection—Title to Possess—Relevancy—Action of Damages for Ejection Without Warrant — Pursuer Possessing Without Title — Action Held Irrelevant — Macdonald, 1860, 22 D. 1075, and Macdonald, 1883, 10 R. 1079, Followed.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court at Stirling.

This was an action of damages raised in the Sheriff Court at Stirling at the instance of Peter Sinclair, shepherd, against John Tod, farmer. The following narrative of the pursuer's averments is taken from the Opinion of Lord Ardwall.

"The pursuer and his wife were in the service of the defender, and as part of the remuneration for their services they were entitled to the occupation of a house free of rent. On account of a dispute between the pursuer's wife and the defender's wife on 30th July 1905, the defender dismissed the pursuer's wife from his employment. It seems to be uncertain at what point of time the pursuer was dismissed, but there is no doubt that the pursuer's contract of service came to an end on or before the 2nd August 1905. On 2nd August 1905 the pursuer raised an action in the Small Debt Court at Stirling for £53, 11s., restricted to £12, one of the items claimed being the rent of the said house till Whitsunday 1906. The pursuer's wife also raised an action against the defender for £11, 6s. 6d. on the same date. The pursuer and his wife attended the calling of these Small Debt actions in the Sheriff Court at Stirling on 11th August 1905, and, taking the opportunity of their being absent from home, the defender removed the pursuer's whole furniture and effects out of the said house, and placed them on the ground outside.

"The pursuer alleges that he and his wife and family have suffered in their feelings and reputation, and have been put to considerable loss and trouble, and that their furniture has been damaged, and the present action is brought to recover that damage.

"It may be mentioned that the Small Debt actions were compromised by a payment of £6 paid before decree."

The defender pleaded, inter alia, that the action was irrelevant.

On 15th May 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Buntine) sustained this plea and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who on 11th June 1906 adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute. He delivered the following note:—

On a careful consideration of the pursuer's averments and of the authorities, I am afraid the pursuer has no valid claim against the defender for the injuries to his repute and to his furniture that the somewhat unusual course taken by the defender is said to have caused.

It is plain that if a servant's period of service has come to an end he has no claim to receive remuneration thereafter. Now, the right to occupy the house was part of the remuneration given to the pursuer; and after his dismissal he had no more claim to the house than he had to further wages. No doubt, if the defender had taken the usual course of applying to the Court for reinstatement in his rights, the Court would have given the pursuer a reasonable interval to find a house and remove his family and his furniture; and an employer cannot by taking the law into his own hands deprive his servant of this necessary time. But here the defender left the pursuer in possession for about twelve days; and the pursuer does not say that the defender agreed to allow him to continue to occupy the house, or that he was unable to get a house, or that there was any illness or other cause that prevented him from removing. Then, as regards the furniture, he does not aver that it was roughly used, or that he was unable to take it away, or that the defender could have put it in any outhouse to save it from the weather. His sole ground of claim, as far as I can find from his condescendence, is that the defender took the unusual course of ejecting the pursuer at his own hands and without any warrant.

But then the Supreme Court has, on several occasions, held or observed that where a servant's right of occupation has ceased, and he refuses to remove, his employer may put him out of the premises; and if he brings an action for this ejectment, he is excluded from any claim, as he had no title to possess. The authorities are all collected and commented on by Mr Sheriff Begg in his admirable judgment in the case of Wallace v. Hamiltons, 9 Sheriff Court Reports 130, to which I may for brevity refer.

There are thus no special grounds presented by the pursuer in this action which would justify me in giving him a redress which the Supreme Court has held in other actions must be refused. In deference, therefore, to these authorities, I think I am bound to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute.

The Pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued: The defender was wrong in evicting the pursuer without a warrant from the Sheriff, which was necessary even when the possession was precarious (Scougal, 1819, 2 Mur. 110; Hally, 1867, 5 M. 951; Scottish Property Investment Co., 1881, 8 R. 737; Stair, IV. 28, 12; Ersk. Inst., III. 7, 16, and IV. 1, 15).

Argued for the Defender: Reasonable time was given to the pursuer after he received notice to leave, before he was turned out. A person who is in possession without a title may be evicted without a warrant (Macdonald, 1860, 22 D. 1075; Macdonald, 1883, 10 R. 1079; Scott, 1869, 6 S.L.R. 301; Fraser on Master and Servant, p. 332).

The Court affirmed the judgment appealed against.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The pursuer here, who was a shepherd on a farm near Denny in Stirlingshire, with a free house on the farm as part of his remuneration, complains of a rather high-handed proceeding on the part of his master the defender, by which the defender, on 11th August 1905, without any legal form of process, entered the pursuer's house and turned his whole furniture and effects into the road outside the house. For this he claims damages, which he estimates at £32, 1s. 6d.

The defender admits the removal of the furniture, and justifies it on the ground that the pursuer had been dismissed from the defender's service on 29th July, and that the pursuer had no right to occupy the house after that date.

This action was called on 20th March 1906, and the Sheriff-Substitute, on 15th May, sustained a plea of irrelevancy stated for the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had no title to occupy the house at the time in question, and dismissed the action. The Sheriff, on appeal, as I gather from his note, rather reluctantly adhered, for he called the course taken by the defender, in not first applying for a legal warrant of ejection, a "somewhat unusual" course.

Now, I agree with the Sheriff there, for such a warrant would undoubtedly have been granted, but only according to the practice of the Sheriff Court on some short but reasonable notice, which would probably have enabled the pursuer to remove the furniture himself, and could at least have given him time to make arrangements for its disposal. I cannot, therefore, commend the action of the defender in proceeding to remove the furniture at his own hand, though he may have had considerable provocation from the pursuer.

But it is one thing to express disapproval of the defender's action, and it is another thing to say that the pursuer has a right to claim damages for the removal of the furniture. That can only arise if the defender's conduct was illegal, or, in other words, if the defender on his part had no right to do what he did.

Now, looking to the cases (which are not many, but fairly recent, on this branch of the law), I cannot say that the defender was not entitled to act as he did. After dismissal the pursuer's title of possession had come to an end; and although I do not think that the defender would have been justified in turning him out the very next day, I cannot say that he had no right to turn him out in twelve days, which was what he actually did. The case of Macdonald v. Duchess of Leeds in 1860, 22 D. 1075, and Macdonald v. Watson in 1883, 10 R. 1079, are both to the effect that a pursuer who complains of ejection without a warrant must set forth a title to possess, and that, in the absence of such a title, ejection without a warrant is, in the words of Lord President Inglis, "a perfectly legal proceeding." To the same effect is a passage in Lord Fraser's book on Master and Servant, p. 332.

I therefore think that we must affirm the judgments of the Sheriffs.

Lord Low.—I have carefully considered the argument in this case, because where a party has taken the law into his own hands it is incumbent upon the Court to scrutinise the circumstances closely. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the learned Sheriffs have rightly decided this case, and upon the proper ground.

The question seems to me to be whether the pursuer has averred any legal title to possess the house at the time when the defender removed the furniture from it. In the third article of the Condescendence the pursuer makes a somewhat curious averment. He says that his wife, who was also in the defender's employment, had a dispute on 30th July 1905 with the defender's wife, and that on account of that dispute "the defender dismissed her" (the pursuer's wife) "from his employment, but expressed his willingness at the time to retain the pursuer in his employment." The pursuer does not say what answer he gave to that proposal, but immediately proceeds to refer to an action which he brought against the defender on 2nd August in the Small Debt Court.

I suppose that the averment in regard to the alleged offer of the defender to retain the pursuer in his employment was intended to suggest, at all events, that the pursuer had not been ordered to leave the house. The action in the Small Debt Court, however, to which the pursuer refers, at once disposes of any such suggestion, because in the claim annexed to the Summons the pursuer averred that the defender on 30th July, without previous notice, and without cause, dismissed him from his service, and also insisted upon his leaving the dwelling-house, and the pursuer, inter alia, claimed £6 as rent of dwelling-house up to the following term of Whitsunday.

Therefore the facts must be taken to be (as indeed was not disputed) that the defender dismissed the pursuer from his service on the 30th July, and ordered him to leave the house, the right to occupy which was part of his wages, and that it was not until the 11th of August that the defender put the pursuer's furniture out of the house.

Now it was conceded that the pursuer was entitled to a reasonable time after his dismissal to make arrangements for living elsewhere. What is a reasonable time is a matter of circumstances, but prima facie, from the 30th of July to the 11th of August should have been ample. If the pursuer had averred that he had done his best to get another dwelling-place, but had been unable to do so, and that the defender knew that that was the case, a different question might have arisen. But the pursuer makes no averment of that sort, and for anything which he says to the contrary, he may have done nothing at all in the way of looking out for another residence.

These being the circumstances, it is plain that the pursuer had on 11th August no title whatever to possess the house; and that being so, it is settled that he cannot claim damages from the defender because the latter removed his furniture from the house. The cases of Macdonald v. Duchess of Leeds, 1860, 22 D. 1075, and Macdonald v. Watson, 1883, 10 R. 1079, are directly in point; indeed, the circumstances in these cases appear to me to have been more favourable to the party claiming damages than in this case. These were both considered decisions of the First Division, and, so far as I know, their soundness has never been impugned.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriffs should be affirmed.

Lord Ardwall.—This is an action for damages for wrongous ejection. The Sheriff-Substitute dismissed the case as irrelevant, and that judgment was, on appeal, adhered to by the Sheriff. I am of opinion that the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-Substitute are well founded, and ought to be affirmed.

[After the narrative of facts above quoted.] The defender pleads, inter alia, that the action is irrelevant, and this plea the Sheriffs have sustained.

The plea against the relevancy is founded on the fact that at the time the ejection complained of took place the pursuer had no title to possess the house in question or to keep his furniture there. I am of opinion that the plea is well founded in fact and law. I am of opinion that in an action of damages for alleged wrongous ejection the tenant must set forth his title to possess the premises from which he complains he has been ejected; and further, that a landlord does not require a warrant to remove a person who has no title to possess. This, I think, is settled by the judgments in the case of Macdonald v. Watson, 1883, 10 R. 1079, following on the case of Macdonald v. Duchess of Leeds, 1860, 22 D. 1075.

In the present case there can be no doubt that the pursuer on the 11th of August 1905 had no title to possess the house in question. He and his wife had been dismissed, and he had raised an action of damages in the Small Debt Court on 2nd August, in which he claimed, inter alia, the rent of the house from that date till Whitsunday 1906. It is therefore vain to say that he had any title, either as a servant or otherwise, to possess the house on the 11th of August. His contract of service had come to a termination, and he accepted that situation. Lord Fraser, in his work on Master and Servant, page 332, writes thus: "If a servant refuse to depart of his own accord, the master is even entitled to turn him out and remove his effects from the premises without process of law." He points out that the contrary was laid down in the case of Scougal v. Crawford, 2 Mur. 110 (1819), but that that is inconsistent with the later case of Scott v. M'Murdo, 1869, 6 S.L.R. 301. I prefer, however, to rest my judgment in this case upon the two cases first cited.

2nd Div. — Sinclair v. Tod. — Lord Ardwall.

While, therefore, I have no doubt upon the law applicable to the present case, I must not be taken as approving in the usual case of an ejection being carried out without process of law. With regard to a dismissed servant a summary application for removing would be competent, and I think that this is the course that it is prudent and right to follow where there are no exceptional circumstances. It is certainly the safer course for the master, and fairer to the servant.

I cannot, however, say that, looking at the averments of both parties in the present case, it appears that the pursuer was very harshly treated. The defender says that the pursuer agreed with him to leave the house on the Thursday following the 31st of July, the defender representing that he required the house for a new servant. The defender further avers that he agreed to pay the expense of the pursuer's removal. Of course, there has been no proof on these matters, and I merely allude to them for the purpose of saying that without a proof it is not fair to hold that the defender behaved harshly or without warning of any kind in what he did. This, however, does not enter into my decision of the case, which proceeds entirely upon the ground that the pursuer, not having set forth any title to occupy the house, has stated no relevant case entitling him to damages, and it seems to me that it would be a startling proposition to affirm that a person is liable in damages for removing from a house belonging to him, furniture belonging to another person who had no right to be there.—13*th June* 1907.

Bell v. Adam & Co.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

53. Bell v. Adam & Company.

Process—Proof or Jury Trial—Discretion of Lord Ordinary—Action of Damages for Personal Injury—Proof Allowed by Lord Ordinary on Account of Partial Irrelevancy of Averments — On Appeal Action Held Wholly Relevant and Issue Allowed.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

This was an action at the instance of Mrs Bell against Adam & Co. to recover damages for the death of her husband, who was killed by an accident while in the employment of the defenders.

On 20th March 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) allowed a proof before answer. He delivered the following opinion:—

Lord Johnston.—I think that the Condescendence is partly relevant and partly irrelevant. The pursuer's position on record is that the deceased Robert Galbraith Bell was employed as a coppersmith, and that he had no experience of the work he was ordered to undertake, which was the dismantling and removing of heavy utensils from a disused sugar refinery in Greenock.

Now, his widow says that the deceased and those who were working with him went to the defenders' works to obtain tackle; that there was no tackle suitable for lowering the utensils to the ground; that according to the practice in the defenders' works, all tackle required by their employees hung up in the brass shop, and from this tackle they were in use to make selection of what they required. Then she says deceased did the best he could by taking certain slings and removing them to the sugar refinery; that he and his mates broke up the utensils and lowered parts to the ground. When they came to the heavy portion they failed to get it down owing to something jamming, and in course of their efforts the pulley gave way, and the deceased was precipitated to the ground and killed. And then the pursuer goes on to aver fault on the part of the defenders.

But she sets forth no relevant averment of defective construction.

It is not said that the rope was frayed or insufficient for the weight, but for aught that is said it was a perfectly efficient piece of plant if properly used, but was, on the statement, improperly used by the rope being rove through the wrong place, it having been passed through the thimble instead of round the thimble of the tackle. The thimble not being intended to stand a strain in this way, gave way, and the accident happened.

This is not a relevant statement of defective construction or of defective condition, or of an accident happening through defective condition or construction of plant. But then it is also alleged that it was "gross negligence on the defenders' part to entrust to the deceased and his fellow-workmen the duty of executing, unaided, work which required the direction and assistance of skilled riggers in order to allow of its being safely performed."

I cannot say at this stage that this is irrelevant. I think that if it turned out that these coppersmiths are artificers, whose experience is confined to the workshop, that it was not proper to have sent them out to perform this operation of breaking up and lowering from a fourth storey utensils of such considerable weight.

I cannot say how the matter will turn out on proof, but I can say that I think there is enough relevantly stated to justify enquiry. But I do not think that the case ought to go to a jury. The case is, at least, only partly relevant, and it is difficult, before a jury, to confine the evidence to that which bears on the relevant part of the case, and whatever care the presiding judge may take in charging them, to induce the jury to restrict their consideration to that part of the evidence.

I shall therefore allow a proof before answer.

The Pursuer reclaimed, and argued: The whole of the averments were relevant for enquiry. The Lord Ordinary had allowed a proof because he considered the case only partly relevant. If he were wrong on this point, then the mode of proof should be altered to trial by jury.

Argued for the Defenders: There were no grounds for disturbing the exercise of the Lord Ordinary's discretion in determing the mode of trial (Vallery, 1905, 7 F. 640; Jack, 1904, 6 F. 572; Edinburgh Railway Access Co., 1903, 5 F. 299; Fern, 1 F. 701; Cooke, 1905, 13 S.L.T. 536; Barclay, 1904, 12 S.L.T. 45).

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and allowed an issue.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I should be sorry to interfere with the general rule that the Court will not interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary as to whether a proof or a jury trial should be allowed. But although that is the general rule, this is not a case in which the rule is applicable. Apparently the Lord Ordinary's reason for allowing a proof was because he was of opinion that while part of the pursuer's averments were relevant, the other part was not. Now, I am not satisfied that the whole case for the pursuer is not a relevant case. Presumably, although he does not say so, if the Lord Ordinary had been of this opinion, he would have allowed the case, which does not appear on the facts to be a complicated one, to go to a jury. Accordingly, I am in favour of recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and allowing the issue proposed, as to the form of which no objection was taken.

Expenses — Taxation — Counsels' Fees — Fees of Twenty-five and Eighteen Guineas Allowed for Senior and Junior Counsel Respectively for First Day of Proof, and Twenty and Fifteen Guineas for Remaining Days of Proof—Fees of Fifteen and Twelve Guineas Allowed to Senior and Junior Counsel Respectively for First Day of Hearing in Inner House, and Twelve and Ten Guineas for Subsequent Days.

Note of Objections to Auditor's Report.

In this case Goodwins, Jardine & Co. Ltd., in liquidation, and James Watson Stewart, C.A., Glasgow, the liquidator thereof, sued Charles Brand & Son, contractors, Glasgow, for £10,917, being the balance alleged to be due under a contract for the supply of girder work for the formation of portions of Glasgow Central Railway.

Proof lasting four days was led before Lord Dundas, and the hearing on the proof lasted two days. Lord Dundas issued findings leaving it to the parties to work out the amount due by the defenders to the pursuers.

The defenders reclaimed, and the Court, after a three days' hearing, decerned against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £7210, 8s. 10d., with expenses both in the Inner and Outer House, subject to deduction of one-fourth of the taxed amount thereof, as modification, and remitted to the Auditor to tax and to report.

The pursuers lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report of their account of expenses. The objections were (1) to a reduction of the fees of thirty guineas sent to senior counsel for each day of the proof to twenty guineas for the first day and fifteen guineas for each subsequent day; and to a reduction of the fees of twenty guineas sent to junior counsel for each day of the proof to fifteen guineas for the first day and twelve guineas for each subsequent. (2) To a reduction of the fees of fifteen and ten guineas sent to the senior and junior counsel respectively for each day of the hearing in the Outer House to twelve guineas and four guineas respectively for each day. (3) To a reduction of the fees of twenty guineas sent to senior counsel for each day of the hearing in the Inner House, to fees of fifteen guineas for the first day and twelve guineas for each subsequent day; and to a reduction of the fees of fifteen guineas sent to junior counsel for each day of the hearing in the Inner House to twelve guineas for the first day and ten guineas for each subsequent day.

On the Note of Objections appearing in the Single Bills the pursuers maintained that the fees as taxed by the Auditor were too small in view of the complexity of the case and the large amount at stake. In the case of Rees v. Henderson, 1902, 4 F. 813, a fee of twenty-five guineas was allowed for senior counsel. This was a jury trial, but there was no reason for drawing a distinction between fees in jury trials and in proofs (Shaw & Shaw and Others v. J. T. Boyd Ltd., 1907, 14 S.L.T. 880).

Argued for Defenders: The maximum fees allowed for proofs were twenty and fifteen guineas for senior counsel, and fifteen and twelve guineas for junior counsel, for the first and subsequent days of a proof respectively. No reason had been shewn why these fees should be exceeded in this case (Wilson v. North British Railway Co., 1873, 1 R. 304; Burrell and Son v. Russell and Co., 1900, 3 F. 12).

The Court sustained the pursuers' note of objections to the Auditor's report to the extent of allowing fees for senior counsel of twenty-five and twenty guineas for the first and subsequent days of the proof respectively, and of eighteen and fifteen guineas for junior counsel for the first and subsequent days of the proof respectively; and of allowing the fees paid of fifteen and ten guineas for each day of the hearing in the Outer House for senior and junior counsel respectively. The Court upheld the decision of the Auditor as to the fees in the Inner House.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the question raised in this note of objection, is as to fees to counsel. Taking the fees of senior counsel in the case I find that thirty guineas and twenty guineas were paid, and that twenty guineas and fifteen guineas have been allowed by the Auditor. Now, my Lords, I have nothing more to say than what I said in the case of Shaw v. Boyd, which was quoted to us. My observations in that case were concurred in by your Lordships. In the case of Shaw v. Boyd I indicated quite clearly that there were cases where what may be looked upon as a normal fee might fairly be exceeded. I said that I did so as a guidance for the Auditor in future. My Lords, I have no doubt this case which we have before us is a fortiori of Shaw v. Boyd. In this case your Lordships have the advantage of having heard the whole argument and read the proof, so that you are quite familiar with the circumstances of the case. The two considerations which I put before your lordships in Shaw v. Boyd for fixing what is a proper fee were first, the trouble involved in the preparation of the case, and, second, the amount at stake. The amount at stake here is very large, very much larger than in the case of

1st Div.

Goodwins, Jardine & Co. Ltd. v. Brand & Co.

The Lord President.

Shaw v. Boyd. Then as regards trouble in preparation, the trouble in preparation in this case must have been very considerable, because the case was complicated, and there was the necessity for anterior preparation in connection with a great many technical drawings. That being so, I think that the fee here ought to have been allowed on a larger scale than the ordinary one. Therefore I propose that the fees of the senior counsel should be twenty-five guineas for the first day and twenty guineas for the other days, and that the fees for junior counsel should be altered in the same proportion.

I. Trade Union—Trade Disputes Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 47) sect. 4 (1)—Action Raised Prior to Act Held Not to Be Excluded.

II. Statute—Trade Disputes Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 47)—Construction—Whether Retrospective.

The pursuers were shipbuilders in Port-Glasgow, and they raised this action for £300 damages against (1) The United Society of Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders, registered as a Trade Union in terms of the Trades Union Acts 1871 and 1876, and (2) John Sanderson, district delegate for Port-Glasgow, one of the districts into which under its constitution and rules the Society was divided.

On 2nd December 1905 all the fitters and platers in the employment of the pursuers left their work between the hours of 9.45 a.m. and 12.45 p.m. They were all members of the above Society. The ground of action was that the men committed a breach of their contract of employment, and that that breach was induced or procured by the defender Sanderson acting on behalf of the Society.

The defenders lodged separate defences, but both pleaded, inter alia:—

"1. The action is excluded by the Trade Disputes Act 1906.

"2. The averments of the pursuers are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to sustain the conclusions of the action."

The question of relevancy does not call for any report.

The following authorities were referred to on the question raised by the first plea in law:—

For Defenders: Reid and Others, Petitioners, 1863, 1 M. 774; Towler v. Chatterton, 1829, 6 Bingham 258; Hilliard v. Linard, 1829, 1 M. and M. 297; Ballinten v. Connor, 1852, 14 D. 927.

For Pursuers: Maxwell on Statutes, p. 321; Gardner v. Lucas, 1878, 3 App. Cas. 582; Knight v. Lees [1893], 1 Q.B. 41.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the first two pleas in law for each of the defenders, and allowed a proof.

Lord Salvesen [after dealing with the question of relevancy]. — The defenders further argued that, under sect. 4 (1) of the Trade Disputes Act 1906, 6 Edw. VII. cap. 47, the action is excluded. The section is in these terms: "An action against a trade union, whether of workmen or masters, or against any members or officials thereof, on behalf of themselves and all other members of the trade union, in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the trade union, shall not be entertained by any Court." In this case both the cause of action and the action itself occurred prior to the Act coming into operation, and the argument, therefore, involves that the Act is retrospective. I was referred to various cases, of which the case of Ballinten, 14 D. 927, is an example, in support of this proposition. That decision, however, related to a statute regulating procedure which was held to be applicable to existing suits in the absence of express reservation, and does not, in my opinion, apply where the effect of the statute if retrospective would be to take away a previously existing right of action. The rule in this matter was stated by Lord Blackburn in Gardner v. Lucas, 5 R. (H.L.) 117, where he pointed out that the presumption is that statutes are not retrospective unless this is expressed, or clearly implied, from the language used by the Legislature. The words founded on here, "An action shall not be entertained by any Court," do not, I think, imply that an action already competently in Court shall not be allowed to proceed to trial. A very similar question arose in the case of Knight v. Lee, L.R. 1 Q.B.D. 41, where Mr Justice Bruce said: "Here the plaintiff had a vested right of action required before the statute came into force; and it cannot be supposed that the statute was intended to take such a right away." The words in the statute then under construction which compare with the words I have to consider were these, "No action shall be brought or maintained," and appear to be rather more favourable to the contention that the Act operated retrospectively than those in the present case. I shall accordingly repel the first two pleas in law for each defender, and allow the parties a proof of their averments.—25th May 1907.

Ship—Collision—Mutual Fault—Limitation of Liability—Expenses—Claim By One Vessel in Petition By Second Vessel for Limitation of Liability — Both Ships to Blame—Petitioners Found Liable in Expenses of Claim.

Motion.

(Reported ante, Vol. XII. p. 812; and Vol. XIV. p. 316.)

In February 1903 a collision occurred between the "Olga" and the "Anglia." Cross-actions of damages were brought, and it was ultimately decided that both vessels were to blame. Thereafter a petition in the usual terms was presented by the owners of the "Olga" under sects. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 for limitation of liability, in which claims were lodged by the owners of the "Anglia" and by the owners of cargo on board the "Anglia."

A question arose between the claimants, which was tried and decided in the limitation proceedings. Decree was pronounced in terms of the prayer of the petition. The proceedings down to this stage are reported in 7 F. 739 and 8 F. (H.L.) 22, and in 12 S.L.T. 812 and 14 S.L.T. 316. Thereafter the claimants moved for the expenses of lodging their claims and relative procedure, and referred to these authorities: Burrell, 1877, 4 R. 1133; Carron Co., 1885, 13 R. 114; Marsden on Collisions, p. 161. The petitioners opposed the motion, and argued that the rule laid down in the cases cited did not apply to the case where both ships were to blame. Reference was made to Miller, 1875, 2 R. 976 at p. 979.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor: "Find the claimants [the owners of the "Anglia" and the cargo owners] entitled to the expenses of their respective claims and relative procedure in the limitation proceedings against the petitioners, the owners of the s.s. 'Olga.'"

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Whatever might have been our opinion if this question were now before us for the first time, I think the matter is practically settled by authority. In the case of the Carron Co., 1885, 13 R. 114, the Lord President observes that a party who has presented a petition for limitation of liability is bound to pay the expenses of the procedure, for the reason that the procedure is rendered necessary by the fact of the collision occasioned through his fault. In the present instance the collision was occasioned by the fault of the petitioner's vessel, and the fact that the "Anglia" was also to blame does not seem to me to matter at all in the question before us. The owners of the "Olga" appeal by petition under Act of Parliament in order to limit their liability, and to save themselves from actions which would be raised against them, and to which they would otherwise have had no defence. In such circumstances I think it is perfectly right that they should pay the expense of claims lodged in the petition.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur. I think this matter is settled by invariable practice, not only in Scotland, but also in England, where there are many more cases of this nature than in our Courts. Further, I think that the rule as laid down in these cases is founded on good sense and equity. The petition is presented by the ship, or one of the ships, which is to blame for a collision in order to get rid of full liability for damage. It is presented purely in the interest of the shipowner, who thereby escapes paying full damages and the expenses of many actions which might have been brought against him. I think that the fund to which liability has been limited should not be encroached upon by the expenses of the limitation petition, and that the petitioner should pay the expenses of the claimants in these proceedings, excluding, of course, all expenses caused by the competition between the various claimants, in which he has no interest and for which he has no responsibility.

Railway—Trespass—Question of Civil Right—Prosecution for Crossing Railway Otherwise than by Authorised Crossing—

2ND DIV. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Walmsley.

ALLEGATION OF RIGHT OF WAY—HELD NO QUESTION OF HERITABLE RIGHT INVOLVED—CALEDONIAN RAILWAY ACT 1898 (61 & 62 VICT. CAP. 188), SECT. 36.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by way of Stated Case against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Moffatt), in the Sheriff Court at Falkirk. The case was stated as follows:—

This is a case brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts 1864 and 1881 at the instance of the appellants against the respondent and John Gillespie, labourer, residing with James Gillespie at 68 Forth Street, Grangemouth, charging that on the 23rd March 1906 they did trespass upon the railway belonging to the appellants, in the parish of Grangemouth and county of Stirling, at a point about 396 yards or thereby to the south-west of Grangemouth Station, by being or passing upon the said railway, and not for the purpose of crossing the same at a level-crossing thereof, contrary to the 36th section of the Caledonian Railway Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. cap. 188).

The case was tried before me of this date (1st May 1906). It was stated in limine for the respondent that he, as one of the public, claimed a right to cross the railway at the place in question by virtue of the existence of a public right of way for foot-passengers. The appellants denied that there was any public right of way, and stated further that they were prepared to prove that the respondent and Gillespie did not follow the line of the right of way claimed.

The respondents claimed that the complaint should be dismissed, in respect that a substantial question of civil right was involved. I intimated that I could not at that stage determine whether there was a substantial question of civil right, and that the case must go to trial. Evidence was accordingly adduced in support of the complaint, and also for the respondents.

The facts proved in evidence were as follows:—

The respondent is employed in Messrs Brownlee's saw mills, which adjoin the railway on the west, and were opened about a year ago. There is another saw mill on the west of the railway belonging to Messrs Muirhead, opened three or four years ago. On the date libelled the respondent the said John Gillespie, and twenty or thirty other workmen from these mills, left the mills at 9 a.m. to go home for breakfast. They live in the new town of Grangemouth, on the east side of the railway, and to cross the railway was a much shorter way home than round by the public road. On leaving the mills the men got on to the bank of a timber pond on which there is a foot-path which the appellants allege is their private property, but which the respondents allege is part of a public right of way used by the public from time immemorial and before the railway entered Grangemouth. The men then got on to a piece of waste ground by the side of the railway without crossing any fence, passing through a space about five feet wide between Messrs Brownlee's fence and the corner of a garden belonging to the appellants. The railway at this point now consists of the Grangemouth branch line and eight railways sidings in all. The railway was begun in 1858, and at first consisted of a single line only.

When the men were in the act of crossing the railway they were challenged by two railway servants who had been stationed there for the purpose. The respondent and Gillespie were stopped by the two railway servants and asked their names and addresses, which were given. The rest of the twenty or thirty men turned back, but the respondent and Gillespie proceeded and crossed the railway. To get off the railway ground they had to climb over a close sleeper fence fully six feet high, in which iron spikes had been driven in to assist persons climbing over said fence at the part where it is alleged the said right of way exists. By whom the spikes had been driven in did not appear.

The respondent adhered substantially, though not quite exactly, to the line of the alleged right of way.

Gillespie kept further north, and deviated substantially from the alleged right of way.

There is no level-crossing at or near the place in question, and there has been none since 1882. The notices warning against trespassing were duly exhibited at the nearest station and the nearest level-crossing, in terms of said 36th section of the Caledonian Railway Act 1898. A similar notice was also exhibited at the place the respondent crossed. Prior to the year 1882 there was a level-crossing at the place in question, with gates for the roadway and wicket gates at the side for foot passengers. The appellants alleged that this was a private level-crossing for the use of the farm tenant who at that time had ground on both sides of the railway. The respondent admitted that as regards the roadway for carts, etc., the crossing was private, but alleged that a public right of way for foot passengers coincided with the tenant's crossing, and that the wicket gates were for the public as well as for the tenant.

From 1882 onwards members of the public occasionally crossed the railway at the point in question, in the belief that there existed an ancient public right of way dating from a time anterior to the formation of the railway, and leading from the old town of Grangemouth to Polmont Church.

The question whether there really exists a right of way was not fully gone into, but I am satisfied that the contention was put forward in bona fide and was not frivolous or without some probable grounds.

As the respondent had adhered substantially to the line of the alleged right of way, and as the question whether there was a right of way or not could not be tried under the present proceedings, I dismissed the case against the respondent. As Gillespie had deviated from the alleged right of way, I convicted him and dismissed him with an admonition.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was:—

> In the circumstances, ought the respondent to have been convicted of the contravention charged, notwithstanding his allegation of a right of way?

Argued for the Appellants (Caledonian Railway Co.): No question of heritable right was involved in the case, and the respondent should have been convicted. "Trespassing on a railway" was a statutory offence, and was defined in the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, sect. 23, as "being or passing upon any railway except for the purpose of crossing the same at any authorised crossing": cf. Regulation of Railways Act 1840, sect. 16; Caledonian Railway Act 1898, sect. 36. The only question which the Sheriff had to consider was whether or not there was a level-crossing at the point in question, and if there were not, a conviction should have followed (Scott, 1887, 14 R.J. 45; Dalrymple, 1886, 13 R.J. 34). If the respondent desired to raise the question of right of way, he should have proceeded by an application to the Sheriff under sect. 54 of the Railways Clauses Act 1845.

Argued for the Respondent: Where a civil right is maintained by the respondent to a criminal complaint, the case should be dismissed and the parties left to determine the question in a competent process (Barlas, 1876, 3 R.J. 26; Cole, 1888, 57 L.J. (Mag. Cas.) 132. Until the question of right of way was determined, it was impossible to say whether or not the respondent was guilty of trespassing (Hay's Trs., 1877, 4 R. 398; Dalrymple, cit supra). It was the duty of the railway company to provide proper crossings where a right of way crossed the railway (Railways Clauses Act, 1845, sects. 39 to 54; Dartmouth Railway [1896], 2 Q.B. 74).

The Court answered the question of law in the affirmative.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—In my opinion, the question put in this stated case should be answered in the affirmative. It is undoubtedly a well-established doctrine that where a criminal proceeding involves the decision of a question of civil right, a Court ought not to determine the former till the latter has been answered by a competent Court. But in this case it does not appear to me that that doctrine has any application. A railway company, when it is empowered to make a line for traffic, must at all places where roads cross the line provide bridges or level-crossings, according to its undertaking under its application to Parliament. On the other hand, it is vested with a power to have trespassers on its line dealt with penally by fine, in a way not open to the ordinary owner of property. This power is given in view of the public safety, there being necessarily public danger, if persons go on to the line at places other than those where provision is made for crossing. If persons claim a right to cross at places where such provision is not made, they must take civil steps to have a crossing provided, which they can only do by proving their right. If they trespass on the line by climbing over fences, they cannot claim immunity from the statutory penalties, if they thus take the law into their own hands. They are trespassing if they are not crossing at a place provided for that purpose.

In this case there had been no crossing place since the year 1882. The railway company had possessed their line without a crossing during all that time. Recently persons have been crossing, and climbing over the fence, which is what the clause of the statute was intended to prevent. The magistrate had one question, and one question only, before him, "Did the accused cross the line at a place where in fact there was no crossing?" In my opinion he should, on the facts stated, have answered that question in the affirmative, and pronounced a conviction. Whether by proper legal proceedings anyone can prove that the Company are bound to provide a safe crossing, is a totally different question. The case before him did not, in my opinion, involve the decision of any question of civil right. No such matter could be raised in the proceedings on the complaint before him.

Lord Low.—If in order to decide whether the respondent Walmsley had or had not been guilty of trespassing upon the appellants' railway within the meaning of the 36th section of the Caledonian Railway Act 1898, it had been necessary to determine a question of heritable right, I have no doubt that the Sheriff-Substitute would have been justified in dismissing the complaint.

In my opinion, however, no such question required to be determined, because although the respondent maintained, upon what the Sheriff-Substitute has found to be "some probable grounds," that there is a public right of way across the line at the place where he crossed it, I think that the respondent was nevertheless trespassing upon the line within the meaning of the section.

By the Railway Acts a railway company is bound, when it constructs its line, to make provision, by means of bridges or level crossings, for carrying all public roads of every description across the line, so that they may be available for the public use as freely and fully as before the construction of the railway. If, therefore, a railway company fulfils its obligations no one has a right to cross the line except at one of the crossing places provided by the Company. That, of course, is the consequence at common law of the fulfilment by the Company of its statutory obligations; but from considerations of public safety the Legislature has, in addition to the rights of the railway company at common law, made trespassing upon a railway, in spite of warning, an offence punishable by fine. In the public statutes enactments to that effect will be found in the Regulation of Railways Act 1840, sect. 16, and in the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, sect. 23. Similar provisions are commonly inserted in the private Acts of railway companies, and the enactment upon which the complaint in the present case proceeds, is, as I have indicated, the 36th section of the Private Act of the Caledonian Railway Company of 1898.

2nd Div.

Caledonian Railway Co. v. Walmsley.

Lord Low.

By that section it is provided that "any person who shall trespass upon any of the railways, stations, works, lands and property belonging to or worked by the Company, shall, without having received any personal or other warning than as hereinafter mentioned, forfeit and pay by way of penalty any sum not exceeding forty shillings." It is then provided that notices affixed to notice boards shall be sufficient warning, and "that no person lawfully crossing the railway at any level-crossing thereof shall be liable to any such penalty as aforesaid."

The argument for the respondent was that if, as he alleged upon probable grounds, there existed a public right of way across the line which he, as a member of the public, was using, he could not be said to be trespassing upon the line, because he was there in the exercise of a right. Therefore, as the question whether the respondent had or had not committed an offence within the meaning of the section depended upon whether or not the alleged right of way existed, the Sheriff-Substitute was right in dismissing the complaint.

There is, no doubt, considerable force in that argument, but I am satisfied that it is not well founded. In construing the word "trespass" in the section, it seems to me that regard must be had to the subject-matter and purpose of the enactment. It is founded upon considerations of public safety; it recognises that a railway is a dangerous place; and that for persons to cross or stray upon a railway, except in the proper use of a level-crossing, is dangerous, not only to themselves, but to the travelling public. Accordingly the Legislature has enacted, in the public interest, that a person trespassing upon a railway shall, in addition to any civil remedy which may be put in force against him, be liable in a penalty if the trespass takes place after warning has been given. It is plain that the object of the enactment would to some extent be defeated if it were a good answer to a complaint that the person who had crossed the railway in spite of warning, was able to maintain upon "some probable grounds" that he was following the line of an old right of way. It seems to me that the remedy which such a person has is to take the necessary steps to have the right of way which he alleges declared, and the railway company compelled to make a crossing. He is not entitled to take the law into his own hands and force his way across the line. If he does so he is, in my judgment, guilty of a trespass within the meaning of the Act.

I have already pointed out that it is the statutory duty of a railway company to carry any public road, including rights of way, across their line, and therefore it seems to me that where there is no crossing provided there is a presumption that there is no right of way—a presumption strong enough at all events to lay the onus of establishing that there is a right of way upon the party alleging it. I do not think that that proposition could be seriously disputed, but it might be said that although the railway company might be entitled to have the status quo maintained by interdicting the party claiming a right of way from crossing the line until the existence of the right had been established in an appropriate process, they would not be entitled to attain that end by quasi-criminal proceedings under which a person who in fact had a right to cross the railway might be subjected to a penalty as a trespasser. That is a consideration which might have considerable weight if it were not that the matter is one concerning the public safety. For the safety of the public the Legislature considered it necessary to enact that anyone crossing a railway should be liable to a fine, provided (1) that he had been duly warned; and (2) that he had crossed the railway otherwise than by a level-crossing. It seems to me that unless a person against whom a complaint is brought can bring himself within one or other of these exceptions, he must be held to have committed the statutory offence. If that view be sound, it follows that the respondent ought to have been convicted.

I have only to add that there seems to me to be nothing in the special circumstances of this case which would justify the Court in treating it as exceptional. The railway was constructed in 1858, and then a level-crossing, for carriage traffic as well as foot-passengers, was made at the place in question. That level-crossing was, however, discontinued and shut up in 1882. The fact that there was once a level-crossing may perhaps lend some probability to the respondent's contention that there was a right of way at the place in question, but I do not think that it affects the present case. There has been no level-crossing for more than five and twenty years, and accordingly it seems to me that the onus of proving that there is a right of way and that there ought to be a level-crossing is just as much upon the person maintaining that view as if there had never been a crossing at all. In saying that, however, I do not mean to indicate an opinion that it would have made any difference if the level-crossing had been shut up de recenti.

Further, I may observe, although perhaps it has no direct bearing upon the present question, that by the Local Government Act 1894, the duty of protecting and keeping open rights of way is laid upon the District Committee, or, where there is no District Committee, upon the County Council; and if a Parish Council or six parish electors represent to the District Committee or the County Council, as the case may be, that a right of way has been shut up or obstructed, the Committee or the Council are bound, if they are satisfied that the representation is well founded, to take such proceedings as may be required with the right of way. I mention that circumstance, because it shows that the view which I take of the case does not involve what might be regarded as a hardship. The respondent and other workmen in a like position are not placed in the dilemma of having either to lose the use of a right of way which would be a great convenience to them, or to embark upon an expensive litigation to vindicate the right.

I am therefore of opinion that the question submitted to the Court should be answered in the affirmative.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

(Lords M'Laren, Kinnear and Pearson.)

58. M'Lean v. Skinner.

Justiciary Cases—Evidence—Evidence of Previous Conviction—Charge of Contravention of Poor Law (Scotland) Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. cap. 83), sect. 80—No Charge of Previous Conviction—Evidence Allowed of Previous Conviction of Contravention of Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act 1904 (4 Edw. VII. cap. 15), sect. 1—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. cap. 35), sects. 67, 71—Conviction Suspended.

Bill of Suspension.

This was a bill of suspension of a conviction obtained against the suspender in the Sheriff Court at Oban, on a complaint charging—

That Hector M'Lean, fisherman, Oban, has, at his dwelling-house in Oban, in the parish of Kilmore and Kilbride, and from or about, and since, the Thirteenth day of November Nineteen hundred and six years, deserted, neglected, or failed to maintain Annie M'Lean, aged thirteen years, and Katie M'Lean, aged eleven years, and Hector M'Lean, aged ten years, and Arthur M'Lean, aged five years, and Alexander M'Lean, aged three years, and John M'Lean, aged seven years, his children, he being able so to do, whereby his said children have become chargeable to the said parish of Kilmore and Kilbride, contrary to sect. 80 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. cap. 83).

The grounds of suspension were set forth, inter alia, as follows:—

Stat. 1. The complainer is a fisherman or sailor. His wife died about two years ago, leaving him with six young children, who since March 1906 have been in the charge of the local authorities. He was, on or about 20th February 1907, charged before the Sheriff of the County of Argyll, at the instance of the respondent, with a contravention of sect. 80 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. cap. 83), in respect that he had, at his dwelling-house in Oban, in the parish of Kilmore and Kilbride, and from or about and since the 13th day of November 1906, deserted, neglected, or failed to maintain his children therein named, he being able so to do, whereby they had become chargeable to said parish, and on 22nd February 1907 he pleaded not guilty.

Ans. 1. Admitted. Explained that the complainer failed to maintain his said children on and after 13th November 1906, and that said desertion and failure was continuous. . . .

Stat. 2. The complainer was, on 23rd February 1907, tried by the Sheriff-Substitute of Argyll at Oban on said complaint. . . .

Ans. 2. . . . .

Stat. 4. As part of the proof for the prosecution, and before the evidence in defence was taken, the respondent tendered Malcolm MacArthur, sergeant of police, Oban, as a witness to prove a conviction, of date 6th March 1906, under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act 1904, sect. 1. Said conviction was not, and could not, have been libelled in the complaint, either substantively or as an aggravation. The complainer's agent objected to the evidence tendered. In face of the objection the Sheriff-Substitute allowed the evidence, which the witness then gave by reading an entry from a police register. No extract of said conviction was produced, nor was the register lodged and noted as a production. After the close of the proof, and in his address to the Court prior to conviction, the respondent's agent emphasised the previous conviction as a presumption of guilt. Such evidence and comment were irregular and illegal, and contrary to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887, sects. 63 to 67 inclusive, and sect. 71 thereof, and sect. 24 of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act 1864.

Ans. 4. Denied that the respondent's said agent emphasised the previous conviction as a presumption of guilt. The admissibility of the said evidence was duly considered by the Sheriff-Substitute, who was the judge when the complainer was convicted on 6th March 1906, and who allowed the said evidence to be led quantum valeat. The said Acts are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. Quoad ultra, admitted.

Stat. 6. After hearing evidence and argument for both parties, the Sheriff-Substitute found the complainer guilty of the offence libelled, on the ground that he was able-bodied, though it was proved that he was unable to obtain employment and was earning nothing, and sentenced him to pay a fine of £3 or to suffer thirty days' imprisonment.

Ans. 6. Denied that it was proved that the complainer was unable to obtain employment and was earning nothing. Quoad ultra, admitted. . . .

The Suspender pleaded, inter alia—

"The conviction is null and void in respect: (1) that incompetent and illegal evidence of an alleged previous conviction was admitted and used against accused, and (2) that the police register was not lodged and noted on record as a production."

Argued for Suspender: It was incompetent to prove a conviction for a different offence under a different statute as an aggravation of what was charged. The Court must presume that such evidence influenced the mind of the Sheriff-Substitute, and the extent to which it influenced him could not be determined. In any event, evidence of previous conviction cannot be given unless the previous conviction is libelled, and it was not libelled here (Dickson on Evidence, sect. 15; Burns v. Hart, 1856, 2 Irv. 571).

High Court of Justiciary

M'Lean v. Skinner.

Argued for Respondent: The evidence was competent, as the offence to which the previous conviction related was of a similar character to that charged in the present case. In any case the Sheriff-Substitute was not misled, because the previous conviction was also obtained before him, and he must have been aware of it.

The Court suspended the conviction and sentence.

Lord M'Laren.—This is a process of suspension of a conviction obtained before the Sheriff-Substitute of Argyllshire at Oban under the 80th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1845. The complaint sets forth that from and since the 13th day of November 1906, Hector M'Lean, fisherman, Oban, had deserted his three children therein named, whereby his children had become chargeable to the parish of Kilmore and Kilbride, contrary to the statute.

Various objections to the conviction were argued, but in the view which your Lordships have taken of the case, it is only necessary that I should deal with one of the grounds of suspension, viz., that which is the subject of the second plea in law.

The plea sets forth (1) that incompetent and illegal evidence of an alleged previous conviction was admitted and used against the accused, and (2) that the police register was not lodged and noted on record as a production. These, I think, are to be considered rather as alternative ways of stating the objection to the evidence. The thing complained of in the Bill is that the Sheriff-Substitute improperly admitted evidence to prove a previous conviction of the accused for contravention of the 1st section of the Cruelty to Children Act 1904. The record of the conviction names and designs the witnesses who were examined in support of the complaint; and to the entry, Malcolm MacArthur, sergeant of police, Oban, is appended this note: "Objection by Mr Stewart that no previous conviction libelled; objection repelled." I read the plea as meaning, either that evidence of a previous conviction of the accused was inadmissible, or that if it was admissible then it was improperly admitted because the police register, which touches the conviction, ought to have been noted. Now it is perfectly clear that the Sheriff-Substitute admitted the evidence of Sergeant MacArthur, because he notes that the objection to this evidence was repelled, and it is of no consequence whether we are to treat the police register as having been admitted or not, because it is not disputed that Sergeant MacArthur was called to prove a conviction under the Cruelty to Children Act 1904, and the only question is whether evidence of such a conviction was admissible.

It was not a conviction of the same offence for which M'Lean was on his trial, because a man may be liable to conviction under the 80th section of the Poor Law Act without being guilty of cruelty or of any act tending to endanger life. It follows that the conviction under the Cruelty to Children Act was not an aggravation (in the legal sense) of the offence of desertion of children. Neither was the conviction competent evidence for proving guilty intention. I do not say that evidence of the fact of cruel conduct to the children would not be relevant to prove that the case was one of wilful desertion. But the cruelty in the case supposed must be proved by the evidence of eyewitnesses, and not by the production of a conviction in a previous process.

In this, as in almost all cases on admission or rejection of evidence, the question arises, What is the bearing of the erroneous ruling on the conviction?

I can imagine a case where a question was improperly allowed, or a document received in evidence, neither of which could have had any prejudicial effect on the case of the accused person. When evidence has been admitted we can always (if the parties are not agreed) find out what it was in substance and effect, and if the evidence turns out to be quite innocuous, the conviction may be allowed to stand. But in the present case the evidence, although inadmissible in the form in which it was offered, was not irrelevant to the subject-matter of the complaint; because if the Sheriff held it proved that the accused had been cruel to his children, he might the more readily infer that the subsequent desertion of these children was not due to poverty, but was the result of wilful neglect. We do not know what weight the Sheriff-Substitute gave to the previous conviction, but in my opinion there was such a connection between the two things that the admission of the conviction, or of evidence of the conviction, was calculated to affect the decision of the case, and I accordingly move your Lordships that the conviction be suspended on this ground.

I shall say nothing regarding the other grounds of suspension, except that I think there is more ingenuity than substance in them.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree. We heard a great many objections to this conviction, most of which were very unsubstantial, while others might require some consideration, were it not that the ground on which your Lordship proposes to proceed is sufficient for the decision of the case.

The Sheriff-Substitute has undoubtedly admitted incompetent evidence, and therefore the only question is whether or not that improper evidence may have had any effect in determining the judgment. Now it appears to me a conclusive answer to that question that the admission of the evidence was objected to, and the objection was repelled by the Sheriff-Substitute. It follows that in his judgment it was both competent and relevant, and therefore he was bound to take it into account in coming to a decision. But since it was wrong to give it any weight whatever, and we cannot know the effect which it had on his mind, the conviction ought to be quashed.

Lord Pearson.—I am of the same opinion. Whatever may be said as to the other matters argued, the objection dealt with by your Lordship stands out clearly as raising a question of vital importance. This was a prosecution under sect. 80 of the Poor Law Act. A witness was tendered to prove, and I assume did prove, a prior conviction of an offence under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act 1904, notwithstanding an objection on the part of the complainer. That seems to me to have been entirely incompetent. The only explanation given by the respondent is that the admission of this evidence was duly considered by the Sheriff-Substitute, who "allowed the said evidence to be led quantum valeat," but, for anything we know, it may have led directly to the conviction. I therefore think the case falls within the rule as to the admission of incompetent evidence.—13*th June* 1907.

Dryden & Others v. M'Gibbon. M'Gibbon v. Dryden.

The first of these two actions was raised at the instance of the heirs in mobilibus of the deceased Mrs M'Gibbon against her husband, to vindicate their right to certain property which they alleged to belong to Mrs M'Gibbon's estate, as earnings of a business carried on by her from which her husband's jus mariti and right of administration were excluded. The second action was raised at the instance of Mr M'Gibbon against his wife's heir at law to recover a house on the ground that it was a donatio inter virum et uxorem which had been revoked by him.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) and Lord Ardwall infra.

On 27th June 1906 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender in the first action, and pronounced decree in favour of the pursuer in the second action.

He delivered the following Opinion:—

Lord Dundas.—This action was raised on 14th November 1905 by the next of kin of the deceased Mrs Mary Jane Dryden or M'Gibbon, and the compearing defender was her husband, the now deceased John M'Gibbon. The conclusions are for reduction of a discharge and renunciation by the pursuers in favour of the defender, which has been reduced, of consent, by my interlocutor of 30th January 1906; and also for count, reckoning and payment in respect of the defender's intromissions, as his wife's executor, with her moveable estate.

I have also to dispose now of an action which was raised on 15th December 1905 by the said John M'Gibbon, and which is insisted in by his brother and heir at law, against Peter Dryden, the heir at law of his sister the said Mrs M'Gibbon. The history of the two cases arises out of the same facts, and the proof which has been led is applicable to both actions. The difficulty, as regards the matter of evidence, is greatly increased by the fact that both Mr and Mrs M'Gibbon are now dead. The story is a somewhat tangled one, but I shall endeavour to recapitulate succinctly the material facts to which it is necessary to advert.

John M'Gibbon and his wife were married on 28th November 1890. Prior to the marriage, Mrs M'Gibbon had earned about ten or twelve shillings a week, but at its date she had no saved earnings. She had, however, some furniture in a small house in Drummond Street where she had resided, and where the spouses lived together after the marriage till Whitsunday 1891. The husband was a compositor, earning wages of not less than £2 per week. At Whitsunday 1891 the M'Gibbons removed to a house of three rooms and a kitchen in St Mary Street, where they took in lodgers. There is some evidence to show that Mrs M'Gibbon there acquired a certain amount of additional furniture from one of her lodgers. In November 1894 the couple became tenants at 142 High Street of two rooms and a kitchen; there was no written lease or missives of lease; the let was arranged by Mrs M'Gibbon with the factor, Mr Clephane, who says that he looked to her for the rent; but the husband's name was put in the Valuation Roll—upon the wife's instruction, as Mr Clephane depones—in order that the vote in respect of the premises should not be lost. At Whitsunday 1895 the tenancy became extended to the whole of the flat, at a rent of £26 per annum. This flat had formerly been used as a temperance hotel, and the business was revived at and from Whitsunday 1895. It is clear upon the evidence that Mrs M'Gibbon did in fact manage this business throughout, with slight (if any) practical assistance by her husband, he being engaged in his business upon the night shift, and not available for work during the day. The business was from the first successful, upon a modest scale, and continued to be so, at all events until the end of 1903. It appears that Mrs M'Gibbon, who died on 24th December 1904, had fallen into a habit of excessive drinking for some time prior to her death. The receipts for rent were granted in name of the husband. Such accounts as are produced, rendered by tradesmen and others, are in his name. His name also appeared upon a brass plate on the door of the premises; the plate had been brought from the house in St Mary Street. Upon the street side of the building the words "M'Gibbon's Temperance Hotel," or "Temperance Hotel," were painted. The pursuers produce, and found upon, a business card, No. 38 of process, on which the words "proprietrix, Mrs M'Gibbon," occur, and about which some of the witnesses give evidence more or less vague. It appears that there was also a card, of which No. 73 of process is a type, upon which these words do not occur, but only "M'Gibbon's (late Fuller's) Commercial and Temperance Hotel." It is not, I think, clear whether or not cards such as No. 73 were in existence or use contemporaneously with those of which No. 38 is an example. In the Edinburgh Directories from 1896–97 onwards Mr M'Gibbon's name is in the list of hotelkeepers. A fire policy of insurance over the flat (No. 26 of process), dated 21st January 1897, is in the wife's name. A fire policy of insurance over furniture (No. 54 of process), originally taken out in Mr M'Gibbon's name, was in June 1900 transferred to that of his wife.

In January 1897 an important event occurred, viz., the purchase of the flat at 142 High Street. It seems clear that this transaction was wholly carried out by Mrs M'Gibbon—both with the factor of the proprietor, Mr Clephane, and with the lawyer, Mr Wakelin. The destination in the disposition (No. 6 of process) gives in effect a liferent to Mr M'Gibbon on his wife's death, and the fee to his wife. I think that it is unfortunate that Mr M'Gibbon's own views were not ascertained at the time. But it seems that he signed the deed without demur, a fact strongly founded upon by the pursuers, and also by the defender in the second action, to which I have made reference. At the time of the purchase, additional furniture appears to have been bought, which must, I think, have been paid for out of the profits of the hotel business. The price of the premises was £475. A bond for £200 over them was obtained, which was signed by both Mr and Mrs M'Gibbon. It appears that at this time there were two bank accounts, and two only, in the name of the spouses, or either of them. Copies of these are Nos. 28 and 29 of process respectively. Both were with the Savings Bank. No. 28 was in name of the wife, and was headed "Own earnings." No. 29 was in the joint names of the husband and wife. I should say here that it is, in my opinion, clearly proved, by witnesses upon both sides of the case, that Mr M'Gibbon was in the habit, during the entire period of the spouses' residence in High Street, of handing over to his wife substantially the whole of his wages weekly. These she kept, along with the profits of the business, so far as not banked, in a locked box in a locked room in the house. As one of the witnesses tersely phrases it, "She was the bank." One must now see how the balance of the purchase price, £275, was paid, and how the sum in the bond, £200, was paid off. As regards the first of these, it is pretty clear that the money was paid by Mrs M'Gibbon, to the extent of £80 from the account No. 28 of process, and to the extent of £57, 10s. 1d. from the account No. 29 of process, making together the sum of £137, 10s. 1d.; and that the balance, viz., £137, 9s. 11d., was paid by her in cash. This cash must, in my opinion, be held to have come from the cash-box above-mentioned, in which it is proved that Mrs M'Gibbon was in the habit of keeping very considerable sums of money. There is no other feasible suggestion of a source from which the sum can have been raised. If this is the correct view, then I take it that this cash balance was paid out of the profits of the hotel business and the wages of the husband. The £200 due under the bond appears to have been paid by three instalments, viz.—(1) On 10th May 1899, a payment of £50. This, to the extent of £25, came apparently from account No. 29 of process. The balance was paid in cash, presumably from the cash-box. (2) On 14th May 1900, a payment of £50. The source from which this money came is not, I think, clearly proved. (3) On 1st July 1902, a payment of £100. This sum apparently came, to the extent of £93, 5s. 2d., from account No. 29 of process, and the small balance was paid in cash. In June 1900 the account No. 28 of process was exhausted and ended, by the withdrawal of its then existing balance of £192, 15s. 7d. At the same time there began a series of deposit receipts with the Royal Bank of Scotland (Hunter Square Branch), which (as shewn in No. 30 of process) rose steadily from £350 as at 22nd June 1900 up to £750 as at 29th December 1903. These deposit receipts stood in name of Mrs M'Gibbon, and at her death on 24th December 1904 the amount at credit was £744, 17s. 6d.

In these circumstances the pursuers aver "that the said flat was purchased, and the said bond paid, by the deceased Mrs Mary Jane Dryden or M'Gibbon with her own money, and that the sums placed on deposit receipt with the Royal Bank of Scotland were also her own money. Said money was earned by her before marriage, or in the said hotel business." In my opinion, the pursuers' case fails entirely. It is, I think, established by the evidence that Mrs M'Gibbon had, at the date of her marriage, no saved earnings. As regards the hotel business, the case seems to me equally to fail. After Mrs M'Gibbon's death an inventory (No. 7 of process) of her estate was prepared in Mr Wakelin's office, and given in for the husband's confirmation as her executor. That inventory contained the sum in deposit receipt, but appended was a "Note.—This money is claimed by the husband of the deceased as forming the joint savings of himself and his wife, or otherwise as money belonging to himself." It appears that Mr M'Gibbon had made statements to Mr Wakelin, and to those in his office, that he considered the money to be his own, as coming from the hotel business, which was in fact largely contributed to by his own earnings. The note was worded in cautious terms. But later on—after a more definite investigation into the facts—a corrective inventory (No. 9 of process) was lodged, omitting the money upon deposit receipt; and the duty which had been paid in respect thereof was recovered by Mr Wakelin from the Inland Revenue authorities. Mr M'Gibbon appears to me to have been singularly careless about his money matters, whether from exuberant trust and confidence in his wife as their manager, or from some other cause or causes. It seems that he was aware that there was at her death money on deposit receipt, but that he was quite ignorant as to its amount. The pursuers' argument was, briefly stated, to the following effect. The deposited money, they said, belonged wholly to the wife, because it was made by her out of the profits of the hotel business; and that business was a separate business belonging to her. This last fact, it was urged, was evidenced by her sole management of the hotel, coupled with the terms of the disposition (No. 6 of process) and of the bond (No. 24 of process). The pursuers relied also upon certain very vague statements said to have been made by Mrs M'Gibbon to some of the witnesses; upon the card No. 38 of process; and some other small items of evidence. Now, I think that the pursuers have entirely failed to prove the crucial fact upon which their argument depends, viz., that the business belonged to Mrs M'Gibbon. The presumption, in my opinion, where a wife lives in a house with her husband, and is the active manager of a business carried on there, is that she is managing it as the agent of her husband. The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act 1877, sect. 3, protects, as against her husband, the wages or earnings of a married woman gained by her "in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or in any business which she carries on under her own name." It has been decided, to quote the words of Lord President Robertson in M'Ginty v. M'Alpine, 1892, 19 R. 935, 939, that, in order to come under that section, "the wife must have some other 'employer' than the husband, or the 'occupation or trade' must not be simply the occupation or trade of her husband, if it is to yield 'earnings' in the sense of the section." It seems clear that Mrs M'Gibbon had no employer other than her husband; nor do I think that it can be successfully maintained that she carried on the hotel business under her own name within the meaning of the Act. I have referred to the evidence upon this matter; and I again emphasise the fact that the husband's wages were substantially contributed to the business of the hotel. The pursuers' case, then, as regards the money upon deposit receipt, appears to me to fail. Their strongest point lies in the fact that, under the title, the wife was fiar of the house. But that fact is not conclusive, and is not per se sufficient to outweigh the presumption of her agency in the conduct of the business. This topic, which is important in the first action, enters vitally into the subject-matter of the second case, and may appropriately be here exhausted. There is no evidence to shew with what idea, or with what knowledge, Mr M'Gibbon signed the disposition. It appears that he was much surprised when he was informed by the lawyers, after his wife's death, that he was not in a position to sell the house. When they so informed him, he was already in Court as defender in the first action. As pursuer in the second action, he took up the position that the premises were purchased with his money, and that the destination in the title was of the nature of a gift by him to his wife, which he was entitled to revoke, and which he bore to revoke by deed of revocation dated 5th December 1905. I am satisfied, for the reasons above expressed, that the premises were purchased and the bond paid off with the husband's money; and I can see nothing which should prevent him, if the facts of the matter are as I have related them, from validly revoking the gift—unless indeed it was donatio remuneratoria, a view with which I shall deal immediately. The pursuer's counsel insisted that Mr M'Gibbon's word is unreliable. It seems to be the case that he wrote and spoke falsely and deceitfully in connection with the discharge which he obtained from the pursuers, and which has since been reduced of consent. But that does not seem to me to alter or affect the fact that he did revoke the gift. Nor do I think that the facts bring this case within the region of a remuneratory, and therefore irrevocable, donation. There is no evidence at all that he intended it to be so. The presumption, and such evidence as there is, lie in the opposite direction.

The result of the whole matter is, in my opinion, that in the first action the defender is entitled to absolvitor; and that in the second action I ought to find, declare, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the Summons

Mr Dryden (pursuer in the first action, and defender in the second) reclaimed.

The contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of Lord Ardwall infra. In addition to the authorities commented on by him, the following were referred to: Ferguson's Trs., 1883, 11 R. 261 at p. 266; Galloway, 1861, 4 Macq. 267; Loudoun, 1856, 19 D. 140; Married Women's Property Act 1881, sect. 1 (b). Sect. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act 1877 is cited in Lord Ardwall's opinion.

The Court adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against in both actions.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—If the purpose of the Married Women's Property Act was, as I am satisfied it was, to protect to the wife the proceeds of business conducted by herself, and on her own credit, unassociated with her husband, then in this case I have no hesitation in holding that the decision of the Lord Ordinary in regard to the business of keeping lodgers, followed by temperance hotel keeping carried on by the late Mrs M'Gibbon, is right. When that business was begun, there were no funds by which the outlays required for it could be met, except the £2 or £2 5s. a week which were the earnings of the husband by his own labour. These, his wages, with the exception of trifling sums in the character of pocket money, passed into the wife's hands, and were in no way kept distinct, but went into the hotel business, without any distinction being made between them or funds, if any, provided by the wife. For proof that she did provide any I look in vain in these proceedings. The circumstances founded on in support of this contention certainly do not bear it out, and the other circumstances pointed out by the Lord Ordinary substantially negative it. That Mrs M'Gibbon managed the business does not appear at all to affect the question. A woman living with her husband and managing a business into which only his money is put, is presumably his manager, and is not in right of the business she is managing. The Act excludes the case of a woman employed by her husband, and not carrying on a business under her own name. In this case I hold that Mrs M'Gibbon was in that category.

2nd Div.

Dryden & Others v. M'Gibbon. M'Gibbon v. Dryden.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

The fact that the title to the house was taken in Mrs M'Gibbon's name is not conclusive, and I see no ground for holding that the gift was a donatio remuneratoria, and hold that it was revocable.

I do not enter into detail, being satisfied with the grounds for the opinion I have expressed, as they are given in the opinion of Lord Ardwall, which I have had an opportunity of perusing.

Lord Ardwall.—The two actions which have been brought under review of the Court on reclaiming notes against the interlocutors of Lord Dundas (Ordinary), arise out of disputes between the representatives of the deceased Mrs. Mary Jane Dryden or M'Gibbon on the one hand and the representatives of her husband, the now deceased John M'Gibbon, on the other.

The first action, which is at the instance of the heirs in mobilibus of Mrs M'Gibbon, who died intestate without issue on 24th December 1904, concludes, in the first place, for reduction of a pretended discharge and renunciation granted by them in favour of the said John M'Gibbon. Decree was pronounced in terms of that conclusion by the Lord Ordinary on 30th January 1906, in terms of a Minute for the defender. The remaining conclusions of the Summons are for count, reckoning and payment against the said John M'Gibbon as executor of his wife, in order that the balance due by him to the pursuers as her heirs in mobilibus may appear and be ascertained, and payment thereof made to them.

John M'Gibbon having died on 30th January 1906, his executor, George M'Gibbon, was sisted in his place. The other action was originally brought by the deceased John M'Gibbon against Peter Dryden, the heir in heritage of Mrs M'Gibbon, for declarator that the dwelling-house, being the third storey of 142 High Street, Edinburgh, was purchased with funds belonging to Mr M'Gibbon; that his taking the disposition in name of his wife constituted a donation inter virum et uxorem which had been revoked by him, and thereafter the Summons concludes as usual for a conveyance or adjudication of the said subjects in favour of Mr M'Gibbon.

A proof was taken before the Lord Ordinary, which has been held applicable, of consent of parties, to both actions.

The question to be decided in the first action, and which partly entered into the case made for the defenders in the second action, is whether the savings of the spouses, which were represented at the death of Mrs M'Gibbon by a deposit receipt for £744 17s. 6d. in her name by the Royal Bank of Scotland, and were also represented to a greater or less degree by the house No. 142 High Street, which was purchased out of such savings, are to be held to be, to the extent of one-half thereof, the property of Mrs M'Gibbon?

The Lord Ordinary has gone with great care into the details and history of the case, and I need not recapitulate what he has already so well said; but, taking the result of the evidence as stated by him, and which, in my opinion, is correctly stated, I shall proceed to consider the question whether these savings are to be regarded as having to any extent belonged to Mrs M'Gibbon at the time of her death in respect of the provisions of sect. 3 of 40 & 41 Vict. cap. 29 (The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act 1877). That section provides that "the jus mariti and right of administration of the husband shall be excluded from the wages and earnings of any married woman acquired or gained by her after the commencement of this Act in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or in any business which she carries on under her own name." I am of opinion that these savings are not the property of Mrs M'Gibbon in respect of the provisions of this section.

Mrs M'Gibbon had at the date of the marriage no saved earnings. Mr M'Gibbon was at that time a compositor, receiving about two pounds a week in wages, which were afterwards raised to £2 5s., and he was earning these wages up to the time of Mrs M'Gibbon's death. It is therefore certain that at and after its initiation the business of the small temperance hotel which was carried on in the house No. 142 High Street depended almost entirely in its early stages on the wages of Mr M'Gibbon. As was pointed out by the Lord Ordinary, the spouses went to live at 142 High Street, in a house of two rooms and a kitchen, but at Whitsunday 1895 the tenancy became extended to the whole of the flat which had formerly been used as a temperance hotel, and that business was revived there from and after Whitsunday 1895.

Dealing with the first question raised under the Act, namely, whether the business was carried on under Mrs M'Gibbon's own name, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it was not so carried on. Receipts for the rent were granted in name of Mr M'Gibbon, the accounts produced which were rendered by tradesmen and others who did work in the house are in his name; his name also appeared on a brass plate on the door of the premises, and that plate had been brought from a house where they had formerly lived in St Mary Street; and upon the street side of the building the words "M'Gibbon's Temperance Hotel" were painted. In the Edinburgh directories for the year 1896–97 and onwards Mr M'Gibbon's name is in the list of hotelkeepers. The only evidence on the other side is a business card, No. 38 of process, in which the words

"Proprietrix, Mrs M'Gibbon," appear. The evidence about this card is vague, and in no view can I regard it as amounting to very much, as the word "proprietor" or "proprietrix" in connection with a hotel are frequently used as equivalent to nothing more than "manager" or "manageress." It is further to be noticed that on another card, of which No. 73 of process is a sample, these words do not occur, but only "M'Gibbon's (late Fuller's) Commercial and Temperance Hotel." Further, a fire policy of insurance over the flat was in Mrs M'Gibbon's name, but this is quite accounted for by the fact that at that date a disposition had been taken in her name under circumstances to which I shall presently allude. A fire policy of insurance over furniture was originally taken out in Mr M'Gibbon's name, but in June 1900 was transferred to that of his wife.

In these circumstances I do not think it can be held to be proved that the business was a business carried on by the wife under her own name.

Apart from the absence of evidence, I think that the statute, when it speaks of a business carried on under a wife's own name, must be held to imply that the business was carried on by the wife entirely separate from her husband. Now that is not the case here. The house in which the temperance hotel was carried on was the matrimonial home of Mr and Mrs M'Gibbon, and they both constantly resided there together; and I agree with the Lord Ordinary's opinion that where a wife lives in a house with her husband and is the active manager of a business carried on there, the presumption is that she is managing it as the agent of her husband.

But it was further argued that whether the earnings of the hotel were to be held to be earnings of a business carried on under Mrs M'Gibbon's own name or not, they were in any view her earnings acquired "in an employment, occupation, or trade in which she was engaged." On this matter, along with the Lord Ordinary, I follow the opinion of Lord President Robertson in M'Ginty v. M'Alpine, 1892, 19 R. 935–939; he there lays down that in order to come under the 3rd section of the Act of 1877 "the wife must have some other 'employer' than the husband, or the 'occupation or trade' must not be simply the occupation or trade of her husband if it is to yield earnings in the sense of the section." In other words, I hold that not only must the employment be under some other person than her husband, but that the trade or occupation must not be one which is carried on jointly or along with her husband, but must be entirely removed from his participation and control. Now, in the present case I think it is proved that the hotel business was started and, all along, more or less carried on by means of the husband's wages, which were contributed to the common purse which was kept by Mrs M'Gibbon, and into which her husband's wages and the proceeds of the hotel business were regularly put, subject to deductions for personal and current expenses. As it turned out, the sums thus saved were dealt with by Mrs M'Gibbon just as she pleased, one of her objects apparently being to secure a substantial sum for her own future benefit. I need hardly say that her treating practically the whole profits of the hotel as "her own earnings" in a savings bank book, and putting the general savings into a deposit receipt in her own name, does not affect the real ownership of the money thus dealt with. The case of Morrison v. Tawse's Executors, 16 R. 247, was strongly relied on by the pursuers in the first action, but I am of opinion that that case differed from the present in several particulars. There the wife had brought her husband a little money, and a part of it was spent in building a washing-house which was attached to the house in which they lived, and the evidence showed that her husband allowed her to follow her occupation in that place and thereby to gain earnings which were proved to amount to 24s. a week, and sometimes to as much as 28s.; it was possible, accordingly, to hold that the wife's business was carried on in separate premises from these occupied by her husband. This money was deposited along with the balance of her husband's earnings, in a bank in the joint names of the spouses, payable to either and the survivor. I am bound to say I consider that the judgment in that case, which was strongly dissented from by Lord Young, is a somewhat narrow one; and I prefer the opinions expressed in M'Ginty's case as setting forth with greater accuracy the application of the Act to cases of this sort than the opinion of Lord Lee in Morrison's case.

As to the general policy of the Act in its application to cases of this sort, I think it would be very mischievous were claims such as are made here to be open to the heirs of a wife on her decease in all cases where, with her husband's permission and consent, she kept a shop in the house in which they lived; or in the case of a small farm took entire charge of the poultry yard and its proceeds; or in the case of an inn, took the whole charge and management of the visitors' department, leaving the husband to attend to the stabling and possibly the bar business of the same establishment; and it would be still more inconvenient if in every case where a wife took in sewing or washing to the house occupied by herself and her husband, that was to found a claim on the part of her relatives on her decease for a share of the common savings of the spouses. I do not think that the Married Women's Property Act was intended to give rise to such claims at all, but was intended to protect, from the interference of her spouse, the wages or earnings of any industrious woman who might be forced into supporting herself by an idle or improvident husband. Were the Married Women's Property Acts held to be capable of giving rise to actions of the nature above indicated, such as I consider the present to be, it would have very much the effect of leading to a revival of the inconvenient and vexatious class of actions which arose out of the doctrine of communio bonorum and were put an end to by the sixth section of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act 1855, which provided that in the case of a wife's predecease her next of kin, executors, or other representatives, should have no right to any share of the goods in communion.

On these grounds, along with those stated by the Lord Ordinary, I propose that his decision in the first action should be affirmed.

With regard to the second action for declarator and adjudication as regards the house No. 142 High Street, I need not deal with the defender's claim so far as founded on the price of the house being provided to a greater or less extent from funds belonging to the wife, for although it is proved that the price was paid pro tanto out of the profits drawn from the hotel business, for the reasons I have already stated that founds no claim on the part of Mrs M'Gibbon's heir in heritage or other representatives.

But it was maintained, separately altogether from that ground of defence, that assuming the house to have been bought with Mr M'Gibbon's money, the donation made by him in taking the title in his wife's name, or allowing it to be so taken, was not revocable in respect that it was a remuneratory donation, being granted in respect of the services rendered by Mrs M'Gibbon to her husband in the initiation and carrying on of the hotel business. Lord Fraser in his work on Husband and Wife, Vol. II. p. 926, thus defines a donation inter virum et uxorem: "A donation is something valuable given by one spouse to the other without receiving anything in return for it, and without being under any natural or civil obligation to grant it"; and it was maintained, in the first place for the defender, that the donation of the house does not strictly fall under this definition at all, and therefore not being a donation is not revocable. I cannot assent to this argument. I think that the true question is whether this donation of the house does or does not fall to be held to be a remuneratory donation. The general rule applicable to such donations is thus stated in the case of Brownlie v. Stevenson; Elch. v. "Presumption," No. 5 (1735): "Remuneratory donations betwixt husband and wife are not revocable by the donor nor quarrellable by his creditors as in fraudem creditorum"; and Lord Fraser states the rule thus: "Where an equivalent has been given there is no revocation." This doctrine is supported by references to Bankton and Erskine, and to the digest and several old cases. The doctrine was recently given effect to in the Outer House by Lord Low in the case of Stewart, 11 S.L.T. 721 (1904), where it was held that the gift of a large sum paid over by a husband to his wife on the sale of a restaurant business, and which was stated at the time to be in respect of her services in building up and carrying on the business, was not revocable; and it was also given effect to in a recent judgment pronounced by myself as Lord Ordinary in the case of Steven v. Steven (not reported), where it was proved that a wife had advanced several sums acquired from her own father and other relatives to her husband for use in his business; and although no documents of debt passed between them relative to such sums, I held that the taking of the title to a cottage and ground at Duddingston in the wife's name, the price being paid by the husband, was a remuneratory donation, he having stated to several members of the family that it was intended as an equivalent for the sums which she had advanced to him.

It was argued for the defender in the declarator and adjudication that in these two last cited cases, as well as in all others where a donation had been held to be remuneratory, there were expressions used either verbally or in writing by the husband to the effect that the donation was made in respect of an equivalent then and there mentioned, but counsel for the pursuer quoted two cases, namely, Countess of Oxenford v. The Viscount, M. 6136 (1664), and Chisholm v. Brae, M. 6137 (1669), in both of which the Court inferred from the circumstances that the donation was a remuneratory donation, and was intended to be so, notwithstanding that in the latter case the deed expressly bore, in the narrative, to be granted for "love and favour."

I am of opinion, following these two last cited cases, that the law applicable to cases of alleged remuneratory donation is that the remuneratory character of a donation may be inferred from the circumstances in which it is made or given without there being any express indication, verbal or written, that it was intended to be remuneratory. But in such cases the circumstances require to be distinctly proved, and to be such as to lead directly to the inference that the donation was intended as an equivalent for something proved to have been done or given by the donee to the donor.

In the present case there is no evidence of anything said or written by the donor to the effect that the donation of the house was intended to be remuneratory, and I do not think that the circumstances are such as to entitle the Court to infer that it was de facto remuneratory. At the time the disposition of the house was granted in January 1897, the hotel business which was carried on there had only existed for about nineteen months, namely from Whitsunday 1895, and, as already pointed out, during that period it must have been started and kept going principally by the earnings of the husband himself. It is quite true that Mrs M'Gibbon practically managed the hotel business and spent a good deal of time and trouble upon it, but the fact of her having done so for nineteen months can hardly be regarded as a circumstance leading directly to the inference that the taking of the disposition of the house in her name was intended to be an equivalent to her for her services. It falls, moreover, to be noticed that the price of the house much exceeded the profits of the hotel up to the date of the alleged donation, and that the said price was paid out of a fund produced by the husband's wages and the earnings of the hotel put together, along with money raised by a bond for £200, in which Mr M'Gibbon was the principal obligant. I think it is the reasonable inference from these facts that Mr M'Gibbon intended what he did to be a mortis causa provision in his wife's favour, and although the terms of the disposition militate somewhat against that view, I do not think it can be held that Mr M'Gibbon fully knew or understood the effect of these, which, I may add, were inserted entirely on the instructions of Mrs M'Gibbon. A very different case might have been raised if the donation of the house had been carried out after many years' hard work in connection with the hotel on Mrs M'Gibbon's part, and after a large sum had been saved out of the earnings from the hotel business, but I think that the circumstances as they existed at the date of the disposition itself practically exclude the idea of its being of the character of a remuneratory donation.

I therefore am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in the second action should also be adhered to.

RIGHT IN SECURITY — MOVEABLE — SHIP—MORTGAGE—SALE OF SHIP BY MORTGAGEE—COMMISSION—RIGHT OF MORTGAGEE TO COMMISSION ON SALE AND OUTLAYS.

Muirhead's Trawlers Ltd. had gone into liquidation, and the question in this case was whether a mortgagee, who had taken possession of certain of the trawlers under power contained in a deed of covenant between him and the Company, was entitled to charge the liquidator of the Company with commission on sales of the trawlers effected by him.

The Lord Ordinary found that such sale commissions did not form good items of charge as against the liquidator. His opinion sufficiently reports the case.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Salvesen.

Robertson Durham (Liquidator of Muirhead's Trawlers Ltd.) v. Constant.

Lord Salvesen.—The question to be decided in this case arises on a note presented by the liquidator of Muirhead's Trawlers Ltd., inter alia, for authority to divide the assets and discharge the liquidator. In the note the liquidator stated that the assets of the Company consisted principally of nine steam trawlers, with their gear, five of which were mortgaged to Joseph Constant, shipbroker in London; that Mr Constant had taken summary possession of these boats under power contained in a deed of covenant between him and the Company; that he had sold the boats; but, although repeatedly called on to do so, had failed to exhibit an account of his intromissions with the prices of the boats. Having these averments before me when the liquidator moved in terms of the prayer of the note, I declined to grant the motion until he had satisfied himself as to Mr Constant's intromissions; and, on 20th February, I pronounced an order on Constant to produce accounts. After some delay the statement No. 196 of process was ultimately produced; and after the liquidator had lodged objections, an alternative statement, No. 213 of process, giving effect to some of them was lodged by Mr Constant. From this it appears that Mr Constant claims to be a creditor of the Company, as at 4th April 1907, to the amount of £1207, 3s. 11d.; but as he has still a considerable sum — apparently £1312, 10s.—to receive as unpaid instalments of the purchase price of three of the trawlers, it would appear that—even on his own showing—there may ultimately be a small sum due to the liquidator. This sum will fall to be increased if, and to the extent that, the objections still insisted in by the liquidator are given effect to.

The only one of the objections which I am in a position to dispose of without enquiry relates to two sums of commission charged by Mr Constant. It appears that on 23rd December 1904 he received for the sale of two trawlers, the "Mont Cenis" and the "Mont Blanc," a sum of £5500; and he charges £275, being a commission of five per cent. for carrying through the sale. Similarly, in October 1905, he arranged a sale of the three remaining vessels at the price of £6070, payable to the extent of £4320 in cash and the remainder in instalments; and he credits himself with £303, 10s., as at 11th October 1905, as a commission at five per cent. on the full sum of £6070, on the same footing as if he had then received it. This claim for commission is, in the first instance, based on the deed of covenant between him and Muirhead's Trawlers Ltd., No. 11 of process.

The deed narrates that the Company are the owners of five several steam trawlers, and had by five several deeds of even date mortgaged the said steamships to secure the payment of a sum of £10,000. The Company then assign to the mortgagee their interest in charter-parties, bills of lading, policies of insurance, etc., in trust and for the purposes thereinafter declared. By the third article provision is made for repayment of the sum of £10,000 in instalments, with eight per cent. interest. There follow some further provisions with regard to the security of the mortgagee which it is unnecessary to particularise, with the exception of the articles relating to a sale. By Article 7 it is provided "that in case default shall be made in payment of the principal or interest, the mortgagee shall be entitled, at any time after such default, to take possession of the steamships and to sell them as he thinks fit"; and by Article 9, it is declared that the mortgagee shall stand possessed of the monies arising from the sale of the said steamships "upon trust, in the first place, to pay and satisfy himself the costs, charges and expenses which he himself shall or may be put unto in obtaining possession of the said steam ships . . . . or in the sale of the said steam ships, or any part thereof, or in attempting to effect a sale thereof, or otherwise to be incurred in the execution or exercise of any of the powers herein contained . . . . and in the next place, in trust to pay and satisfy himself all and every debts and debt, sum or sums of money, and charges which shall or may be then due or owing on the security of these presents, and of the foresaid statutory mortgages . . . . and in the next place, in trust to pay the surplus of said monies, if any, unto the Company."

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Salvesen.

Robertson Durham (Liquidator of Muirhead's Trawlers Ltd.) v. Constant.

The liquidator admits that, under these provisions, the expenses incurred by Mr Constant, in connection with the sale or sales of the trawlers, are properly chargeable against the proceeds realised; but he argues—and I think rightly—that there is no express provision made for payment of a commission to Mr Constant for effecting the sales; and he maintains that as by the deed Mr Constant was constituted a trustee for the Company, he is not entitled to charge any commission. On the other hand, Mr Constant contends that the liquidator is not entitled to take the benefit of his exertions in selling the property of the Company without remunerating him therefor, and that he is entitled to charge the ordinary commission which would have been payable if he had employed another broker to sell the ships.

Neither party referred me to any authority on the subject; and I must therefore decide the case upon principle. Now it has frequently been decided that a trustee, in the absence of express authority from the truster, is not entitled to remuneration for the services which he renders in the administration of the trust. This is best illustrated by the cases which have occurred of a solicitor, who, being himself a trustee, employed his firm to do the law business required by the trust. In such a case, however unexceptionable the charges may be, the Court has uniformly refused to allow any sums by way of remuneration to the solicitor, or the firm of which he was a partner; and it has not been moved by considerations similar to those urged here that exactly the same charges would have been incurred if an independent solicitor had been employed. The reason of the rule, of which this is only an illustration, is "that no one who has a duty to perform shall place himself in a situation to have his interests conflicting with that duty," and the rule itself was declared by Lord Cranworth, in Broughton v. Broughton, 1855, 5 De G. M. and G. 164, in language which has been often quoted, to be of general application. He says: "The result, therefore, is that no person, in whom fiduciary duties are vested, shall make a profit of them by employing himself, because in doing this, he cannot perform one part of his trust, namely, that of seeing that no improper charges are made. The general rule applies to a solicitor acting as a trustee." In the present case it may be assumed that, as there seems to have been only a small margin of security, Mr Constant did his best to realise a full price; but the rule—which is a salutary one—is not affected by such specialties. If the margin had been ample, it is conceivable that the trustee would have been more concerned to earn commission for himself than to protect the interests of the truster; and it is eminently desirable that a trustee should not be exposed to any such temptation as he would be if the Court sanctioned such charges.

Such cases as the present of a mortgagee selling under his mortgage must constantly have occurred; and yet there is no recorded instance of the mortgagee being remunerated for his trouble in realising the mortgaged property. So far as I am concerned, I decline to introduce any relaxation of what I consider to be a most salutary rule, although it may operate hardly in individual cases. I may add that, even if I had thought the claim for commission admissible, I would not have allowed commission on the sale in October 1905, except upon the instalments as and when they became payable.

In his answers Mr Constant states that he incurred charges for brokerage and advertising in connection with the sales, which he has not debited, on the ground that these are usually held covered by the commission. Of course, in disallowing the commission I do not preclude Mr Constant from charging any out-of-pocket expenses which he is able to vouch. Possibly he may even have a claim for a clerk's salary, if he can show that he incurred any additional liability to his clerks in connection with the transaction.—30*th May* 1907.

61. Jardine v. Burgh of Moffat.

Process — Reclaiming Note — Court of Session Act 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sects. 53 and 54—Action Concluding for Declarator and Interdict—Interlocutor of Lord Ordinary Finding in Terms of Declaratory Conclusion, Superseding Meanwhile Further Consideration of Conclusion for Interdict — Reclaiming Note Lodged Twenty Days After Date of Interlocutor — Interlocutor Held Not to Dispose of Whole Subject-matter of Cause—Reclaiming Note Dismissed.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

In this action the pursuer sought to have it declared that the Magistrates of the Burgh of Moffat were not entitled to supply water taken from the estate of Granton except to houses, tenements, or premises within the boundaries of the burgh. There was a corresponding conclusion for interdict.

The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties in the Procedure Roll, pronounced the following interlocutor on 28th May 1907:—

"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, Finds and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the Summons, and decerns; supersedes in the meantime further consideration of the conclusion for interdict; finds the pursuers entitled to expenses; allows an account to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report; grants leave to reclaim."

On 17th June 1907 the defenders lodged a reclaiming note to the First Division against the above interlocutor.

On 20th June 1907, in Single Bills, the respondent moved the Court to dismiss the reclaiming note.

Argued for the Respondent: The interlocutor reclaimed against was not a final judgment of the Outer House in terms of sect. 53 of the Court of Session Act, and should have been reclaimed against within ten days of its date, in terms of sect. 54 of the said Act.

Argued for the Reclaimers: The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary had in substance disposed of the whole subject-matter of the cause in terms of sect. 54 of the Act (Kirkwood, 1874, 1 R. 1190). The sustention of the declaratory conclusion made it impossible for the reclaimers to resist the conclusion for interdict which, had declarator been refused, the respondents would have been unable to pursue. All that remained to be done in the cause was merely executorial (Caledonian Railway v. City of Glasgow, 1900, 2 F. 871, per Lord Adam at pp. 872–3).

Sect. 53 of the Court of Session Act 1868 provides as follows:—

"It shall be held that the whole cause has been decided in the Outer House when an interlocutor has been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, which, either by itself, or taken along with a previous interlocutor or interlocutors, disposes of the whole merits of the cause or of the competition between the parties in a process of competition, although judgment shall not have been pronounced upon all the questions of law or fact raised in the cause. . . ."

The Court dismissed the reclaiming note.

Lord M'Laren.—It is perfectly clear that this reclaiming note has not been presented within the statutory time. It was maintained that the whole subject-matter of the cause had been disposed of by the Lord Ordinary. Now there are conclusions for declarator and also for interdict. The conclusions for interdict have not been disposed of in any definite way. The Lord Ordinary, after granting the declarator asked for, superseded consideration of the conclusions for interdict, either that the parties might have a chance of coming to an arrangement, or because he thought it might be unfair to grant interdict without allowing time for making new arrangements consequential on his decision. In either case the conclusions for interdict are undisposed of, and in these circumstances it is vain to contend that this is a final interlocutor.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case of Kirkwood is altogether inapplicable, and for the reasons given in the opinion of the Lord President and of Lord Deas in that case. The interlocutor there reclaimed against ordained the defender to erect certain buildings within a certain time, and found the defender liable in the expenses of the action. The question was whether that interlocutor did or did not dispose of the whole merits of the action, because, as the Lord President pointed out, "If this decree is implemented there is an end of the case, and nothing remains but to take the action formally out of Court"; and as Lord Deas added, "If these buildings are erected the operation cannot be undone, so the subject-matter is clearly exhausted by this judgment." The question arose in that case from the fact that there was in the summons an alternative conclusion for payment of a sum of £1500 in the event of the defender failing to complete the buildings in question within a certain time. The Lord Ordinary did not dispose of that alternative conclusion in terms, but he gave decree in terms of the first alternative, and therefore by his interlocutor the whole merits of the case were disposed of.

62. Wilkie v. Wilkie.

HUSBAND AND WIFE — DONATION INTER VIRUM ET UXOREM—NULLITY OF MARRIAGE —SUMS BELONGING TO WIFE APPLIED FOR COMMON PURPOSES WHILE PARTIES LIVING TOGETHER — HELD THAT WIFE COULD NOT RECOVER.

This was an action at the instance of Mrs Elizabeth Henderson or Wilkie against William Wilkie. The parties had been married to each other, but the marriage had been declared null in an action at the instance of the defender. The sum in dispute was one which had been given to Mrs Wilkie during the subsistence of the marriage, and, as she maintained, had been appropriated by the defender. The facts of the case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary granted decree of absolvitor.

Lord Mackenzie.—The first conclusion of this action (the only one about which there is dispute) is for payment of £100. The pursuer was married to the defender on 16th September 1902. They parted company on 6th March 1906, and decree of nullity of marriage was pronounced on 19th January 1907, in an action at the husband's instance.

The £100 sued for represents the proceeds of a cheque which the wife handed her husband on 25th September 1902, £80 of which he paid in to his bank account, the remaining £20 being handed to his wife, and applied, as she depones, in payment of bills in connection with her husband's business of hotelkeeper.

The facts in connection with this cheque are, in my opinion, proved to have been as follows:—The money was a present from the pursuer's father to her. She had assisted him in his business before her marriage without wages, and he had promised her the present. On 24th September he took the cheque produced, drawn payable to himself and endorsed, and gave it to her in her husband's hotel. He gave it to her to keep for herself, and to bank in her own name. It appears that previously he had been asked to become cautioner for an overdraft to the defender, but had declined. He had not a good opinion of the defender's financial position, and says he gave his daughter the money to make sure she should have something, in case anything happened to her husband's affairs. The defender says the pursuer's father told him that day he had handed the cheque to his daughter to give him to help in his business. This is denied by the father, who says he never told the defender he had given his daughter the cheque. I believe the evidence of the pursuer's father. The pursuer told her husband of the cheque that evening. On the following day the defender got the cheque from his wife, as she says, to lodge in bank in her name. She was unable to say whether this was to be on deposit or not. Of the £100 the pursuer received £20, which she states was applied in paying accounts in connection with the hotel business. It is not very clearly proved what was done with the money, but in the view I take it may be assumed it was so applied. Shortly afterwards, when she looked at the defender's bank-book, she saw that the remaining £80 had been placed to his credit. Her evidence is that she complained of this to the defender, and continued to do so, and that she asked for a receipt. She spoke to her father about it a fortnight later and on other occasions, but he seems not to have said anything to the defender about it. I think that the pursuer must very soon have come to know that the £80 had been drawn out of the bank by the defender and spent, either on his business or in paying household accounts.

The question is whether the pursuer, who during the time in question occupied the position of the defender's wife, can now recover from him monies which she must be held to have known were being applied for mutual purposes. If this were the case of a marriage dissolved by decree of divorce it would, I think, be plain from the decision in Fenton Livingstone (1907, 14 S.L.T. 892) and the cases there referred to, that she could not.

It has been maintained, however, that the case here, being one of nullity, is different; that it must be held there never was a marriage —Nec vir, nec uxor, nec nuptiæ, nec matrimonium, nec dos intelligitur (Fraser, Husband and Wife, I. 149; Ersk. Inst., I. vi. 43)—and accordingly that there must be mutual restitution of property. I am of opinion that the principle of the case above referred to applies to monies spent on mutual purposes during the period the pursuer and defender believed they were married persons. I am accordingly of opinion that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied from the petitory conclusion.

It was suggested that, as the decree in the nullity case only ordained the wife to make restitution to the husband, the former could not insist in her present demand. That, however, appears to me not tenable. There is nothing in the decree to prevent her claiming restitution if otherwise entitled to it.—7th June 1907.

John Scott Tait, C.A., liquidator of the Scottish Motor Engineering Co. The Lord Ordinary refused to grant the prayer in the terms asked; but allowed petitioner to amend in the following terms:—"To advertise the said security subjects, comprising the buildings and fixed machinery, for sale by public roup at the upset price of £12,500, and to grant all necessary conveyances and dispositions in favour of purchasers, said purchasers being bound under the articles and conditions of roup to acquire and take over the whole moveable machinery and stock in the Company's works at a mutual valuation," and granted the prayer as amended.—18*th June* 1907.

64. Rutherglen Parish Council v. New Monkland Parish Council.

Poor Law — Residential Settlement—Pupil Child — Industrial Settlement Acquired by Widow After Death of Husband — Held that Derivative Settlement which Child Had From Father Revived on Death of Mother.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court at Airdrie.

2nd Div.

Rutherglen Parish Council v. New Monkland Parish Council.

The following narrative of the circumstances out of which this action arose is taken from the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling.

"Samuel Brown, while still a pupil, became chargeable to the parish of Rutherglen as a pauper on 30th November 1905, and he continues to be so chargeable. He was born in the parish of New Monkland on 26th January 1894. His father died on 18th June 1899, having a residential settlement in that parish. Two years before his death the father had removed, with his wife and family, to the parish of Rutherglen. The mother of the pauper continued to reside there after her husband's death till her own death on 30th or 31st July 1904, when she died without having re-married. At the date of her death she had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Rutherglen. First the father and then the mother continued to support the boy in family while they lived, for he only became chargeable a few months after his surviving parent's death."

In these circumstances this action was raised in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie at the instance of the Parish Council of Rutherglen against the Parish Council of New Monkland, for recovery of advances made by them on behalf of Samuel Brown so long as he remained chargeable on the parish.

On 7th June 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Glegg) pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"The Sheriff-Substitute finds in fact that (1) the pauper was born on 26th January 1894 in the parish of New Monkland, and his father died in 1899, having a residential settlement in that parish; (2) in 1897 the pauper's father removed to the parish of Rutherglen with his wife and family, and after his death there, his widow continued to reside and maintain the pauper in that parish, and at her death there in 1904 she had acquired a residential settlement in that parish; (3) on 3rd November 1905 the pauper, being still in pupillarity, became chargeable to the parish of Rutherglen: Finds in law that (1) the derivative settlement which the pauper had from his father in New Monkland was lost by the acquisition of a settlement in the parish of Rutherglen, derived from his mother through her residence there; (2) on his mother's death the derivative settlement in the parish of Rutherglen subsisted, and the derivative settlement in the parish of New Monkland did not revive: therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

He delivered the following Note:—

Note.—The question in this case is whether a pupil, whose widowed mother had at the time of her death a residential settlement different from that of her predeceasing husband, takes at her death the settlement of his mother, or the prior settlement of his father. There is no doubt on the authorities that a widow can acquire a settlement which becomes, during her life, the settlement of her pupil children. It is not so clear on the authorities that this settlement attaches to her children at her death, to the exclusion of the father's residential settlement, but I think that this result must be ascribed to them. In Crieff v. Fowlis-Wester, 1842, 4 D. 1538, it was held that a posthumous child took the residential settlement of its mother and not the birth settlement of its father. The opinions of the judges in that case regard the settlement acquired by the mother after the father's death as of the same order as a settlement acquired by the father. In Gibson v. Murray, 1854, 16 D. 926, the Court preferred the birth settlement of their living mother to the birth settlement of the children. The Lord President said, at p. 929, that children have the benefit of a mother's residential settlement, and the Lord Justice-Clerk, on p. 935, that children take the mother's residential settlement after the father's death, just as they previously took the father's. The expressions used do not suggest that the mother's settlement was to rule only during her life, but apparently treat it as equally permanent with that of the father. In Grant v. Reid, 1860, 22 D. 1110, an imbecile became chargeable after the death of his widowed mother, and it was not disputed that the residential settlement of the mother settled the question of which parish was chargeable, and accordingly, residence being established, that parish was found liable, and not the parish of the pauper's birth nor that of his father's birth. In Carmichael v. Adamson, 1863, 1 M. 452, the birth settlement of a deceased widowed mother was preferred to the parish of the pupil's birth. The opinions in this case, however, except that they recognise the existence of a derivative settlement after the mother's death, do not much help the present question, as they proceed on ground that there was no father's settlement to fall back on. In M'Lennan v. Waite, 1872, 10 M. 908, a minor, after the death of her widowed mother, became a pauper, and it was found that being emancipated and past pupillarity, and having lost the derivative settlement she enjoyed through her mother's residential settlement, she was chargeable to the parish of her birth. It was argued that she was chargeable to her father's residential settlement, but that argument was not entertained, and the question was whether she had lost the derivative settlement acquired through her mother. It is clear from the language of the Lord President, that if the claim for relief had been made while the pauper was in pupillarity, and after her mother's death, that the mother's residential settlement would have been taken. In Shotts v. Bothwell, 1896, 24 R. 169, the pauper's mother, after the death of his father, re-married without having acquired a residential settlement, and the pauper became chargeable after his mother's death. It was held that the new settlement acquired by the mother through her re-marriage had no effect on the settlement of the pauper. It was clearly pointed out, however, that the mother took the settlement of the second husband solely for purposes of practical convenience, and that it was entirely different from a settlement acquired by residence. It simply, as regarded the children, temporarily suspended or superseded their own proper settlement, and being in their case merely the derivative of a derivative, was ended at once by the dissolution of the marriage. It is obvious that this decision does not conflict in the least with the present judgment, nor, I think, do the dicta of the judges do so. Lord Adam, on p. 171, speaks of the settlement of the father remaining that of the children, but he does so, it seems to me, in view of the argument that the mother's re-marriage affected this settlement. His Lordship seems to be re-stating the effect of Beattie v. Mackenna, 1878, 5 R. 737, which decided that a second marriage, though it gave the children a temporary claim on their stepfather's parish, did not finally sever their connection with their own father's settlement. That case decided nothing more, for it appears that the interval between the death of the first husband and the marrying of his successor was too brief to allow of the widow acquiring a settlement for herself and her children. Indeed, it appears from the opinion of Lord Shand, that if the mother had acquired a residential settlement, the claim there made, being that of a pupil after the mother's death, would have lain against the settlement of that parish. For his Lordship says: "If the pauper had acquired her mother's settlement, and had lost that settlement," a certain question would have arisen, and he goes on to say that the fact of a second marriage does not create a settlement for the children. Lord Mure speaks of the father's settlement as pertaining to the children, but he does that because, in the case under discussion, there was no settlement acquired by residence of the mother, and the question was between the father's and the stepfather's. To return to the Shotts case, it is to be pointed out that Lord Kinnear reaches the liability of the parish of the pauper's birth in a way that implies that a residential settlement on the part of the mother would have prevented that result being arrived at. For, after dealing with two prior contingencies, he dismisses the third, the liability of the stepfather's parish, because, p. 173, "The settlement which the widow acquired by residence after her first husband's death, and during her second marriage, was not an independent industrial settlement acquired by herself, but through her second husband's settlement, from which I am unable to see that the children of her first marriage could acquire any right. Therefore we must fall back on the parish of the pauper's own birth."

Now, the conclusion I draw from these authorities is that a widow can acquire a residential settlement for herself and her pupil children, which comes in place of that derived from her deceased husband, and consequently that on her death it is the settlement so acquired that rules, and not the settlement of her deceased husband.

I was referred to an arbitration by the Local Government Board in Graham on Poor Law, p. 36, viz., Glasgow v. Paisley, 1903, where exactly the contrary view was held, but I must respectfully differ from it.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session.

The following authorities were referred to: Barbour, 1853, 1 Macq. 376; Coldinghame, 1779, M. 10582; Craig, 1863, 1 M. 1172; Greig, 1865, 3 M. 575; Crieff, 1842, 4 D. 1538; Gibson, 1854, 16 D. 926; Grant, 1860, 22 D. 1110; Carmichael, 1863, 1 M. 452; M'Lennan, 1872, 10 M. 908; St Cuthbert's, 1873, 1 R. 174; Beattie, 1878, 5 R. 737; Hendry, 1880, 7 R. 458; Shotts, 1896, 24 R. 169; Rutherglen, 1902, 4 F. (H.L.) 19; Graham's Poor Law, p. 186.

The Court pronounced the following Interlocutor: — "Recal the interlocutor appealed against; find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the said interlocutor; find in law that the derivative settlement which the pauper had from his father in New Monkland was not lost at the date of the pauper becoming chargeable, but revived on his mother's death in 1904; therefore find in favour of the pursuer in terms of the prayer of the petition, and decern."

Lord Stormonth-Darling. — This case raises what may fairly be called a new point in the poor law, for it is not decided in terms by any previous judgment.

[After the narrative of facts above quoted.] In these circumstances, which are all admitted, a contest has arisen between the two parishes, Rutherglen maintaining that the pauper took at his father's death and retained during pupillarity the residential settlement in New Monkland which he derived from his father, though this may have been temporarily suspended from the time when his mother acquired a residential settlement in Rutherglen down to her own death; and New Monkland, on the other hand, maintaining that the pauper derived from his mother the residential settlement which she had acquired as a widow in the parish of Rutherglen, and that this settlement subsisted during his pupillarity to the exclusion of the prior settlement derived from his father. There is no doubt on the authorities, as the Sheriff-Substitute observes, that a widow can acquire a settlement by residence which becomes during her life the settlement of her pupil children; but it is not so clear, he adds, that this settlement attaches to her children at her death to the exclusion of the father's settlement, whether by birth or residence. It is on this point that the parties are sharply at issue: they are at one in maintaining that the settlement of a pupil child is always derivative where a derivative settlement can be found. This has been the law of Scotland ever since the reversal by the House of Lords in 1853 of the case of Barbour v. Adamson, 1 Macq. 376.

The Sheriff-Substitute decided in favour of New Monkland, the Council of which parish he assoilzied; and the novelty of the point consists in his finding in law (1) that the derivative settlement which the pauper had from his father in New Monkland was lost by the acquisition of a settlement in the parish of Rutherglen derived from his mother, through her residence there; and (2) that on his mother's death the derivative settlement in the parish of Rutherglen subsisted, and the derivative settlement in the parish of New Monkland did not revive. The point is perhaps difficult as well as new, and it has been treated by the Sheriff-Substitute with his usual care and ability. But I have come to hold, on a consideration of all the cases, that the weight of judicial opinion is in favour of holding that a derivative settlement acquired by a pupil from his mother by virtue of her residence as a widow for the requisite period does not subsist after her death, at all events where there is a settlement derived from the father to fall back upon. I shall go over the cases cited by the Sheriff-Substitute in their order.

The strongest case in support of his judgment is the case of Crieff v. Fowlis-Wester (in 1842), 4 D. 1538. That was treated entirely as a question of which of three settlements was to be held liable—the parish of the female pauper's own birth settlement, viz., Little Dunkeld, where she was born in 1804; the parish of her residential settlement, if of sufficient duration, after she attained puberty, viz., Crieff; and the parish where her mother had acquired a settlement by residence as a widow for eighteen years, viz., Fowlis-Wester. These were all the parishes that were parties to the process. The pauper's own residence in Crieff was held of insufficient duration, and the decision was that Fowlis-Wester was liable. This undoubtedly implied that a pauper could derive a settlement from a widowed mother after the mother's death. But the case was taken on the footing that the father did not appear to have acquired any settlement by residence, and no claim was made upon the parish of his birth, if indeed it was in Scotland and was known. It is noticeable that the case arose three years before new conditions had been imposed upon the acquisition of a residential settlement by sect. 76 of the Act of 1845, and eleven years before a father's birth settlement was assimilated to his residential settlement (if he had acquired such), as creating a derivative liability for his pupil children by the case of Barbour v. Adamson (supra cit.). But in any case the Crieff case cannot be regarded as deciding anything more than that a derivative settlement through the mother may subsist after her own death. In particular, it does not decide that it shall prevail over a father's settlement when that is known.

The case of Gibson v. Murray in 1854 (16 D. 926) was the case of pupil children whose English father had not acquired any settlement in Scotland and whose mother was alive, so the question which we have here to deal with did not arise.

The case of Grant v. Reid in 1860 (22 D. 1110) established that an imbecile, who, as such, was incapable of acquiring a settlement for himself, had acquired a derivative settlement in the parish of his widowed mother which remained available to him after her death in preference to the birth parish of the pauper himself and also the birth parish of his deceased father. The question was treated as a narrow one, but what was chiefly discussed in the opinion of the judges was the continuity of the mother's residence in Kilmallie, and not the question of the liability of the father's birth parish. The report is unsatisfactory, for the arguments of counsel are not given, and there is no general doctrine in the opinions either of the Lord Ordinary or Lord President Macneill. In these circumstances I cannot hold that the judgment has any bearing on a point which it practically ignores. If it has, I think it is inconsistent with subsequent cases to which I shall presently refer; and on the same assumption I must respectfully express my inability to agree with it.

The important whole Court case of Carmichael v. Adamson in 1863 (1 M. 452) has little bearing on the real question here except that, as the Sheriff-Substitute says, it recognises the existence of a derivative settlement from the mother after the mother's death. But if that general proposition is qualified, as it must be, by the addition that in Carmichael's case there was no father's settlement, either by birth or residence, to fall back upon, it does not go far to support the Sheriff in holding that on the mother's death the settlement derived from the father did not revive. The case is chiefly remarkable for a vigorous dissent by Lord-President Inglis, who not only asserted the principle, which has subsequently been adopted by the House of Lords, that a husband's desertion of his wife does not confer upon her the capacity to acquire an industrial settlement for herself, but also insisted that, as a general rule, pupil children are so identified with their father that they can neither have status, rights, nor liabilities except through him. Lords Neaves and Mackenzie, who were in the majority, while agreeing with their brethren as to the effect of desertion, laid it down with equal clearness (1) that pupil children, being legitimate, follow the settlement of their father if he has one; and (2) that after the father's death they follow his settlement in the first instance, but that, failing the father's settlement, the mother, as now the head of the family, may acquire an independent settlement for herself and them.

M'Lennan v. Waite (1872), 10 M. 908, was a special case, the parties to which were the parish at once of the female pauper's own birth and of her deceased father's residential settlement and the parish where her mother had lived long enough to acquire a residential settlement. The point of the case was that the pauper was minor pubes when she became chargeable, and the decision was that, in accordance with the whole Court case of Craig v. Greig and M'Donald, 1863, 1 M. 1172, the pauper being above the age of puberty and not having acquired any residential settlement in her own right, was chargeable to the parish of her own birth. It was implied in the decision that the pauper had lost the derivative settlement which, before emancipation, she had acquired through her mother. But I demur to the inference of the Sheriff-Substitute that "if the claim for relief had been made while the pauper was in pupillarity and after the mother's death, the mother's residential settlement would have been taken." If this means that the decision would have been laid on different grounds, I agree, because the essential facts would have been different, but if it means that the parish of the mother's residential settlement would have been taken rather than the parish of the father's residential settlement, I do not agree, and I see nothing in the Lord President's very guarded opinion to justify that inference. His Lordship's reference to the pauper's settlement being in her birth parish "in preference to any derivative settlement which she formerly had" is all qualified by the postulate that she had attained the age of puberty.

The other two cases quoted by the Sheriff-Substitute—Beattie v. M'Kenna in 1878 (5 R. 737), and Shotts v. Bothwell in 1896 (24 R. 169)—are both cases presenting the peculiarity that the mother of the paupers had married again. In Beattie's case the pauper, when he became chargeable, was still a pupil. In Shotts the pauper, when he became chargeable, had reached puberty. In Beattie's case Lord Mure, who delivered the leading judgment, laid down the general rule of law as clear that "pupil children, being legitimate, follow the settlement of their father if he has one in Scotland, whether that settlement be one of residence or of birth, and that they continue in the ordinary case to hold that settlement after the father's death." The decision was that the parish of the father's birth settlement continued to be liable during the pauper's pupillarity notwithstanding the second marriage of the pauper's mother. Lord Shand, in concurring, said that "the previous cases seem to come to this, that when the mother has survived the father, the pupil children must, during her lifetime, be charged on her parish, because she is truly the pauper. The pauper still, however, has a settlement derived from his 'father.' Though there may be a temporary suspension of that settlement in following that of the mother if she became a pauper, on the mother's death the child's settlement is that derived from his father." If that is a correct statement of the law, it directly contradicts the Sheriff-Substitute's finding to the effect that on the mother's death the derivative settlement in the parish of New Monkland did not revive. For I do not follow the learned Sheriff's criticism on Lord Shand's opinion that "if the mother had acquired a residential settlement the claim there made, being that of a pupil after the mother's death, would have lain against the settlement of that parish." That is plainly inconsistent with Lord Shand's phrase about there being only a "temporary suspension" of the settlement derived from the father—a suspension, that is to say, ending with the mother's life and her position as the temporary "head of the family."

Shotts v. Bothwell, besides reaffirming the principle that the parish of settlement of a second husband could not be made liable for the first family, between whom and the second husband there existed no legal relation, had only a bearing on the question here in so far as it contained a restatement by Lord Adam (who had been Lord Ordinary in Beattie's case) of the "temporary suspension" view of the settlement derived from the first husband. The real point of the case was that a child who had ceased to be a pupil, could have no right as a rule to any derivative settlement, and must therefore become chargeable to his own birth settlement. I am at a loss to see how that warrants any inference that a residential settlement acquired by a widow for herself and her pupil children comes in place, after her death, of a settlement derived from the children's own father.

I quite agree that in poor law questions, wherever anything has been expressly decided, it is more important to preserve uniformity of decision than to insist on strict adherence to principle. But it is not contended that there is any prior decision that precisely rules this case. And I think, not only that there are weighty opinions to the effect that, in the case of pupils, the settlement of their father is the primary ground of liability, just as he himself is primarily liable for their support if he has the means, and that the emergence of any other ground of liability is limited and temporary; but I think also that principle is all in favour of that conclusion. There is nothing new or startling in the idea of a settlement reviving, for a birth settlement is always capable of being revived on a residential settlement being lost, and the principle which lies at the foundation of a derivative settlement through a parent, viz., the expediency of not separating a mother from her children, or the children from each other, does not apply after the mother's death, when she has ceased to be, in point of fact, the "head of the family." Moreover, it is plain that the capacity of a mother to attract the children's settlement to her own is very different and much slighter than the capacity of a father to do the same, if only in respect of her liability to have her settlement changed by marrying again.

I therefore propose that we should recal the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor of 7th June 1906, and, while repeating his findings in fact, find in law that the derivative settlement which the pauper had from his father in New Monkland was not lost at the date of the pauper becoming chargeable, but revived on his mother's death in 1904.

Lord Low.—I concur in the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived. The judgment proposed appears to me to be rested upon sound principle, and to be entirely consistent with the view of the law which was very clearly stated in Beattie v. M'Kenna, 1878, 5 R. 737, and Shotts v. Bothwell, 1896, 24 R. 169.

The only difficulty which I have felt has been caused by the cases of Crieff v. Fowlis-Wester, 1842, 4 D. 1538, and Grant v. Reid, 1860, 22 D. 1110.

In the former case it was admitted that the deceased father of the pauper had never acquired a residential settlement, but nothing is said in the report as to whether or not he had a birth settlement in Scotland. I have also looked at the Session papers in the case, but they throw no light upon that matter. No proof was led in regard to the father's settlement, and no parish said to be the parish of his birth was a party to the case. I think, therefore, that it may be assumed that, as stated by Lord Anderson in Gibson v. Murray, 1854, 16 D. 926, the father's settlement could not be ascertained. If so, then the judgment in Crieff v. Fowlis-Wester is no authority in the present case, and is in no respect inconsistent with the views expressed by your Lordship.

In Grant v. Reid the pauper's father had a birth settlement in Scotland, and the question arose between the parish of that settlement and the parish in which, after the father's death, the mother had acquired a residential settlement. It was held that the latter parish was liable, and therefore, prima facie, the judgment is directly in favour of the view taken by the learned Sheriff-Substitute. It is plain, however, that the question, and the only question, which was argued and decided was whether the mother had not lost the residential settlement which she had admittedly acquired after her husband's death? Thus the Lord President, in giving the judgment of the Court, said: "It is not disputed that if the widow retained the settlement she had acquired in Kilmallie, the liability attaches to that parish."

The judgment, therefore, proceeded upon a concession, but it is not without significance that the learned counsel who represented the parish of the father's birth made the concession, and that it was referred to by the Lord President in terms which suggest to my mind that in his opinion it was properly made. Of course, if the question whether, assuming that the mother had a residential settlement at her death, the parish of the father's birth was nevertheless liable, had been argued, the result might have been different; but I cannot help thinking that the judgment is an example of a view which is indicated in several of the earlier cases, namely, that a residential, or, as it was often termed, an industrial settlement, having presumably benefited the parish in which the residence took place, founded a claim against that parish (which could not be urged against the parish of birth) for the support of pupil children of the parent by whose residence the settlement has been acquired. That view, however, had never been given effect to by an actual decision, and I do not think that it has received much countenance in more recent times.

I therefore think that to hold in this case that the pauper took the residential settlement of his father is not, on the one hand, contrary to any of the decisions, while, on the other hand, it is consistent with principle, and with the more recent authorities. I therefore concur.

2nd Div.

Lord Ardwall.

Lord Ardwall.—In this action the parish of Rutherglen claims relief from the parish of New Monkland for the aliment of a pauper named Samuel Brown, who became chargeable on 30th November 1905, and was relieved by Rutherglen.

The pauper was born in the parish of New Monkland on the 26th of January 1894; he is therefore still in pupillarity.

The father of the pauper died on the 18th of June 1899, having at the time of his death a residential settlement in New Monkland. The pauper's father had, however, two years before his death, removed to Rutherglen, where he died. After his death the pauper's mother and the pauper resided in family in Rutherglen till the 30th of July 1904, when she died, without having re-married. Neither parent of the said pauper ever applied for or received relief from the parish of Rutherglen.

The question now is whether, on his mother's death, the pauper's derivative settlement acquired from his mother's residential settlement in the parish of Rutherglen came to an end, and the derivative settlement acquired from his father in New Monkland revived.

The Sheriff-Substitute has held that the pauper's settlement in the parish of Rutherglen subsisted at the time of his mother's death and still subsists, and that the pauper's derivative settlement in the parish of New Monkland did not revive. I am of the contrary opinion.

It is well settled that where, after the death of a father, the mother acquires a new settlement for herself, either by residence or in respect of a second marriage, the pupil children of her first marriage take the derivative settlement of their mother, and are entitled to be supported, in the case of becoming paupers, by the parish of such settlement so long as the mother is alive.

The general question raised in this case is whether, on the death of a widowed mother after having acquired a residential settlement for herself, and a deceased father having also had at the time of his death a known residential settlement, a pupil child takes the derivative residential settlement of his mother or of his father? I am of opinion that he takes that of his father. The policy of the law is to prevent the dispersion of the family, as was said in the case of Adamson v. Barbour, 1858, 1 Macq. 376. This has been repeated in many other cases, and it is this policy that is the ground of the rule which is very well established, to the effect that pupil children, after the death of their father, take a derivative settlement from their mother during her lifetime (see Gibson v. Murray, 1854, 16 D. 926; Greig v. Adamson and Craig, 1865, 3 M. 575).

It has been held in two cases—Beattie v. M'Kenna, 1878, 5 R. 737, and Shotts v. Bothwell and Rutherglen, 1896, 24 R. 169—that where a widow having pupil children marries again, and thereby acquires the settlement of her second husband, the pupil children are liable to be relieved should they become chargeable as paupers by the parish in which their mother has a settlement through her second husband, but on the death of the mother the derivative settlement acquired by the children in the parish of her settlement ceases to subsist, and the children, if still pupils, take a derivative settlement from their deceased father, either in his birth parish or in his parish of settlement. Lord Muir says in Beattie's case: "I can see nothing in the circumstances of the present case to take it out of the broad general rule that a legitimate child being a pupil, follows the settlement of his father, whether the father is dead or is alive." Lord Deas says: "I hold it to be quite fixed that where the mother after the father's death maintains the family, her settlement, of whatever kind or however acquired, is their settlement. She is the pauper." And Lord Shand says that the previous cases seemed to come to this, that when the mother has survived the father the pupil children must during her lifetime be charged on her parish, because she is truly the pauper. He goes on to say: "The pupil has still, however, the settlement derived from his father. Though there may be a temporary suspension of his settlement in following that of the mother if she become a pauper, yet on the mother's death the child's settlement is that derived from his father"; and his Lordship then points out that the mother being dead, the principle of Barbour's case, that there should be no dispersion of the family, is not interfered with.

In my opinion there seems no good reason why the rule thus applied to the case of a mother who has married a second time should not apply to the case of a mother dying leaving pupil children where she has not married a second time. In short, I think that one and the same rule must be applied to the mother's settlement however acquired, that rule being that on her death the suspended derivative settlement of her pupil children in their father's parish revives.

As already pointed out, the reason for pupil children taking (as far as parochial relief is concerned) the mother's settlement on the death of their father in preference to the father's, is to avoid dispersion of the family, and when that reason ceases by the mother's death, there seems no good reason why the parish of the father's settlement should not be that of his children; or, in the words of Lord Mure, why the broad general rule should not apply that a legitimate child, being a pupil, follows the settlement of its father whether that father is dead or alive.

But it is said against this view that in the cases of Crieff v. Fowlis-Wester, 1842, 4 D.

1538, and Carmichael v. Adamson, 1863, 1 M. 452, the derivative settlement acquired through a mother was preferred to the settlement of the father, and the case of Gibson v. Murray, 1854, 16 D. 927, was also cited as supporting this view. Now it appears, as stated by the Lord Ordinary in the case of Gibson v. Murray, that in the case of Crieff v. Fowlis-Wester the parish of the father's settlement could not be ascertained, and the mother had an industrial settlement acquired by thirteen years' residence. It appears from the report that the father had no residential settlement, and nothing is said about his birth settlement. I think, therefore, that it must be assumed that in the Crieff case the father's settlement could not be ascertained. Accordingly that case does not militate against the views expressed in the later decisions above cited.

Taking next the cases of Carmichael and Gibson it is perfectly clear that in these cases the father had no settlement in Scotland, and accordingly all that was decided was that in these circumstances the children who were in pupillarity fell to be supported by the mother's parish of settlement, and not by their own birth parishes, as that would have led to the dispersion of the family. These decisions accordingly do not encroach upon the broad general rule above referred to, and which I think must govern the present case.

The law applicable to this case may be shortly summed up as follows:—

1. A legitimate pupil child on the death of his father takes a derivative settlement in the parish in which his father had a settlement at the date of his death.

2. But in the case where the mother of the pupil child survives his father, and acquires a settlement in a parish other than the parish of the father's settlement, the pupil, in the case of his becoming a pauper, is entitled to be relieved by the parish of his mother's settlement. The liability of the mother's parish rests on two grounds: (a) that it is the policy of the poor law to avoid the dispersion of a family; and (b) that in such a case it is the mother who is truly the pauper, the children being viewed as her dependants.

3. In the event, however, of the mother's death after acquiring a settlement in a particular parish, the liability of that parish for the support of her pupil child ceases to exist, and the suspended liability of the deceased father's parish to support the pupil child revives.

4. The said liability of the mother's parish ceases at her death in whatever way her settlement in such parish may have been acquired, whether by industrial residence, or re-marriage, or otherwise, the reason for such cessation being that the grounds on which the mother's parish is made liable in preference to the father's necessarily cease to exist on the occurrence of her death.

I cannot reconcile the decision in Grant v. Reid, 1860, 22 D. 1110, with the decisions above referred to, and I accordingly must hold that it falls to be disregarded as not authoritative. I concur in holding that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute ought to be recalled and decree pronounced in favour of the pursuers as concluded for, with expenses in both Courts.—18*th June* 1907.

65. Rollands v. Rolland.

Justiciary Cases—Small Debt—Appeal—Deviation in Point of Form—Substantial Injustice—Proof of Counter-claim Allowed Without Notice Thereof Being Given—Lien—Small Debt (Scotland) Act 1837 (7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict. cap. 41), sects. 11, 31—Small Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 26), sect. 2.

Appeal.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire at Glasgow (Boyd), assoilzieing the defender in an action at the instance of the appellants.

The note of appeal set forth the facts and the grounds of appeal as follows, viz.:—

On 18th March 1907 the appellants took out a summons against the respondent to appear in the Sheriff Small Debt Court at Glasgow on 25th March 1907, to answer to a claim for delivery of (1) two portraits of pursuers, and (2) four policies of the Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd., in the name of pursuers or either of them, the premiums on which, up till January 1907, were paid by or on behalf of the female pursuer.

On the case being called in Court before Mr Sheriff Boyd on 25th March 1907, defender admitted that the portraits and policies were the property of the pursuers, and stated that he was willing to deliver the portraits now, but he would not deliver the policies except on payment of two and a half years' premiums thereon, amounting to £7, 0s. 10d., which he alleged he had paid in respect thereof. The pursuers denied that the defender had so paid. The pursuers' agent, however, took the following exceptions to the defence and to the procedure thereanent: (1) that the defender had served no counter-claim on the pursuers, or given notice in any way of his defence; and (2) that the defence by way of counter-claim was incompetent in itself.

The Sheriff-Substitute repelled the objection, admitted evidence in support of the defence stated, and thereafter having again heard parties' agents, made avizandum.

Rollands v. Rolland.

On 28th March 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute, without further hearing or attendance of parties, issued the following interlocutor, viz. :—"Continues till 15th April next in Court for delivery as craved on payment of £7, 0s. 10d. to the defender," the summons being marked by him on the back thus :—"Sustains the defence; pursuers to have delivery on payment of £7, 0s. 10d. to the defender. J. B."

On 15th April 1907, when the case was again called in Court, pursuers' agent renewed his objections, stated at the first calling, to the competency of the counter-claim for £7, 0s. 10d., and also objected to the competency of the interlocutor superseding decree for delivery till payment of the counter-claim, and craved decree of delivery de plano, with expenses. He also tendered a formal Minute covering said objections. The Sheriff-Substitute declined to receive same, and, as moved by the respondent's agent, granted the defender absolvitor with expenses, for which he decerned against the pursuers.

The appellants consider themselves aggrieved by the said interlocutor and decree, and complain thereof, and seek relief against the same for the following reasons, and for others to be stated at the hearing hereof :—First, Because the said defence was absolutely incompetent, being an attempt to counter-claim money against delivery of moveables; Second, because the Sheriff-Substitute (apart from the incompetency of the defence) acted contrary to the express terms of sect. 11 of the Small Debt (Scotland) Act 1837, in admitting the counter-claim for £7, 0s. 10d., no counter-claim having been served on pursuers in terms thereof; Third, because the Sheriff-Substitute, in so admitting evidence for and entertaining said defence, acted with malice and oppression in the sense of sect. 31 of the said Small Debt (Scotland) Act 1837, and he also wilfully deviated in point of form from the statutory enactments, causing substantial injustice to the pursuers.

The Small Debt (Scotland) Act 1837 provides :—

"Sect. 11. Where any defender intends to plead any counter account or claim against the debt, demand, or penalty pursued for, the defender shall serve a copy of such counter account or claim by an officer on the pursuer . . . . at least one free day before the day of appearance, otherwise the same shall not be heard or allowed to be pleaded, except with the pursuer's consent, but action shall be reserved for the same."

Sect. 31 provides for appeal to the Court of Justiciary "only when founded on the ground of corruption or malice, and oppression on the part of the Sheriff, or on such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, or have prevented substantial justice from having been done, or on incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction of the Sheriff."

The Small Debt Amendment (Scotland) Act 1889 provides :—

"Sect. 2. Where a party claims to be owner, or to be entitled to the possession of any corporeal moveables, the value of which shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff not to exceed £12, and which are wrongfully withheld from him, he may apply in the Small Debt Court for an order for delivery thereof, and the Sheriff may grant such order accordingly. . . ."

The following cases were cited at the discussion :—Taylor v. Ormond & Co., 1906, 8 F. (J.) 76; Buchanan v. Glasgow Corporation Water works Commissioners, 1862, 4 Irv. 225.

The Court sustained the appeal; found that in attaching as a condition of implement of the claim for delivery the payment of £7, 0s. 10d. without service of a counter-claim there was on the part of the Sheriff-Substitute such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as had prevented substantial justice from being done; recalled the interlocutors appealed against; and remitted to the Sheriff-Substitute to grant decree of delivery in terms of the Summons.

Lord Mackenzie.—I have come to be of opinion that this is a case where a counter-claim should have been served. It is no doubt true that when sect. 11 of the Small Debt Act was drafted there was no provision for action for delivery of corporeal moveables. Such provision, however, was made by sect. 2 of the Small Debt Amendment Act 1889. But it appears to me that when an action for delivery is brought and the defence stated is, "You are not entitled to delivery, because I have a claim against you for a certain pecuniary amount," that in effect is just a demand under sect. 11 of the Small Debt Act 1837, and that was just the position taken up by the pursuers' agent. He objected to there not having been a counter-claim served upon him under sect. 11. He appears to have taken part in the proof, but I do not think he was thereby prejudiced. He repeated his objection after the proof, and again at the continued diet on 15th April, when he lodged the formal Minute. Therefore I think there was a deviation in point of form on the part of the Sheriff-Substitute, and I think that in result the deviation has prevented substantial justice being done, because, as matters stand, the defender has been assoilzied from the demand for delivery of the policies, although they were apparently the property of the pursuers, while the defender's claim is unaffected. The right to demand payment is entirely reserved by sect. 11. Therefore, anything I do will not prejudice or prejudge the defender's right to get payment of any monies he may have expended on the policies. But I think there was deviation resulting in such substantial injustice as to bring the case within the principle in Taylor v. Ormond, although no doubt the circumstances there were somewhat different.—9th May 1907.

Fraud—Agent and Client—Part Repayment of Principal Sum in a Bond to Solicitor of Bondholder—Misappropriation by Solicitor — Solicitor Not Authorised to Receive Payment of Principal—Held that Debtor, Who Had Paid to Agent of Creditor Sums the Agent Was Not Authorised by his Principal to Receive, Must Suffer for Fraud of Agent.

The following statement of the circumstances giving rise to this Note of Suspension is taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

"The material facts in this case are quite simple. The complainer, John Peden, who is a miner, in the early summer of 1903 wished a loan of £100 on the security of property in Armadale. He applied to Mr James Aitken, then of the firm of Aitken & Gibb, writers, Glasgow, for the loan, and was told by him that a client of his (the respondent) was willing to grant it. The respondent, John Graham, farmer, North Rigg, Shotts, remitted £100 to Mr Aitken on 9th June, and on 24th June the complainer called and signed a bond in favour of the respondent for that amount. At this interview the complainer and his wife both say that he asked Mr Aitken whether he would be willing to accept repayment of the loan by instalments, and was assured that he would. The bond was then signed by the complainer; but instead of receiving £100 from Mr Aitken he only received about £79. The difference between these two sums is satisfactorily accounted for only to the extent of about £5, being the business account payable by the borrower in respect of the loan. The balance, I am afraid, there is no doubt was appropriated by Mr Aitken, who took advantage of the complainer's ignorance of business to defraud him. This sum, however, is not in question.

"After the transaction was complete the complainer received, prior to each half-yearly term, a notice from Mr Aitken on behalf of the respondent, asking payment of the interest that was shortly to become payable, and at each term he paid Mr Aitken the amount due. At Martinmas 1904, when paying the half-year's interest, he also paid £20 to account of the principal sum and received the receipt No. 7 of process, which bears to be given on behalf of John Graham, Esq. A payment of equal amount was made on 9th November 1905, and a receipt in similar terms, No. 9 of process, granted by Mr Aitken. These two sums of £20 each were duly entered to the credit of the respondent in the books of Aitken & Gibb, ' it instead of remitting the money to the respondent as he received it, Mr Aitken embezzled it. He continued to account to the respondent for interest on the full sum contained in the bond, but only claimed and received from the complainer interest on the reduced amount. He became bankrupt in 1906, and it was then discovered that he had defrauded the respondent of other sums. The question in this case is on which of the two innocent parties the loss of the £40 must fall."

At Martinmas 1906 the respondent himself requested the complainer to pay the half-year's interest due at that term direct to himself, and the complainer sent the respondent a remittance of £1, 4s., being the interest on the balance of £60 then due, and being the same amount as the complainer had paid to the said James Aitken for the half-year to Whitsunday 1906. The respondent, however, returned the same, and refused to accept interest on the said balance of £60, and demanded payment of interest on the whole sum of £100 contained in the said bond. The respondent further caused a charge to be given to the complainer upon 22nd December 1906 for payment of the said principal sum of £100, with interest thereon at 5 per cent. from Whitsunday 1906, and liquidate penalties.

The complainer now brought this note to suspend the said charge and whole grounds and warrants thereof. The complainer in the note offered to pay to the respondent the principal sum of £60 with interest thereon. The contentions of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the debate:—Mackintosh v. Pitcairn, 1851, 24 Sc. Jur. 81; Rose v. Spavens, 1880, 7 R. 925; Richardson v. M'Geoch's Trs., 1898, 1 F. 145; Withington v. Tate, 1869, L.R. 4 Ch. App. 288; Duncan v. Clyde Trs., 13 D. 518; Macdonald v. Warren, 1889, 27 S.L.R. 46.

The Lord Ordinary refused the note, with expenses.

Lord Salvesen [after narrating the facts as quoted above].—It is not surprising that the complainer acted as he did. He had received the money originally from the hands of Aitken on the express footing that he was to be at liberty to repay the loan by instalments. Every term he received notice from Aitken to pay the interest, and he paid it on his receipt without question. He might therefore well infer that Aitken was authorised by his client to receive payment of the instalments; and even a man better versed in business matters than the complainer would scarcely have insisted on the agent producing his authority, or handing him partial discharges as a condition of making the payments. On the other hand, he knew that the money had been borrowed from the respondent, and that he was his creditor in the bond. In these circumstances, unless Aitken is proved to have had authority to receive the payments on behalf of his principal, the loss must fall upon the complainer, for it was he who enabled the law agent to commit the fraud by placing the money in his hands, without ascertaining whether it ever reached his creditor. The case of Withington v. Tate, L.R. 4 Ch. 288, is a distinct authority to this effect; and although it is an English decision, I apprehend that there is no distinction between the law of England and Scotland in this matter.

The complainer, apparently anticipating this view of the law, has averred in Stat. 5 that Aitken was authorised by the respondent to receive payments on his behalf in connection with the loan in question; and the complainer's counsel contended that he had proved authority. Unfortunately, Aitken was not available as a witness; as it appears that subsequent to his sequestration he has become mentally deranged, and is now in an asylum. The authority averred must therefore be proved out of the mouth of the respondent himself, and I have come to be of opinion that his evidence does not establish it. Although Aitken acted as his ordinary law agent and had authority to collect interest on bonds on his behalf, the respondent denies that he ever authorised him to receive payment of the principal. An attempt to show that on a previous occasion Aitken had received repayment of money on his behalf completely failed. It is true that the respondent admitted that he would have been quite willing to receive payment by instalments from the complainer through Aitken if Aitken had handed him the money. But it is perfectly plain that the respondent not merely did not know that the payments to account had been made, but was entitled to believe from the statements rendered to him by Aitken that the whole sum in the bond remained due. I cannot therefore hold that he authorised Aitken to receive the two payments in question on his behalf. In law I hold that the complainer made Mr Aitken in this matter his agent to pay the money to his creditor; and that he must therefore bear the consequences of the agent's fraud. I regret that I have to reach this decision, as I think the case is one of very great hardship to the complainer.—7th June 1907.

This was an action of divorce raised by a husband against his wife on the ground of adultery. No defences were lodged, but appearance was made for the defender at the proof, when lenocinium was attempted to be established, the acts of adultery being admitted. The facts upon which the defender relied fully appear in the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

The Lord Ordinary granted decree as craved.

Lord Guthrie.—No defences were lodged in this case. But the defender Mrs Erskine, accompanied by an attendant from Girgenti Inebriate Reformatory, where she has been in confinement since January, appeared at the proof by counsel and agents, and was examined on her own behalf.

The cross-examination of the pursuer's witnesses and the examination of the defender were directed to establish condonation and lenocinium. In view of the defender's admissions as to her life on the streets after the last possible act of connection with her husband, the plea of condonation was not pressed. But Mr Spens submitted an ingenuous argument in support of the plea of lenocinium. He maintained that, when the pursuer married the defender in 1902, he must have known that she had been living, not only a drunken but also an immoral life. This was denied by the pursuer, but I think it inevitably follows from the proved facts. He next founded on the admitted fact that in January 1903 the pursuer went to America, leaving the defender in Glasgow, where she had been living as a prostitute before the marriage, and that until his return to Glasgow in 1906 he sent her no money. From these facts Mr Spens deduced such connivance on the part of the pursuer as barred him from founding on the defender's immoral conduct.

Even if these facts stood alone, I do not think they would imply that willing consent to the wife's guilty conduct which has been held sufficient to bar a husband from the remedy of divorce (Walker, 1796, cited in Rogers, 1830, 3 Haggard's Ecclesiastical Reports, p. 59, per Lord Stowell; Stone, 1844, 1 Rob. 101, per Dr Lushington; Marris, 1862, 31 L.J. P. and M. 69, per Mr Justice Cresswell; Wemyss, 1866, 4 M. 662, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis).

But they do not stand alone. Before the husband left for America he made arrangements for the defender going into a Home with the view of curing her of her drunken habits, and ultimately of her joining him in America. When he left, his wife was residing safely with his mother. That the arrangement failed, and that the defender returned to her old life notwithstanding all the persevering efforts for her reform by that good Samaritan Mrs Adair, was not the pursuer's fault. He wrote to her from America, but got no answer. He heard the worst reports of her conduct, and in these circumstances it was not wonderful that he did not make her remittances.

I accordingly grant decree of divorce.—21*st June* 1907.

Reclaiming Notes against Interlocutors of Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Mackenzie.

This was an action for payment of a sum of £411, 7s. 11d., brought by the trustees of the late John Brown against David Horne, builder, Glasgow.

The said John Brown, and after his death the pursuers, had made advances to the defender or his nominee on the security of subjects in Belmont Street, Glasgow. On 4th November 1884 the pursuers entered into possession of the security subjects. They remained in possession until 29th September 1903. The pursuers produced an account which brought out the sum due by the defender to them at £1947, 14s. 11d.

1st Div. Brown's Trustees v. Horne.

On said date of 29th September 1903 an arrangement was come to between the parties in pursuance whereof the pursuers disburdened the security subjects, and the defender paid the sum of £1536, 7s. to the pursuers. The pursuers reserved their right to recover the balance of £411, 7s. 11d. (the sum sued for). The defender reserved his defences against the claim for £411, 7s. 11d., and he also reserved the right to claim repayment of the sum of £67, 10s. included in the sum of £1536, 7s. paid by him to the pursuers.

The defender averred that the sum of £67, 10s. consisted of advance fees with which he had been debited but which had not been paid to him. The sum of £411, 7s. 11d. consisted of law agents' charges in connection with managing the property and interest thereon. The defender objected to this item on, inter alia, the ground, stated in his fifth plea in law, that one of the trustees was himself a partner in the firm of law agents to whom the account was incurred.

On 13th December 1904 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) repelled the fifth plea in law for the defender. His opinion is reported ut supra.

The defender reclaimed.

On 15th March 1905 the Court adhered.

Lord Adam.—The only question argued to us under this reclaiming note was whether the Lord Ordinary was right in repelling the fifth plea in law stated for the defender.

The question arises in these circumstances:—The pursuers are the trustees of the late Mr Brown. Mr David Craig, of the firm of Messrs Craig & Risk, writers in Glasgow, was, and is, one of the trustees appointed by Mr Brown.

Mr Brown was the proprietor of certain building ground situated at Hillhead, Glasgow. By minute of agreement and sale dated in March and July 1882, he sold part of this ground to a Miss Horne, who was the nominee of the defender, and whose actings through the transactions in question he adopts. By minute of agreement and sale dated in February 1883 Mr Brown's trustees sold certain other parts of the ground to the defender.

In order to enable the defender to erect the buildings which he was bound to erect on the ground, Mr Brown and his trustees agreed to make, and made, advances of money from time to time to him.

In security of these advances the defender granted to the pursuers a bond and disposition in security over the subjects in question dated 11th November 1882, and also two ex facie absolute dispositions dated respectively 9th June and 6th July 1883.

It further appears that the pursuers in November 1884 entered into possession of the subjects under the bond and disposition in security and the ex facie absolute dispositions and relative letter of date 4th November of that year.

1st Div.

Brown's Trustees v. Horne.

Lord Adam.

The pursuers continued in the possession and management of the subjects until 26th September 1903, and of course had to account to the defenders for their intromissions during that time.

They claimed that a sum of £1947, 14s. 11d. still remained due to them. The defender admitted that a sum of £1536, 7s. still remained due by him, leaving a balance of £411, 7s. 11d. in dispute between the parties. Thereupon the parties came to an agreement, which will be found in a back letter dated 29th September 1903, addressed by the defender to the pursuers and accepted by them, under which the defender was retrocessed in the subjects, under reservation on his part of his right to claim repetition of a sum of £67, 10s. included in the payment made by him, and on the pursuers' part, of their right to sue for and recover the balance of £411, 7s. 11d. claimed by them.

The present action is brought to recover payment of that sum.

As I have previously stated, Mr David Craig is one of Mr Brown's trustees, and it appears that the trustees employed his firm of Messrs Craig & Risk to act as their agents and factors in the management of the security subjects of which they were in possession.

It is stated that the sum sued for consists almost entirely of professional charges and commission debited to the trustees by Messrs Craig & Risk in connection with their management and disposal of the properties.

In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary says that both parties concurred in asking him to dispose of the defender's fifth plea in law, which is in these terms:—"The legal charges sued for having been incurred by the trustees of John Brown to a firm of which one of them is a partner, are illegal, and the defender is not liable therefor." The Lord Ordinary has disposed of the plea by repelling it, and I think he is right.

As I understand the law there is nothing illegal in a body of trustees employing one of their number as agent or factor. It is true that in a question with the beneficiaries under the trust, if the trust deed is silent on the subject, such agent or factor can only recover his outlay on the ground that he is not entitled to make a profit out of the trust. But if the beneficiaries do not object, I do not know that it is in the mouth of any third party to do so. But it is unnecessary to consider that question in this case, because the trust deed contains a clause empowering the trustees to appoint any one or more of their own number, or any other person, to be law agent or factor for the trust, and to allow the usual remuneration for services rendered, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is said that the trustees have not yet paid Messrs Craig & Risk's account, but that is immaterial, because beyond all question they are liable for and bound to pay it.

I think, accordingly, that it is the duty of the Auditor to tax the account as if it had been incurred to an entirely independent agent or factor, and to allow the "usual remuneration" in such cases—for which the defender will be liable.

I think this is so entirely a matter of Scots law and practice that it is unnecessary to consider the law of England as regards a mortgagor and mortgagee, but I may say that I concur with the Lord Ordinary's observations on that matter.

I think the reclaiming note should be refused, and on the same grounds the reclaiming note in the other case (i.e. that regarding the Simpson Street subjects).

Lord M'Laren concurred.

Lord Kincairney.—This action by Brown's trustees against David Horne, builder, Glasgow, has arisen out of transactions between them relating to certain building ground in Glasgow which belonged to Brown's trustees and was purchased from them by Horne, with the view of erecting buildings on it. It may be premised that David Horne is the only defender—Elizabeth Horne, whose name is used in some of the deeds, having no interest, and being merely the nominee of the defender David Horne. The reason why her name was used has not been explained, and is, I suppose, of no consequence. The record appears to me to be complicated and rather obscure, but the main facts seem to be these:—By minute of agreement between Brown's trustees and Elizabeth Horne (nominally) dated 14th March and 28th July 1882, Brown's trustees agreed to sell and she (for David Horne) to purchase portions of the building ground which belonged to Brown's trustees, the price agreed on being a ground annual of £70.

Horne had not sufficient funds for building the houses which he contemplated, and he borrowed £2200 from Brown's trustees to enable him to do so; and it was agreed by back letter dated 28th July 1882 that until that advance was repaid Brown's trustees should not be obliged to grant a title. Notwithstanding this agreement, I understand that from time to time dispositions of various portions of the building ground were granted by Brown's trustees to Horne; and Horne, on the other hand, executed a bond and disposition in security for £2300, dated 11th November and recorded 19th December 1882, over the subjects which Brown's trustees had disponed to him.

In Condescendence 5 Brown's trustees aver that as the advances by them had not been repaid, they entered into possession of the subjects in virtue of the bond and disposition in security, and also in virtue of a letter, dated 4th November 1884, addressed to Brown's trustees by Elizabeth Horne, and granted apparently merely to save the expense of an action of maills and duties, which letter bore to authorise Craig & Risk, writers, Glasgow, "your agents and factors" (i.e. agents and factors of Brown's trustees), to uplift and apply the rents. For this letter David Horne accepts responsibility. In his answer to this condescendence Horne admits that the pursuers "entered into possession of the security subjects," but states that they had not accounted for the rents collected. It thus appears that the parties were agreed that the position was this, that Horne was proprietor of the subjects in question, and that Brown's trustees were in possession as creditors under the disposition in security granted by him, and were uplifting the rents as creditors under that deed. Horne, on the other hand, was the owner, and was indebted to Brown's trustees in the sums which they had advanced, and Brown's trustees were in the course of recouping themselves of their advances by uplifting and applying the rents. I think the record is framed on that view, which appears to me to be correct. In this action, arising out of that condition of affairs, Brown's trustees conclude for payment of £411, 7s. 11d., which is the difference between £1947, 14s. 11d., which they regard as the true balance to which they are entitled in accounting with Horne, and the sum of £1536, 7s. which Horne admits to be due and has paid. But he disputes his liability for the balance of £411, 7s. 11d. And the question in this case is whether Brown's trustees are entitled to receive, and Horne is bound to pay, that sum. It consists mainly of professional charges debited against Brown's trustees by their agents, Craig & Risk, in connection with the properties of which Brown's trustees had entered into possession, and of commission on the rents collected by Craig & Risk.

The pursuers, Brown's trustees, maintain that, in accounting for the rents collected by them, they are entitled to take credit for this sum as being part of the expense of collecting the rents and managing the subjects into possession of which they had entered.

The defender Horne, while not disputing the claim of Brown's trustees to their expenses generally, disputes their right to take credit for this particular sum, and he has expressed the ground of his objection in his fifth plea, which is thus expressed: "The legal charges sued for having been incurred by the trustees of John Brown to a firm of which one of them is a partner, are illegal, and the defender is not liable therefor." This plea the Lord Ordinary has repelled, and the question which has been discussed is that which is expressed in that plea. The other subordinate findings have not been debated.

The fact on which the plea is based is this, that Mr Craig, who is a partner of the firm of Craig & Risk, law agents for Brown's trustees, is also one of these trustees, and, as such, a pursuer of this action.

The question appears to be simply this, whether creditors in possession under a bond and disposition in security are entitled in the circumstances to credit for the professional charges incurred to the law agent whom they employ in collecting the rents and managing the property. Now that is a question with which the courts of Scotland are quite familiar, and for the solution of which it seems hardly to be necessary to resort to the law of England.

The first contention of the defender is that, even if they were entitled to take credit for the expense incurred to a law agent in the general case, they are not entitled in this case, because the law agent whom they employed, or one of the firm of such agents, is himself a trustee. As a general principle that plea might be good, if the truster had not specially authorised the employment of one of the trustees as agent, on the principle that a trustee cannot profit by his office. But in this case the trust deed confers that power in perfectly general terms. The clause has not itself been printed. But it is averred by the pursuers "that in Mr Brown's trust disposition and settlement his trustees were empowered to appoint any one or more of their own number, or any other person, to be law agent or factor for the trust, and to allow the usual remuneration for services rendered, any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding"; and that averment is not denied on record, and was not disputed at the debate; and it is well settled that in such a case an agent who is a trustee may be employed to do professional work for the trust, and may charge the usual accounts against the trust estate. In this case Craig & Risk would be entitled to recover the usual professional remuneration from Brown's trustees which any other law agent not a trustee would, if employed by the trustees, have been entitled to charge against the trust: See Goodsir v. Carruther, 1858, 20 D. 1141; Ommaney v. Smith, 1854, 16 D. 721. Such charges, therefore, become a part of the legitimate expenses of the trust. But then the defender, Horne, maintains that although Craig & Risk's account might be legitimately charged against the trust, it did not follow that it was chargeable against him; and it seems to be maintained as a general rule that a creditor in possession employing a law agent or factor to manage the property and collect the rents could not in any case take credit for the law agent's account incurred in collecting the rents, and that a factor's fee was not an item of expense which could be allowed to the creditor. For that proposition he cited the case of Kildonan v. Douglas Heron & Co., 16th June 1785, M. 14135, a case which certainly appears to support the defender's contention.

But Mr Johnston for Brown's trustees maintained that the report of this case was erroneous, and was not justified by the session papers, and that the judgment, as reported, went beyond the prayer of the petition. I think both the report and also the record as appearing from the session papers are obscure and unsatisfactory. But besides, it does not appear that the judgment, as reported, has been followed in practice. It is cited in a note in Bell's Com., I. 701. But it is strongly questioned by Professor More in his Notes on Stair, Vol. I. cclxi, and also by Professor Bell, Lectures, II. 1076; and it appears to be contrary to general practice.

I think these considerations sufficient for judgment, and that it is unnecessary to consider the law as to the trust said to be implied in a bond and disposition in security when the creditor enters into possession.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be affirmed, and that the case should be remitted to his Lordship for further procedure.—15th March 1905.

On 15th November 1906 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) interponed authority to a joint minute whereby the parties agreed "to refer the whole cause and the question of expenses therein to Mr A. J. F. Wedderburn, S.S.C., Edinburgh, as judicial referee."

On 9th January 1907 the defender submitted to the referee the following Minute of Proposed Amendment of Record:—

The defender moved the judicial referee to allow him to amend the Record in the action by adding to Answer 7 the following:—"In any event, the defender is entitled to credit for the income tax on interest to the amount of £2217, 17s. 10d. debited by the pursuers to him in the account, bringing out a balance of £1947, 14s. 11d. specified by the pursuers in Condescendence 6."

A statement showing how the said sum of £2217, 17s. 10d. is arrived at is herewith produced and referred to, and to add the following plea in law:—"In any event, the defender is entitled to credit for the income tax specified in his answer to Condescendence 7."

On 8th May 1907 the referee refused to allow the proposed amendment. In a note of Proposed Findings the referee said:—

If the referee were of opinion that he could competently open up and amend the Record, he would be disposed to give the defender an opportunity of withdrawing the objection in question from the Simpson Street case; but he has arrived at the conclusion that he can only dispose of the case as it stands on the Record remitted to him. The process, notwithstanding the remit, continues to depend before the Court, and it appears to the referee that if he were to authorise amendments of the Record, he would be usurping the functions of the Court, and in the end might be reporting on a totally different case from that which had been remitted. Reference is made to Mackay's Manual, p. 279, par 1. The referee is all the more constrained to this view for the reason that involved in the question of the defender's right to make the amendment, there appears to be the question whether the defender, by the terms of the back letter of 29th September 1903 (Appendix A), is barred from raising any objections to the account sued on, other than the objection to the advance fees and the objections to the items making up the difference between the totals of Statements A and B. It seems clear to the referee that he would be acting ultra vires in disposing of any such question.

If the defender wishes to bring the amendment before the Court, the referee will delay issuing his final report to give him an opportunity of doing so.

On 25th May the defender craved the Lord Ordinary for leave to amend the Record in the terms proposed before the referee.

The Lord Ordinary refused the defender's motion. His Lordship issued no opinion with his interlocutor.

The Defender reclaimed, and argued: What was referred was "the whole cause," and that included the cause with all its potentialities by way of amendment (Hope v. Derwent Rolling Mills Co. Ltd., 1905, 7 F. 837, per the Lord President at p. 845). The question at issue between the parties was whether the defender was due the sum of £411, 7s. 11d. to the pursuers. The claim for repayment of income tax was a good defence to the pursuers' claim. It was therefore within the fines compromissi, and the referee, in refusing to allow the amendment, was refusing to exercise his jurisdiction. In point of fact, the referee was willing to allow the amendment, but thought that to do so would be to usurp the functions of the Court. The judicial reference did not take the case out of Court. The Court still had jurisdiction to see that the referee had fully exercised his powers (Shiels v. Shiels' Trs., 1874, 1 R. 502 at p. 506, per L.P. Inglis). The case being still in Court, the Court could exercise all the powers of amendment conferred by the Court of Session Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. cap. 100), sect. 29. The statement in Mackay's Manual, p. 279, was misleading. The cases cited (Roberts v. Roberts, 1833, 12 S. 210, and Clyne's Trs. v. Edinburgh Oil Gas Light Co., 1835, 2 Sh. and M'L. 243) were distinguishable. In these cases the referee had given his decision, whereas in the present case the questions were still pending before the referee. Even if the reference were in the same position as an ordinary arbitration the amendment was competent and should have been allowed (Moore v. M'Cosh, 1903, 5 F. 946; Christison's Trs. v. Callender Brodie, 1906, 8 F. 928, at p. 931).

Argued for the Respondents: The only questions left open by the agreement of 29th September 1903 were (1) whether the defender was liable for the sum of £411, 7s. 11d., and (2) whether the defender was entitled to repayment of the sum of £67, 10s. The present claim related to income tax on sums of interest included in the sum of £1536, 7s. paid by defender to pursuers, and was thus an attempt to rip up the transaction of 29th September 1903. A reference of the whole cause was a reference of the cause as it stood at the date of the reference (Roberts v. Roberts, cit.). Any other view would make the referee the judge of questions which the parties never intended to refer. The argument that the Court retained all the powers of amendment conferred by the Court of Session Act (sect. 29) was fallacious. It involved the consequence that the Court might introduce a new defender. The proposed amendment was therefore incompetent. In any event the question whether the amendment should be allowed was for the referee. He had decided that question adversely to the defender, and his decision could not be reversed by the Court (Mackenzie v. Girvan, 1840, 3 D 318; Walker v. Stewart, 1855, 2 Macq. 424 at p. 428).

The Court adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord M'Laren.—This reclaiming note arises out of an attempt, in a case which has been made the subject of a judicial reference, to have the record amended. Two questions have to be considered: first, whether this is a case in which a party has any right to make an amendment; and secondly, if so, how is it to be made, whether by the arbiter or by the Lord Ordinary, who still has the control of the process, at least for the purpose of making the arbiter's award effectual.

We must keep in view that this is not an action of accounting between the parties in which everything was open. The parties had come to an arrangement under which, out of a sum of over £1900 which was claimed by the party making the advances, more than £1500 had been paid, and the balance of £411, 17s. 11d. was alone the subject of dispute between the parties. Further, it had been agreed that by repaying the £1500 the builder (to whom the advances had been made) was not to be prejudiced in his objections to the outstanding claim of £411. Accordingly the pursuers, who made the advances, brought this action for the purpose of enforcing their claim to the £411, and, in consequence of the reservation that had been made at the time of payment of the £1500, it was still open to the defender to dispute such items as he might select out of the unpaid balance of £411. Then after accounts had been given in and some progress made with the case, the parties referred the whole cause to the decision of Mr Wedderburn in a judicial reference.

Now it has been made perfectly clear to me that the claim which it is now proposed to introduce by way of amendment—a claim for deduction of income tax upon interest—is one which, if it were to be made at all, should have been made at the time that the interim payment was arranged, because that interim payment consisted to a large extent of interest on advances. That was the time to claim abatement, in the usual way, of the amount of the creditor's income tax upon his interest. But that was not done; and it is quite clear that the point that is raised now is not with regard to a sum that enters into the constitution of the £411 that was reserved for the decision of the arbiter, but is an entirely separable and separate claim, and is, moreover, a claim for repayment of what had already been settled by the parties in the accounting.

I am not surprised in these circumstances that the arbitrator refused to allow the amendment proposed. He could not deal with the subject except on an amendment of the pleadings, and it is a condition of the case that these items of income tax are no part of the £411 that was reserved for the consideration of the arbiter. The arbiter, without giving an opinion, was willing that the parties should have an opportunity of going to the Lord Ordinary, who, he thought, might possibly have larger powers in the direction of introducing new matter into the action; but the Lord Ordinary has not taken a different view from the arbiter, and has refused the application for an amendment of the record.

These are all the considerations that enter into the question except this, that I observe it is not stated by the party who makes this claim—the debtor in the building advance account—it is not stated by him that he had in fact paid his creditor's income tax to the Inland Revenue Department; and of course the condition under which a debtor is allowed to deduct income tax in settling with his creditor is that he has either paid, or admits his liability to pay, that sum to the Inland Revenue, on the principle of the tax being collected at its source. I do not think, however, that this circumstance affects our decision, although it may possibly account for the claim not having been made at an earlier stage.

I think that the Lord Ordinary, and also the arbiter—though with his judgment we are not at present concerned—has rightly dealt with this application, in holding that he had no power to give effect to it. The question referred to arbitration was the whole cause, which must be taken to mean the cause as it existed when the minute of judicial reference was signed. I cannot conceive that in referring the whole cause, the parties intended to reserve a right to litigate upon any new matter between them which might transpire, and which one of them might think could be introduced into the cause. On the contrary, I think their object was to put an end to litigation as quickly as possible, and to substitute a summary method of procedure before the arbiter for the procedure of an ordinary action.

The power of amendment is a very important incident of procedure in our Courts, and I should be sorry to see it in any way abridged; but it appears to me to be essentially one of those things that belong to the region of the lex fori, and it exists only so long as the action continues to be, not merely a depending action for the purpose of decree, but a going action for the purpose of adjudicating upon the points in dispute. It does not follow that similar powers of amendment exist in arbitration cases, because the powers of courts of law to introduce new matter into actions have been not only different at different times, but have been different in regard to different Courts; and it cannot be said that the powers that belong to the Court of Session are any part of the powers of an arbiter, any more than those that belong more especially to the Sheriff Court.

In this case if the claim which is now made had, in the judgment of the arbiter, fallen within the conclusion of the Summons—if it had been a claim that could in any way have been held to form part of the £411 sued for—then I do not doubt that the arbitrator could have allowed a supplementary claim to the effect of raising the point; but as it was a claim independent of that sum I think it is equally clear that he was right in refusing to deal with it, because it was not a part of the case that was remitted to him. I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Kinnear.—I also think we must adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The purpose of the reclaiming note is to obtain a judgment which will have the effect of reversing the decision of the judicial referee; and that creates a formidable difficulty in the reclaimer's way at the outset, because the award of a judicial referee is just as final as the award of any other arbitrator. But then the reclaimer says, and says correctly, that an arbiter is never the final and exclusive judge of his own jurisdiction, and that if he exceeds his jurisdiction, or falls short of it, he may be corrected by the Court; and his case is, as I understand it, that, in refusing to allow the amendment of the record which had been brought before him, he refused to exercise the jurisdiction committed to him by the contract of submission.

I should be very sorry to say that a judicial referee or any other arbiter can have no power to amend a record. It seems to me to be clear enough that he has quite sufficient control of the procedure before him to allow any amendment which he thinks reasonable and proper, provided it does not go beyond the scope of the questions submitted to him. He may alter if he thinks fit, or allow the party to alter, the pleadings before him, but he cannot alter the contract of reference. And therefore the question which arises in this case is necessarily whether he was asked to do something which was within the contract, or whether he was right in thinking that he was asked to do what was incompetent because it was subjecting to his decision a question that was not within the contract.

1st Div.

Brown's Trustees v. Horne.

Lord Kinnear.

Now the reclaimer argued that the question which he wished to raise was necessarily within the contract of reference, because the subject referred to the judicial referee was the whole cause, and then the learned counsel said, "Look at the summons and you will see it is a summons concluding for payment of £411, 17s. 11d.; and in referring the whole case involved in that conclusion to the judicial referee, the parties necessarily referred to him to consider whether that sum of £411, 17s. 11d. is really due or not; and therefore referred to him every claim that could possibly be made by the defender."

It may very well be that if the whole case had been referred upon the Summons alone there would have been a great deal of force in an argument of that kind; but that is not the reference that was made. A record was made up and the action proceeded so far that a judgment was pronounced by the Lord Ordinary upon the merits of one part of the case, and the Lord Ordinary's judgment was adhered to by this Court; and it was only after that, and after some subsequent procedure, that the parties agreed to refer what was still in dispute to the judicial referee. I say "what was still in dispute," because I take it to be perfectly clear that no one could obtain a judicial reference to enable the referee to reconsider what had been already decided by the Court. That was not the purpose of the reference at all; the sole purpose of the reference was to obtain his award on questions that still remained in dispute. What was referred to him was not the case that was originally instituted, but all that was left of it; and therefore the question really comes to be what was it that was left in the case at that stage.

Now I do not repeat your Lordship's examination of the details of the record. I think it enough to say that it seems to me that the purpose of this amendment is to submit to the adjudication of the referee a question that was not raised at the time that the parties agreed to refer; which is not within the record as it stood at that stage; and which is therefore not within the reference. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that we cannot hold that, in refusing to allow this amendment, the arbiter was refusing to exercise any discretion which was committed to him. Even if he had a discretion I see no reason to suppose that he exercised it wrongly. The material point is that what he was asked to do was to allow a question to be raised which had not been raised in the case originally when the reference was made, and which had therefore not been referred to him. I agree that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Pearson.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think it necessary to attend precisely to the nature of the claim made in the Summons, and more especially to the claim as it is set forth in the closed record; because I find that although the record was closed in 1904 the parties did not agree to refer "the whole cause" to Mr Wedderburn until the action had been more than two years in Court. The parties therefore had ample time to come to some kind of understanding as to the exact questions they intended to raise in the litigation. Now although in form the pursuers' claim is for payment of a sum of money, £411, 17s. 11d., that was really only the disputed balance of a much larger amount which was originally in dispute between the parties; and it is, I think, essential in disposing of this question to keep that in view.

Before the action was raised the parties met, very sensibly, in order to narrow the area of dispute; and it appears that on that occasion the pursuers claimed £1947, while the defender was only willing to pay £1536; and that meeting ended in the defender paying £1536 to the pursuers—subject only to a reservation as to a matter of £67, 10s. which has nothing to do with any of the questions raised in the present dispute. The result was that the pursuer sued the defender for the disputed sum of £411, 17s. 11d. which remained over after payment of the £1536; and the defender pleaded, first, that no part of the £411, 17s. 11d. was due; and second, that if anything was due he was entitled to a rebate of £67, 10s.

When the judicial referee took up the case the defender moved for leave to amend the record. He did so in order to add a claim for a further deduction in name of income tax, which he says ought to have been deducted from the sums of interest charged in the original account. Now, all the charges of interest from which this income tax was to be deducted were contained in that part of the original account which was settled and paid, and not in that part of the original account which was objected to, or which was within the reserved area of the dispute. Therefore the question belongs really to the settled part of the claim; and the defender's proposal amounts really to this, a claim for repayment of part of the £1536 which he has already paid.

I think the peculiarity of this case is that the area of dispute was already limited by agreement of parties before the action came into Court at all; and I cannot find that the pursuers have, by the judicial reference, agreed to any enlargement so as to include matters which I think were disposed of finally before the action ever came into Court.—12*th June* 1907.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (3), Schedule II. (8)—Process—Competency—Application for Arbitration to Fix Compensation Presented During Dependence of Proceedings to Have Memorandum of Agreement Recorded—Warrant to Record Memorandum Granted—Application Dismissed as Incompetent.

Stated Case.

(Cf. Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair, 1907, S.C. 3; 14 S.L.T. 341.)

This was an appeal by way of stated case against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Shennan) in an application for arbitration raised in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline at the instance of the Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. against Daniel Sinclair.

The case stated as follows:—

This is an application for arbitration in which the appellants requested the Sheriff, as arbiter, to find that the appellants' liability to compensate the respondent in respect of an injury sustained by him on or about 12th October 1904, while employed as a miner in the appellants' Lochhead Pit, Raith Colliery, near Lochgelly, came to an end on 25th January 1905, and to grant an order declaring the respondent's right to compensation to have ended as from and after said last-mentioned date; or alternatively, to ascertain and fix such weekly payments as might be due to the respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 in respect of such injury, and to grant an award against the appellants finding the respondent entitled to such weekly payments, beginning the first payment on 1st February 1905 for the week preceding that date, and so on weekly thereafter until such weekly payments are varied or ended by the Court.

It was admitted that on or about 12th October 1904, and for some time prior thereto, the respondent was in the employment of the appellants as a miner in their said Lochhead Pit, and that while in the course of his said employment on said date he sustained injuries which incapacitated him from work. It was also admitted that respondent had been paid compensation at the rate of 16s. 9d. per week from a fortnight after the date of said accident down to said 25th January, since which date payments had been discontinued.

The said application for arbitration was lodged on 3rd April 1906. At that time there was depending before me a petition by the respondent, Daniel Sinclair, for a special warrant to record a memorandum of agreement between himself and the appellants, which last-mentioned petition had been presented on 27th March 1906. Accordingly, on 21st April 1906, after hearing parties, I sisted procedure in the application for arbitration to await the issue of the application previously lodged by the respondent Sinclair for warrant to record the memorandum of agreement.

Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair.

After sundry procedure I granted the special warrant. On 8th January 1907 the application for arbitration was enrolled, and it was reported to me that the special warrant to record the memorandum had been brought under review of the Court of Session upon a note for an order upon the Sheriff to state a case, and had been confirmed by that Court, and that the memorandum had since been recorded. I accordingly dismissed the application for arbitration on the grounds that as an original application for arbitration it was excluded by the agreement of which a memorandum had been recorded, and that the application was not so framed that it could be treated as a petition for review of the compensation fixed by the agreement.

The Questions of Law for the opinion of the Court were:—

1. When an application for arbitration to fix compensation is presented during the dependence of proceedings to have a memorandum of agreement relating to the same compensation recorded and warrant to record said memorandum of agreement is granted in these proceedings, is it competent to proceed with the said application for arbitration?
2. In the circumstances narrated was the application for compensation rightly dismissed?

Argued for the Appellants: The application for arbitration was competent. The workman's incapacity had admittedly ceased in April 1905 (cf. Lochgelly Coal and Iron Co., 1907, S.C. 3), and accordingly the agreement founded on as in bar of the present proceedings had terminated before they began. In any event there was still a question as to the duration of the compensation under the agreement which could competently be determined in an arbitration. Alternatively the present proceedings were competent as an application for review of the compensation under the agreement.

Argued for the Respondent: The present proceedings were excluded by the existence of the agreement (Dunlop, 1901, 4 F. 203; Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, sect. 1 (3), Sched. I. 12; Act of Sederunt, 3rd June 1898, sect. 5. Nor could they be treated as an application for review under Sched. I. 12.

The Court answered the first question of law in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I think this case may be briefly and colloquially summed up by saying that the employers here have tried to sit upon two stools, and in the opinion of the Sheriff-Substitute have fallen between them. That means that I think the Sheriff-Substitute's judgment is perfectly right on both alternative grounds. He says that he "dismissed the application for arbitration on the grounds that as an original application for arbitration it was excluded by the agreement of which a memorandum had been recorded, and that the application was not so framed that it could be treated as a petition for review of the compensation fixed by the agreement." He puts two questions of law which state these two grounds, and I think we must answer these questions, the first in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

2nd Div.
Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair.
Lord Stormonth-Darling.

There was an agreement here undoubtedly, and there came to be a real question between the parties as to the duration of agreement. The accident happened on 12th October 1904, and payment was actually made down to 25th January 1905 at the full rate agreed on. Then in the opinion of the employers the total incapacity had ceased, and accordingly they discontinued that payment. The next thing was that the workman presented an application to have the agreement recorded, and the result of that was that it was recorded after considerable procedure. During the course of that procedure the employers apparently woke up and presented a curious kind of application for arbitration of a rather hybrid character. They did that upon 3rd April 1906; and that application for arbitration contained two alternative prayers. One was that, admitting the accident, they asked the Sheriff to find that the agreement, or rather the liability to compensate the respondent, had come to an end from and after 25th January 1905, which was the date when payment under the agreement had actually ceased; and then alternatively they asked the Sheriff "to ascertain and fix such weekly payments as might be due to the respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 in respect of such injury, and to grant an award against the appellants finding the respondent entitled to such weekly payments, beginning the first payment on 1st February 1905 for the week preceding that date," which, be it observed, was just a week after the actual payment had ceased. That was not in accordance with the workman's view of the agreement, and certainly there is no view upon which it can be said that the agreement warranted the employers in discontinuing payment on 25th January 1905.

Accordingly, what the Sheriff has done in this hybrid application is to find that while the application for recording the memorandum at the instance of the workman was in dependence he could not deal with the application for arbitration first, because, if it were to be regarded as an application for arbitration de novo, it was excluded by the decision of this Court in Dunlop v. Rankine & Blackmore, 4 Fraser 203, where Lord Moncreiff laid it down (explaining the whole decision) that—"Under the Act, sect. 1 (3) where a question as to the amount or duration of compensation has been settled by agreement there is no room for arbitration; it is excluded." Now, plainly, Lord Moncreiff meant, and the Court meant, that the question as to the amount or duration of the compensation included the very question Mr Strain has argued the employers wished to raise, namely, whether they were entitled to bring it to an end at their own hand when they found the incapacity had ceased. They did not take any of the proceedings which the Act prescribes for bringing the weekly payment to an end. Therefore I think the Sheriff was undoubtedly right in holding that, viewed as an application for an original arbitration de novo, he could not deal with it while the application for recording the memorandum of the agreement was pending before him. In the same way I think that he was perfectly right in saying that, once that was before him and settled in favour of the agreement, it was impossible to hold that the application for arbitration could be otherwise than dismissed. Therefore I think the Sheriff was right on both grounds, and that we must answer the stated case accordingly.

Lord Low.—I concur. I should be very slow to throw out an application made to the Sheriff as an arbiter under the Act merely on account of a defect in the form of the application, and accordingly, if the application which was presented to him upon 3rd April 1906 had been in substance an application to review the weekly payment under the 12th section of the first schedule, I should not approve of its being thrown out merely in respect of the form in which it was framed. But I think there is a question here of substance and not of form at all. I think that in substance this application was not, and was plainly not intended to be, an application for review of the weekly payment under the 12th section; and accordingly I am of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute was right in coming to the conclusion that it was so framed that it could not be treated as a petition for review, and therefore that he was right in dismissing it.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree. I think it is quite plain that this application as presented proceeds upon the footing that there had been no antecedent agreement between the parties. That there was an antecedent agreement is certain. I agree with the Sheriff-Substitute that once an agreement has been entered into, arbitration proceedings—original arbitration proceedings—under this Act are out of place. There is no suggestion from beginning to end of this application as recited in the stated case, that it was brought for the purpose of putting an end to the payment under a subsisting agreement, or of diminishing that payment as from and after 25th January 1905. On the contrary, both in substance and in form it appears to be simply an application for an original arbitration under this Act. Now, that being so, I consider it entirely out of place, standing the agreement between the parties. I therefore consider that the Sheriff-Substitute treated the matter entirely rightly in holding that it was an original application for arbitration, both in substance and in form, and that as such it is excluded by the agreement of which a memorandum has been recorded. With regard to this being considered to be a petition for review, it is not, either in substance or in form, an application for review under the 12th section of the first schedule appended to the Act of 1897, which is the only method prescribed by the statute for having such payment ended or continued on a diminished scale. On these grounds I am in favour of affirming the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute. —21*st June* 1907.

Special Case.

This was a Special Case to which the two parties were the testamentary trustees and the widow of the late William Macpherson respectively.

The case set forth as follows :—

William Macpherson, managing director of The Globe Express Ltd., died on 7th July 1905, leaving a trust disposition and settlement dated 24th December 1900, with relative codicil dated 19th March 1904, which were registered in the Books of Council and Session on 14th July 1905. . . . Mr Macpherson was survived by his widow, but no children. The trustees acting under the said trust disposition and settlement and relative codicil are the first parties hereto, and Mr Macpherson's widow is the second party. At the time of his death Mr Macpherson held 197 shares of £100 each (fully paid) in The Globe Express Ltd., of which company he was the principal shareholder.

By his said trust disposition and settlement the said William Macpherson assigned and disponed to the first parties his whole means and estate . . . . in trust for the ends, uses, and purposes therein mentioned.

By the sixth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement the truster directed his trustees to make over, upon his death, certain lots of shares (70 in all) in The Globe Express Ltd., to the legatees therein mentioned, who were all directors or branch managers of the said Company, "each share carrying with it the current year's dividend corresponding thereto." These legatees all survived the testator, with the exception of Mr Alfred Fowler, and, by the second purpose of the codicil, the truster directed that the 20 shares in The Globe Express Ltd., bequeathed to Mr Alfred Fowler, should fall under and be disposed of in accordance with the seventh purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement.

1st Div.

Macpherson's Trustees v. Macpherson.

The seventh purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement is as follows :—"The remainder of my shares in the Company shall be retained by my trustees during the survivance of my wife, and the dividends accruing from said shares shall, as received, be paid over to her." The truster thereafter directed that, on the death of his wife, the said shares should pass to certain other beneficiaries; . . . and by the eighth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement the truster directed that his trustees should allow his wife the free liferent of the whole residue and remainder of his means and estate during her survivance. . . .

By the last purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement, the truster directed that the whole residue and remainder of his estate, after payment of all duties and expenses, should be divided into twenty equal parts, which should be distributed as therein mentioned. . . .

The Globe Express Ltd. is a Company registered in Scotland in 1896, with a capital of £35,000, divided into 350 shares of £100 each. In accordance with No. 92 of the Articles of Association of that Company, the accounts of the Company are made up to 30th April in each year, and a statement of profit is prepared for the purpose of declaring a dividend for the financial year ending on that date. No provision is made in the said Articles of Association with regard to the date of the annual meeting at which the dividend for the year ending 30th April is declared; but in order to allow time for the audit of the accounts it has been the invariable practice of the Directors of the Company to hold that meeting in the month of October annually.

At the annual meeting of the Company held on 10th October 1905 a dividend of 7 per cent. was declared for the year ending 30th April 1905. The first parties were thereafter paid a sum of £1379, being dividend at the said rate on the 197 shares of the Company held by them at the date of the truster's death. The surviving legatees, named in the sixth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement, at first claimed the whole of the dividend for the year ending 30th April 1905, on the 50 shares bequeathed to them, but that claim has been departed from.

The second party now maintains that the whole of the said dividend on the remaining 147 shares, amounting to the sum of £1029, should, in terms of the seventh purpose and other provisions of the said trust disposition and settlement, have been paid to her by the first parties when received by them, or at all events that she is entitled to the whole of the dividend which may be paid by the Company for the year ending 30th April 1906, when received by the first parties. The first parties, on the other hand, maintain that the dividends payable in respect of the year ending 30th April 1905, and for the period from 30th April to 7th July 1905, form part of the capital of the trust estate, and that the second party is only entitled, in terms of the eighth purpose of the said trust disposition and settlement, and in accordance with the Apportionment Act 1870, to the free liferent of the sums representing the said dividend for the year ending 30th April 1905, and the portion of any dividend which may be declared for the succeeding year, applicable to the period from 1st May 1905 to 7th July 1905, the date of the truster's death.

The parties craved the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the following QUESTIONS OF LAW.

1. Does the whole of the dividend for the year ending 30th April 1905 on the said 147 shares of The Globe Express Ltd., held by the first parties, fall to be paid to the second party under the provisions of the said trust disposition and settlement?

2. In the event of the first question being answered in the negative, does the portion of the dividend for the year ending 30th April 1906, for the period from 1st May 1905 to 7th July 1905, fall to be paid to the second party under the provisions of the said trust disposition and settlement?

Argued for the First Parties:

The Apportionment Act must be held to apply. There was in the deed under construction no express stipulation that apportionment was excluded as required by sect. 7 of the Act (in re Oppenheimer, L.R. [1907], 1 Ch. 399; Pollock, 1874, 18 Eq. 329). Nor was the language so expressed that apportionment was impossible consistently with it (Tyrrell v. Clark, 1854, 2 Drewry's Rep. 86).

Argued for the Second Party:

The Apportionment Act did not apply. The seventh purpose of the settlement contained what was in effect a stipulation excluding the operation of the Act (Lysaght v. Lysaght [1898], 1 Ch. 115). Tyrrell did not apply. It was decided on the Apportionment Act of 1834 in 1854.

The Court answered the first question in the affirmative. The second question was not answered.

Lord M'Laren.—I think the trustees of Mr Macpherson could hardly be expected, without the authority of the Court, to decide this question for themselves. The Apportionment Act was, I think, primarily intended to regulate the division of termly payments in cases where the division of such payments was not arranged by the parties interested. In such cases the Act of Parliament provides that, where parties have not arranged how these payments are to be allocated, a proportional part shall vest de die in diem in the parties interested. That principle is applicable alike to contracts and to wills or rights in succession. But then I see no evidence in the Act that it was intended to interfere with, or to have any overruling influence upon, contracts or voluntary provisions, which were expressed in clear language appropriate to the division of the termly payments in question. On the contrary, the concluding clause of the statute providing for the exclusion of the Act where it is expressly stipulated that no apportionments shall take place, makes it evident that it was really intended to supply what the parties had omitted, and was not intended in any way to run counter to the intention of parties where that intention was clearly expressed.

Now in this case we have to consider a will dealing with a substantial amount of personal property, and dealing with it in reasonably clear terms. Among other things, Mr Macpherson, after disposing of seventy shares in The Globe Express Ltd., valued at £7000, directs with respect to the remainder of his shares in that Company that they "shall be retained by my trustees during the survivance of my wife, and the dividends accruing from said shares shall, as received, be paid over to her." Now there is here a trust to hold for the benefit of Mrs Macpherson, the testator's widow. He then goes on to say what is to be done with the capital; but that does not enter into the present question, and therefore I do not pursue the subject further. The shares are to be held by the trustees during Mrs Macpherson's life, and the trustees are charged with the duty of paying over to her the annual produce or income of these shares. If the direction had been given in these general terms, that the lady was to receive payment of the income of the shares, I do not doubt that the Apportionment Act would have taken effect upon the provision and would have made it necessary to apportion the termly payment accruing in the year of the testator's death, because in the case supposed there would have been an omission on the testator's part to provide how that particular year's income should be dealt with. But then I do not think there has been any omission in this case, because the direction is given that the dividends accruing from the shares shall, "as received," be paid over to his wife. I think that under that provision the first of the dividends received after the testator's death falls to be dealt with exactly as all the others accruing in the course of her life would be treated. If the trustees, following out the direction literally, had in the month of October, when a dividend was declared, paid it over to Mrs Macpherson, and if the next of kin or any one having an adverse interest were to challenge the payment, I have difficulty in seeing on what argument such a challenge could be rested. I think the answer would be that the trustees had followed the truster's direction by paying the dividend as it accrued, and that the lady, in accordance with that direction, was entitled to apply the income, as received, for her own benefit.

This seems to me to be the preferable view, because in the absence of any direction as to apportioning the year's income, I think it may be inferred that the testator did not contemplate any apportionment, and did not think it necessary to give any direction on the subject. I think his meaning was that the income should be treated as accruing to his wife as and when it was received by the trustees, and that it should be, without delay, paid over to her for her own benefit. I am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered in favour of the second party.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree. The statute prescribes the manner in which termly payments such as the dividends in question are to be apportioned between parties in the relative positions of the widow and the trustees. But it does not prevent the testator disposing of the income of his estate in any manner he thinks fit, provided only that he does so in sufficiently clear and express language; and if he directs in express terms that dividends shall go wholly to a legatee, and that no part of them shall be apportioned to the general estate, that is a perfectly effectual testamentary direction which will receive effect. In the case of Tyrrell, which was cited to us, it was held that the Apportionment Act was not to be excluded by any inference which might be drawn from the general terms of a will. But on the other hand, in the case of Lysaght, and apparently from the report of a case (in re Meredith, 1898, 67 L.J. (Ch.) 409) which was not cited, but which is referred to in the case of Oppenheimer quoted to us, it was decided with equal clearness that when a testator expressly directs that income which would be otherwise apportionable shall be given to a particular legatee, the Act will not apply. I think the present case falls under the latter rule. The truster says that the dividends accruing from the said shares "shall, as received, be paid over" to his wife. In saying so he gives his trustees a clear and express direction which they are bound to follow.

I entirely agree, however, with the observation which fell from your Lordship in the chair, that although we think the direction clear enough, it was nevertheless perfectly natural and proper on the part of the trustees to bring this question before the Court in order that they might have judicial authority for the course they might agree to follow.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 2—Time for Taking Proceedings — Claim — Circumstances in which Application Held Incompetent in Respect Claim for Compensation Not Made Within Six Months of Accident.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by way of Stated Case against a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe) in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow at the instance of Mrs O'Neill against Andrew Motherwell.

The facts of the case were stated as follows:—

1. That respondent is a grain-merchant, carrying on business in Glasgow.

2. That his business premises, fronting Surrey Street, Cumberland Street, and Main Street, Glasgow, consist of (a) grain mill and other buildings, entering from Surrey Street; and (b) office quarters, entering from Cumberland Street.

3. That these two parts of the premises are not under one roof, but are separate buildings situated at some distance apart.

4. That an overhead railway runs between these two sections of the premises, but access is possible from the one to the other by means of a pend which enters from Cumberland Street, passes under the office buildings, through an arch beneath the railway, and into a lane upon which the mills portion of the property abuts.

5. That, as the buildings were constructed at 11th April 1904, the only access to the office where appellant was employed as an office-cleaner was by a stair leading direct from Cumberland Street up to the office, and the only egress was by this same stair into Cumberland Street.

6. That machinery was employed in the mills fronting Surrey Street.

7. That the only mechanical appliance which was in the portion of the buildings where the office was situated was an electric motor, situated in the same part of the Cumberland Street building as the office, and behind the portion used as an office.

8. That this mechanical power was primarily provided and used for working a hoist, but it was also connected to a mixer, used for the purpose of mixing flour to make it self-rising, and so preparing it for the market for sale.

9. That in a portion of the Surrey Street building adjoining the grain-mill (and entering from it) there is a bag-room where women are employed, on piecework, to make and mend bags.

10. That for some time prior to April 1904 appellant had been in the employment of the respondent under two distinct engagements.

11. That one was, that in the mornings from 6 till 9 she was engaged as an office-cleaner, to keep in order the said office, entering from Cumberland Street as described.

2nd Div.

O'Neill v. Motherwell.

12. That for this daily duty she received a fixed wage of 9s. per week.

13. That the other was that from 10 a.m. till 5 p.m. the appellant was at liberty to work, and was accustomed to work, in the bag-room of the mill entering from Surrey Street.

14. That for this work she was paid by piece-work, and her average weekly earnings amounted to 9s. 6d. per week.

15. That on the morning of 11th April 1904, whilst appellant was engaged in her office-cleaning duty within the said office entering from Cumberland Street, she fell off two chairs upon which she was standing to reach and dust some pictures.

16. That she broke her left arm.

17. That she was thereby incapacitated from following the occupation either of an office-cleaner or a bag-mender.

18. That she is now sufficiently recovered to be able to undertake the work of bag-mending, but that she is not yet able to undertake the duty of an office-cleaner.

19. That formal notice was not given to respondent of the accident, but he was at the time aware of it, and has not been prejudiced by the want of formal notice.

20. That appellant did not, within six months of the occurrence of the accident, make a claim for compensation.

21. That the respondent, from the date of the accident until the end of September 1904, voluntarily made to the appellant an allowance of 10s. per week.

22. That appellant's daughter Catherine, aged 17, then and still residing in family with her mother, had been accustomed to assist her mother in her office-cleaning work.

23. That she was capable of undertaking this work alone, and upon her mother becoming incapacitated respondent continued this daughter as the office-cleaner, at the same wage of 9s. per week, and she still continues to do this work.

24. That early in October 1904 respondent proposed to reduce the cash allowance to 5s. per week, whereupon appellant declined to accept anything less than 10s.

25. That the allowance was therefore altogether discontinued.

26. That the respondent's said premises constitute a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

27. That respondent is the undertaker.

On these facts the Sheriff found in law that in respect the making of a claim within six months was under the statute a condition precedent to proceedings for recovery of compensation, and that appellant had failed to comply with this statutory requisite, her application for compensation was incompetent. He therefore dismissed the application, and assoilzied the respondent.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was: Is the application competent?

Argued for the Appellant: (1) In the circumstances of this case the respondent was barred from founding on the absence of a claim within the statutory period (Freeman, 1848, 2 W. H. and G. 654; M'Kenzie, 1881, 8 R. (H.L.) 8). (2) In point of fact the appellant made a "claim" within the meaning of the Act when she said she would not take less than 10s. per week (Wright [1900], 2 Q.B. 240; Powell [1900], A.C. 366).

Argued for the Respondent: (1) There was no question of bar, because there never was any agreement to pay compensation (Kilpatrick, 1907, S.C. 320). (2) The Sheriff had found as a fact that no claim was made, and that was conclusive.

The Court answered the question of law in the negative.

Lord Low.—The question in this case relates to the competency of a workman instituting arbitration proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, after the elapse of more than six months from the date of the accident, no claim having been made within the six months.

The material facts are these. The appellant, who was employed to clean the office of the respondent, and who also worked at piece-work in the bag-room of his mill, broke her arm upon the 11th of April 1904. For cleaning the office she received 9s., and in the mill she earned 9s. 6d. weekly, so that the most she could have claimed under the Act would have been 9s. 3d. weekly during total incapacity, and that, too, only from a period of two weeks after the accident. Now, without anything being said about the Act, the employer paid her 10s. a week from the date of the accident, and employed her daughter, who was seventeen years of age, and lived with the appellant, to clean the office, at the same wage—9s. a week—which the appellant had received, the result being that more money was coming into the appellant's house after than before the accident. These payments were continued for about six months, and then the employer proposed to reduce the allowance of 10s. to the appellant to 5s. The appellant objected, and made an attempt to have a memorandum of agreement formally registered. She was unsuccessful, and her next step was to bring these arbitration proceedings. The Sheriff-Substitute has found as a fact that the appellant did not within six months of the accident make a claim for compensation, and he has accordingly held that the application for arbitration is incompetent.

It was argued for the appellant that the present application is not barred by the fact that she did not make a claim within the six months, because she was led by the respondent to believe that he admitted her right to compensation, and that there was no necessity for her to make a claim.

Now if the case should arise of an employer deliberately misleading an injured workman, and inducing him to refrain from making a claim within six months, I have no doubt that the Court would find a remedy, but no such case is disclosed by the facts as stated by the Sheriff-Substitute in this case. I think that the inference from the facts is that the respondent acted in perfect good faith, and did what he considered to be fair to the appellant irrespective of his obligation under the Act, and the appellant was quite willing (which is not surprising) to accept what the respondent offered. In these circumstances I see no reason why the strict rule that a claim must be made within six months should not be enforced. I accordingly think that the Sheriff-Substitute was right, and that the question stated should be answered in the negative.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with your Lordship. There is nothing stated in the case which is sufficient to raise a bar against the employer, or entitle the Court to diverge from the rule laid down in the Act.

Lord Stormonth-Darling concurred. — 22*nd June* 1907.

III. Donation—Donation Inter Vivos—Sum of Money Placed by Father at his Daughter's Credit with Bank—Bank Pass-book Found in Father's Repositories After his Death in Name of his Daughter—Proof on Which Held that Donation Proved.

This was an action raised at the instance of the trustees acting under the post-nuptial contract of marriage of Mr and Mrs James Boucher, dated 28th May 1861, and relative deed of alteration dated 1865, against (1) the testamentary trustees of the said James Boucher; (2) James Boucher's widow and two daughters, Miss Ella Boucher and Mrs Janey Laurie Boucher or Colvil; and (3) the trustees nominated in a deposit receipt, dated 12th October 1905, by the Commercial Bank of Scotland Ltd. in favour of them in trust for James Boucher's said daughters, and others.

The Summons concluded for declarator (first) that the said post-nuptial contract of marriage, dated 28th May 1861, entered into between Mr and Mrs Boucher, and relative deed of alteration by them thereon, dated 31st July 1865, had not been revoked by subsequent testamentary writings of Mr Boucher, and that the whole estate, heritable and moveable, belonging to Mr Boucher at his death fell to be administered by the pursuers as trustees under the said post-nuptial contract of marriage; and (second) that the estate left by Mr Boucher falling to be administered as aforesaid, included, inter alia, (1) the sum of £5500 with interest, contained in the said deposit receipt by the Commercial Bank of Scotland, dated 12th October 1905; and (5) the sum of £299, 19s. contained in an account current with the Commercial Bank of Scotland in name of the said Ella Boucher.

The defenders, Mr Boucher's testamentary trustees, Mr Boucher's widow and daughters, and the trustees nominated in the said deposit receipt dated 12th October 1905, compeared and defended the action for their respective interests.

The Pursuers pleaded:

1. The post-nuptial contract of marriage being onerous and contractual as regards the widow and descendants of the marriage, and the provisions therein contained in favour of said widow and descendants being reasonable provisions, could not be revoked or altered by James Boucher without his wife's consent.

2. The testamentary writings of the said James Boucher having been executed without his wife's consent, are ineffectual to alter the provisions of the post-nuptial contract of marriage.

3. The sums contained in said deposit receipts and in said account current having belonged to the said James Boucher and not having been effectually donated by him, formed part of his estate at his death, and fall to be administered by the pursuers as trustees under the post-nuptial contract of marriage.

4. The sums contained in said deposit receipts and in said account current having belonged to the said James Boucher, and he having no power without his wife's consent to make gifts or donations to take effect after his death, formed at the time of his death part of his estate, and fall to be administered by the pursuers as trustees under the post-nuptial contract of marriage.

The Defenders pleaded:

1. The alleged post-nuptial contract of marriage being testamentary and revocable by the said James Boucher, and having been revoked by his said testamentary writings, the defenders should be assoilzied from the first conclusion of the summons.

2. The said James Boucher being entitled to deal with and dispose of his estate during his lifetime as he pleased, and having effectually donated the said sums of £5500 and £299, 19s. during his lifetime, and divested himself thereof, as condescended on, the defenders should be assoilzied from the second conclusion of the summons.

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, the purport of which and the facts of the case sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

The following authorities were quoted in addition to those referred to by the Lord Ordinary:—Hill v. Hill, 1755, M. 11580; Balvaird v. Latimer, 5th December 1816, F.C.; Cameron's Trs. v. Cameron, 1907, S.C. 407; Wright's Trs. &c., 1870, 8 M. 708; Kennedy v. Rose, 1863, 1 M. 1042; Miller v. Miller, 1874, 1 R. 1107; Mackellars v. Hunter, 1858, 20 D. 761.

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—"Finds, declares and decerns in terms of the first conclusion of the Summons as concluded for; . . . . (3) Finds, as regards the sums (1) and (5) respectively described in said second conclusion, that they are not included in the estate left by the deceased James Boucher at his death, in respect that he effectually donated the same inter vivos, and divested himself thereof: Sustains the first and second pleas for the pursuers and the second plea for the compearing defenders, and repels the whole other pleas of the parties respectively, and decerns."

Lord Dundas.—The late James Boucher was married on 7th October 1858. He died on 7th September 1906, survived by his wife and by the two children of their marriage—Miss Ella Boucher and Mrs Janey Laurie Boucher or Colvil—all of whom are still alive. The daughters are respectively 39 and 37 years of age or thereby. Mr and Mrs Boucher had no ante-nuptial marriage contract. But on 28th May 1861 they entered into a post-nuptial contract of marriage (No. 33 of process). By that contract, which proceeded on the narrative that the parties thereto, taking into consideration that there was no contract entered into between them at the time of their marriage, had, in order to supply that defect, resolved and agreed to execute it, Mr Boucher, "for the love and affection he bears to his said spouse, and in consideration of the provision in his favour hereinafter written, and for other considerations," disponed and assigned to his wife, while she remained a widow, and to other persons named, as trustees, "all and sundry lands and heritable estate of the said James Boucher, as also his whole moveable and personal means and estate of whatever kind, which shall belong to him at the time of his death." It was provided by the (third) purpose that, in the event of there being a child or children of the marriage surviving Mr Boucher—which event occurred—the trustees should invest the whole residue of his moveable estate in good securities, and pay over the proceeds or annual revenue thereof, as well as the free yearly proceeds of any heritable property of which he might die possessed, to his said wife, to be applied for the support and maintenance of herself and the said child or children; and it was further provided that, on the death of his said wife, should she survive him—as she did—the trustees should lay out the proceeds of his said estate in the support and education of the said child or children of the marriage; and on the youngest of them attaining the age of twenty-one years complete the trustees should realise and convert the whole estate into cash, and divide the same amongst the said children in equal proportions. By the said contract it was further declared that the provisions thereby conceived in favour of Mrs Boucher and the children of the marriage should be in full satisfaction to them of their respective legal rights. Mrs Boucher, on her part, disponed and made over to Mr Boucher and the heirs of the marriage, whom failing, her own heirs, all and sundry goods, gear, debts, and sums of money, as well heritable as moveable, that were then belonging or resting owing to her, or that should pertain and be owing to her during the subsistence of the marriage, other than the provisions thereinbefore conceived in her favour. The said post-nuptial contract further contained a clause in the following terms: "And the parties hereto, and each of them, reserve their respective liferents of the estates and effects above conveyed, with full power to them at any time during their joint lives to alter and revoke these presents in whole or in part as they may see proper; but declaring always that the same, in so far as it shall not be altered or revoked as aforesaid, shall be effectual, though found lying by either of the parties at the time of his or her predecease, or in the custody of any other person for their behoof, with the delivery whereof they hereby dispense for ever." On 31st July 1865 Mr and Mrs Boucher executed a deed of alteration of the said post-nuptial contract of marriage, but the terms of that deed do not in any way concern the present case. Mr Boucher commenced business as an architect in Glasgow about the year 1855. At the time of his marriage, and also at the date of the post-nuptial contract, though his business was promising well, he had but small savings. At his death, however, he left heritable estate of the value of £22,500 or thereby, and considerable moveable estate as well. Mrs Boucher, when she married, and also when the post-nuptial contract was executed, was possessed of no estate; but she had considerable expectations from relatives, which, however, from various causes, did not in fact bring very much to her in the end. Mr Boucher left at his death sundry testamentary writings bearing to dispose of his estate, both heritable and moveable, the most important of which appears to be dated 14th January 1895.

The present action is brought by the pursuers, original and assumed, acting under the said post-nuptial contract. The first conclusion of the summons is for declarator that the post-nuptial contract and relative deed of alteration have not been revoked by any of the testamentary writings of Mr Boucher, and that the whole estate, heritable and moveable, belonging to him at the time of his death falls to be held and administered by the pursuers and their successors as trustees under the said contract and deed of alteration, for the purposes therein contained; and that the testamentary writings of Mr Boucher are ineffectual to alter or impair the provisions in the said contract and deed of alteration. The negative of these propositions was somewhat faintly maintained by counsel for the testamentary trustees, and also, but only as an alternative to their principal argument, for the daughters of the marriage. I see no reason at all to doubt that this conclusion of the summons is well founded, and must be given effect to. The provisions made by the post-nuptial contract appear to me to be clearly "remuneratory," and therefore contractual. The parties to that contract expressly dispensed with delivery and declared that it should be effectual except in so far as it was revoked by them during their joint lives. It appears that at the end of Mr Boucher's holograph trust disposition and settlement, dated 14th January 1895, there is a docquet, holograph of him, in these terms, "Seen and approved of by my wife, Mrs Rebecca Laurie or Boucher, on the 28th January 1895," which is signed "Rebecca Boucher." I gravely doubt whether this docquet, even if duly witnessed, could be held, in conjunction with the settlement to which it is appended, to amount to a revocation of the post-nuptial contract by the parties thereto "during their joint lives." But it is sufficient to observe that the docquet, as it stands, is not probative. It seems to me, therefore, that the first conclusion of the summons must be given effect to.

By the second conclusion the pursuers ask declarator that the estate left by Mr Boucher, falling to be held and administered by them and their successors in trust, includes, inter alia, five specified sums of money. There is no dispute, and there could not be any, that as regards the 2nd, 3rd and 4th of these sums the conclusion is well founded. These are sums of money contained in deposit receipts in name of Mr and Mrs Boucher, payable to either or survivor. But the sums 1st and 5th specified stand in a different position.

The first sum of money is contained in a deposit receipt by the Commercial Bank of Scotland (St Vincent Street branch, Glasgow), dated 12th October 1905, in names of three gentlemen, "Trustees of James Boucher Esq. of Coulport, in trust for Miss Ella Boucher and Miss Janey Laurie Boucher, repayable to any two of them or the survivor, the sum of £5500 sterling, which is placed to their credit on deposit receipt with the Commercial Bank of Scotland Limited." It is maintained on behalf of the three trustees, and of Mrs Boucher's daughters, that this sum of £5500 was validly gifted by Mr Boucher inter vivos, and that the gift was not, and could not be, recalled or affected by his testamentary settlements. In my opinion this contention is right, and is entitled to prevail. The history of the matter is as follows. In July 1904 Mr Boucher deposited two sums of £4000 and £1000 respectively on receipts in name of his daughters, both then unmarried, jointly, or the survivor (Nos. 74 and 75 of process). As to these, Mr Waddell, the bank agent, says that Mr Boucher "had always talked about making some provision for his daughters—that he wanted to put some money aside for the girls, and I think he was going for a holiday. He mentioned it several times." But in October 1905 Mr Boucher approached Mr Waddell with a view to having the terms of these deposit receipts changed. Mr Waddell pointed out that this could only be done by the endorsation of the receipts by the daughters; the endorsation was procured by Mr Boucher, as appears from his letter to Mr Waddell, No. 14 of process, dated 8th October 1905; the accrued interest was apparently placed to the credit of Mr Boucher's account and a fresh deposit receipt for £5500 was taken out on 12th October, in the terms which I have already quoted. Mr Waddell explains the reasons which led up to the change. He says Mr Boucher "did not want the money back to himself, because he could have taken a deposit receipt in his own name, but he put it in the names of his trustees for his daughters. . . . Q. Before this date, had he said anything to you about putting the money in the names of trustees, and if so, what? A. Yes, he did. His reason for doing it was that Miss Janey Boucher had got engaged to be married, and he wanted to create a separate trust. He wanted to put that beyond the rights of the husband, and that was the reason for him putting it in the trustees' names. I told him that if he did not want them to have the money, he could take it back, and that it could be put in his own name in a new deposit receipt, but he did not want that. It was put in the names of the trustees, and he was to leave instructions with the trustees as to the disposal of that money. I explained to him that in putting it in the names of the trustees it was beyond his control, and that he could not touch the money. He fully understood that the money was beyond his control. He did not know very well how to do it, and he did not want that money to go into his own estate. I suggested that it should be put in the name of his trustees, or some other person." Mr Waddell's account of the matter is to some extent confirmed. It appears that on 11th October 1905, Mr Boucher wrote a letter to each of the three trustees named in the deposit receipt asking them to accept the trust. These letters, naturally enough, are not now forthcoming. But the three letters written in reply are produced (Nos. 17, 18, and 19 of process). No. 18 is the reply of Mr A. S. Cousland, dated 16th October, in which, after referring to Mr Boucher's letter to him of 11th inst., he says: "I note that one of your daughters is to be married, and that they possess money in a bank receipt"; and he adds some sensible remarks as to the propriety of giving explicit instructions to trustees in such a matter, as to the truster's wishes and intentions. The evidence of the daughters does not add much to the case in one direction or the other. Mrs Colvil says that she did not know about the deposit receipt for the £5500 till after her father's death; and her impression was that the provision for her and her sister, of which he sometimes spoke to her, was to be "through his will." Miss Boucher's evidence (taken on commission) is also vague. She says her father had told her the names of the three trustees. "He said something to the effect that there was money set apart for me and Janey. That was a good long time before his death. I think it was before Janey's marriage. I remember him being at Harrogate about 1905. It was shortly after his return that he said something to the effect I have just indicated." This passage is distinct enough, if taken alone, and the time is correctly fixed by reference to Mr Boucher's visit to Harrogate; but its effect is considerably weakened by other portions of this witness's evidence. Still, in my opinion the terms of the deposit receipt No. 21 of process, coupled with the distinct evidence of Mr Waddell, an independent witness entirely above suspicion, are sufficient to establish the daughters' case upon this matter. All that is necessary to their success is, I apprehend, sufficient proof of a completed intention of immediate gift on the part of their father. In my opinion there is here such proof. I was referred by counsel to a very large number of decided cases, many of which relate to mortis causa donations. It is, I think, unnecessary to deal with these in detail, or to discuss certain vexed questions which are involved in some of them. One need not, for example, decide whether delivery is or is not requisite to constitute donation mortis causa. That question may perhaps be regarded as still open (Rose, 1901, 3 F. 337); though in Macfarlane's Trs. (1898, 25 R. 1201) Lord President Robertson said "that delivery is not in law necessary to complete the donation mortis causa of deposit receipts has been three times deliberately laid down in the cases of Gibson v. Hutchison, 10 M. 923; Crosbie's Trs. v. Wright, 7 R. 823; and Blyth v. Curles, 12 R. 674, and I cannot go against this series of decisions. Delivery can only now be regarded as a piece of evidence, more or less strong but not indispensable, and in the present case I think there is enough without it." Perhaps the two cases which throw most light upon the present are these of British Linen Co. v. Martin, 1849, 11 D. 1004; and Thomson's Exrs., 1882, 9 R. 911. In the former case, Mr Burns, on the day before his death, directed his clerk to draw £800 (more than half his Scotch estate) from his bank account, and deposit it again in bank, on a receipt in name of his housekeeper. The receipt remained in the clerk's hands at Mr Burns's death. The donation of £800 to the housekeeper was held valid. Lord Fullerton observed: "When we say that donation is not to be presumed, the only practical result is that it must be sufficiently proved; that there must be such a preponderance of evidence in favour of it, as to render any other supposition inadmissible according to the ordinary probabilities of dealing between the parties"; and his Lordship proceeded to point out that Mr Burns "of his own accord placed in the hands of the bank, as a general recipient of sums to be accounted for, a sum which by his dictation was to be accounted for, not to himself, but to her" (the housekeeper). "In short, he did not shift, as in the case of Henderson, the debt from the bank to the party drawing the money, but he parted entirely with his right of credit." The later case, Thomson's Exrs., was one, as this is, of inter vivos donation, and the opinions of the judges are instructive. Every case must, of course, be decided upon its own facts. I am satisfied in this case, upon a careful study of the evidence, oral and real, that donation is sufficiently proved. It was argued that the trust constituted by the deposit receipt was inept and ineffectual as between the trustees and the beneficiaries; but assuming that to be so, it would not, in my judgment, affect the question whether the donor did not, in a question with the trustees and also with his daughters, "part entirely with his right of credit." I am of opinion that he did so, notwithstanding that the deposit receipt—the mere voucher of the gift—continued in his own possession.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Dundas.

Boucher's Trustees v. Boucher's Trustees and Others.

The only remaining question has to do with the fifth of the sums with reference to which declarator is asked in the summons, being a sum of £299, 19s., contained in an account current with the Commercial Bank in name of Miss Ella Boucher. It appears that by letter No. 15 of process, dated 5th February 1906, Mr Boucher instructed Mr Waddell, inter alia, to place £300 to the credit of his daughter Ella in a new account, and to send him the pass-book with a shilling cheque-book "for her use (to order)." Mr Waddell obeyed these instructions, and debited the account with one shilling, the price of the cheque-book. The pass-book (No. 38 of process) in name of Miss Ella Boucher was found in her father's repositories after his death in an envelope addressed to her. She never, in fact, operated upon the account. But I think that this sum of £299, 19s. must be held to have been validly gifted by Mr Boucher to his daughter inter vivos. The evidence is even more distinct than that with regard to the deposit receipt for £5500. Miss Boucher herself depones: "My father about that time, some months before my sister's marriage, showed me a bank-book in my name. That now shown me is the book. Q. Did he tell you what it was? A. Yes; he said it was a bank-book for money which he had put in the bank for me. This was at Coulport he showed me this. He put the book into his safe. . . . Q. When your father shewed you this bank-book which you have spoken to, did he say anything about putting you on an equal footing with Janey, who had been getting a good deal of money in connection with her wedding? A. Yes; he said he wanted me to have the same as she had." Upon this latter point Miss Boucher is distinctly corroborated, both by her sister Mrs Colvil and her mother.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I shall pronounce decree of declarator in terms of the first conclusion of the Summons; and also in terms of the second conclusion, so far as regards the sums (2), (3) and (4) respectively therein set forth; but with regard to the sums (1) and (5) respectively described in the said conclusion, I shall find that they are not included in the estate left by Mr Boucher at his death, in respect that he effectually donated the same inter vivos and divested himself thereof.—21*st June* 1907.

Diligence — Arrestment Jurisdictionis Fundandæ Causa—Goods Rejected as Disconform to Contract Dispatched by Arrangement to Sellers — Goods Arrested while in Hands of Railway Company to Found Jurisdiction Against Sellers—Personal Bar — Held that Arrestment was Valid.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Frederick Braby & Co. Ltd. v. Edwin Danks & Co. (Oldbury) Ltd.

In this action Frederick Braby & Co. Ltd. sued Edwin Danks & Co. (Oldbury), Ltd., for damages sustained by them owing to the defenders' breach of contract.

Arrestments were used to found jurisdiction, and the defenders pleaded, inter alia, "no jurisdiction."

The facts of the case and the circumstances in which the arrestments were used sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the defenders' plea of "no jurisdiction," and allowed a proof.

Lord Dundas.—The pursuers are a limited company carrying on business in Glasgow and elsewhere as constructional engineers, roofing contractors, and galvanisers. The defenders carry on business as boiler and tank makers and manufacturers of galvanising baths at Oldbury, near Birmingham. The pursuers in the course of their business use what are called galvanising baths. The defenders from time to time supplied such baths to the pursuers, under contracts which are set forth on record. The pursuers now sue the defenders for damages, and allege that they have founded jurisdiction against them in this Court by arrestments laid on for that purpose. The defenders plead—"1. No jurisdiction." The case was sent, upon their motion, to the Procedure Roll, to discuss the preliminary question thus raised. Counsel for the parties agreed that the discussion should proceed upon the footing that the correspondence (No. 13 of process) was admitted to be genuine, and that further probation upon this question was renounced. It appears that in October 1906 the pursuers claimed right to reject some of the galvanising baths supplied to them by the defenders, as being disconform to contract. On 17th October the defenders' agents wrote that their clients were "so disgusted with the matter that probably they would be willing to take back the baths, subject to your paying for those you have accepted and used." On 22nd October the pursuers' agents replied that "the rejected baths are six in number. . . . None have been accepted. The baths are at your clients' order and risk, and our clients decline to make any payment in respect of them." On 7th November the pursuers' agents further wrote that "unless we hear from you with your clients' directions as to the removal of the baths, our clients will be under the necessity of having them removed and stored at your clients' risk and expense." In reply to these letters, the defenders' agents on 9th November wrote: "Will you please ask your clients to consign the baths referred to, to Edwin Danks & Co. (Oldbury) Ltd., Oldbury, near

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Frederick Braby & Co. Ltd. v. Edwin Danks & Co. (Oldbury) Ltd.

Birmingham (carriage forward). . . . Please advise us that the baths have been sent, and oblige." On 12th November the pursuers' agents asked the defenders' agents to say by which railway their clients desired the baths to be returned. The defenders' agents, on 13th November, requested the pursuers' agents to ask their clients to consign the baths by Caledonian and L. and N.-W. Railway; and this request was, as appears by letter from the pursuers' agents of 14th November, duly communicated to their clients. While the baths were in the hands of the Caledonian Railway Company they were arrested by the pursuers, in order to found jurisdiction against the defenders for the purpose of this action.

It is not disputed by the defenders (at least for the purposes of the present argument) that the baths so arrested are their property; nor that they are proper and suitable subjects of arrestment, nor that the letters of arrestment are ex facie valid and regular. Their plea, though baldly stated in the two words "no jurisdiction," is really one of personal bar. They aver in Answer 10 that an "arrangement" was come to between the parties for the return to the defenders of the baths in question, and that the pursuers, "in breach of the arrangement," arrested the baths in the hands of the railway company. The defenders' counsel argued that, in the circumstances disclosed by the correspondence—to the material portions of which I have referred—the pursuers put themselves in the position of agents, or quasi-agents, of the defenders, and that their action in arresting the baths brought them within the well-established doctrine that a creditor may, in special circumstances, by his own actings, be barred from taking advantage of an arrestment which if laid on by another creditor would have been valid and effectual. My opinion is adverse to the defenders' contention. I find no trace in the correspondence of any such "arrangement," or of any such agency or quasi-agency as is suggested. In sending off the baths the pursuers did not act without the defenders' authority, but, upon the contrary, in accordance with their express desire and instructions. The pursuers did not, so far as I see, manufacture or create the situation; but merely took advantage, as they were legally entitled to do, of the circumstances which had occurred. I do not think it necessary to discuss in detail the cases bearing upon the point, among which may be noted Campbell, 1858, 21 D. 63; Rintoul, 1862, 1 M. 137; Carlberg, 1877, 5 R. 390, affid. 1878, ib. (H.L.) 217 and 3 A.C. 1322; Græme's Trs., 1888, 15 R. 691; and Trowsdale's Trs., 1870, 9 M. 88. I had occasion to consider these cases, and express my views upon them, in the recent case of The Old Park Forge Ltd., 21st March 1907, 15 S.L.T. 3, when I sustained the jurisdiction. I refer to my opinion in that case, and also in a still more recent decision—Millar & Lang Ltd. v. Poole, 29th May 1907, 15 S.L.T. 76—in which the plea of "no jurisdiction" was sustained.

For these reasons I shall repel the first plea in law stated for the defenders, and allow the parties a proof upon the merits of the case.—18*th June* 1907.

74. Wilson's Trustees v. Wilson and Others.

I. Succession — Marriage Contract — Construction — Obligation in Ante-nuptial Marriage Contract to Dispone Whole Estate, Heritable and Moveable, to Trustees — Held to Mean Whole Estate at Date of Death.

II. Succession—Power of Appointment—Ante-nuptial Contract of Marriage Providing for Payment of Residue to Children of Marriage — Power of Appointment Reserved to Father—Provision for Issue of Child Predeceasing Term of Payment Taking Parent's Share—Trust Settlement by Father Apportioning Residue Among Children—Codicil Limiting Interest of One Child in his Share to Liferent with Fee to Child's Issue — Grandchildren Not Objects of Power of Appointment—Held that Codicil not a Valid Exercise of Power of Appointment.

This was an action of multiplepoinding in which the fund in medio was the whole means and estate belonging to John Wilson, merchant, Glasgow, at the date of his death, subject to certain deductions which had no bearing on the case. The fund was in the hands of the trustees appointed by decree of the Court dated 14th December 1906 to act under the ante-nuptial contract of marriage entered into between John Wilson and his second wife Mrs Mary Gemmill or Wilson, dated 11th May 1861. The said trustees, who were the same persons as were appointed trustees under John Wilson's trust disposition and settlement and relative codicils, were the pursuers and real raisers, and also claimants.

The facts of the case and the contentions of the parties appear from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the provisions of the codicil dated 11th September 1905 libelled are invalid as an exercise by the testator of his power of appointment in regard to the share of his residue effeiring to his son the claimant Matthew Gemmill Wilson, and that in terms of the marriage and of the trust disposition and settlement libelled, the said claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred to the extent of one-fifth share of the fund in medio, subject to all proper deductions therefrom; repels the claim and relative pleas in law for the tutors and curators of the children of the said Matthew Gemmill Wilson; quoad ultra, appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure."

Lord Dundas.—The late John Wilson, merchant in Glasgow, died on 29th December 1905. He was survived by his widow, by three children of his marriage with her, and by two children of a former marriage. The fund in medio in this action is the whole estate, heritable and moveable, left by Mr Wilson, so far as remaining in the hands of his trustees. By ante-nuptial marriage contract dated 11th May 1861, Mr Wilson, in contemplation of his second marriage, after making sundry provisions for his intended spouse, bound and obliged himself and his heirs, executors, successors, and representatives whomsoever, "to settle his whole estate, heritable and moveable" (subject to the burden of certain payments) "upon the children of said intended marriage and the said James Wilson and Jane Wilson" (the children of his first marriage); "and that by disponing the same to" three gentlemen named, and the survivors and survivor of them, or such other persons as he might appoint, to be held by them in trust for the purposes in said contract after-mentioned. It was mooted, rather than argued, at the debate in the Procedure Roll that this obligation to "settle" covered only the "whole estate" belonging to Mr Wilson at the date of the marriage contract—which was very much smaller than that of which he ultimately died possessed. Upon a careful study of the contract as a whole I am of opinion that this is not a correct view, and that Mr Wilson intended the obligation to cover and include his whole estate at the time of his death. The third purpose of the said trust was "for the payment and division of the residue among the children of said intended marriage and the said James Wilson and Jane Wilson in such shares and at such times as the said John Wilson shall fix and appoint by any writing under his hand; and, failing his exercising such power of apportionment, equally share and share alike upon their severally attaining the age of majority; and in case any of said children shall die before receiving his or her share, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share of their parent equally among them. But it is hereby declared that such conveyance" (i.e. the disposition to the trustees) "shall be made subject to such provisions, conditions, and declarations as the said John Wilson may think proper to be inserted in the trust deed to be granted by him in implement of the present obligation." If the opinion which I have expressed is correct, I think there can be no doubt that, under the clauses which I have quoted, Mr Wilson's children took a protected right of succession, which their father could not defeat by any merely gratuitous alienation, testamentary or otherwise.

Mr Wilson left a trust disposition and settlement, dated 10th November 1900, bearing to dispose of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, presently belonging, or that might belong, to him at his decease, or as to which he might have a power of disposal. The settlement makes no express reference to the marriage contract into which Mr Wilson had entered nearly thirty years before. By the fifth purpose of the settlement the trustees were directed (after having set aside sufficient of the estate to meet certain provisions made for the testator's wife) to divide the whole remainder of his estate into as many shares as he might have children surviving him, along with the issue of any child who might predecease him, such issue being reckoned per stirpes, and to pay over to such children or issue of such children, provided they had attained the age of twenty-one years, the amount of his or their share, at the first term occurring six months after his death; and in the last place Mr Wilson directed that, on the death of his wife, the whole residue of his estate set free by that event should be divided and paid, all in the same way and to the same effect as was provided for in the fifth place as above recited. It was by said settlement declared that the whole provisions in favour of the testator's children or the issue of any predeceasing child or children should vest in them as at the date of his death. I do not understand it to be disputed that the combined effect of the power of appointment reserved by the marriage contract, and of the provisions in the trust settlement which I have narrated, would, if the matter stood upon them alone, be to vest each of the truster's five children in one-fifth share of the residue of his estate.

The only question which was argued at the debate related to the manner in which Mr Wilson proceeded to deal with the share of residue effeiring to his son Matthew Gemmill Wilson. By codicil, dated 11th January 1904, the testator provided that there should be deducted by his trustees from the share payable to this son the sum of £23,000. By a later codicil, dated 11th September 1905, the truster provided that in the execution of his said trust disposition and settlement his trustees should set aside the share and interest in his estate effeiring to his said son Matthew (after giving effect to the said deduction) and should hold the same in trust for the purposes following, videlicet, for payment of the free annual income thereof to Matthew for his liferent alimentary use allenarly during the whole days and years of his life at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas; and on the death of Matthew, the said share and interest should be paid to and among the children of Matthew, in such manner and in such proportions as he might direct by any writing under his hand, with power to him to restrict the interest of any child to a bare liferent; and failing such directions, then the said share and interest should be divided into as many shares as Matthew might have children surviving his decease, along with the issue of any child who might have predeceased him, such issue taking per stirpes, and one of the said shares, should be paid over to each child so surviving, and one of said shares to the issue of each child who might have predeceased leaving lawful issue; declaring that in the event of the death of Matthew without leaving any child surviving, or the issue of any predeceasing child, then the said share and interest should be paid over and conveyed in such manner as Matthew might by any writing under his hand direct, and failing such direction, then to his heirs in mobilibus.

Counsel for Mr Matthew Gemmill Wilson argued that the codicil of 11th September 1905 was inept and ineffectual to defeat his right to a full one-fifth share of his fathers' residue, subject to the said deduction. On the other hand, an argument was submitted on behalf of the tutors and curators of Mr Matthew Gemmill Wilson's two children, to the effect that the said codicil was valid and effectual. I have come, without much difficulty, to the conclusion that the first of these arguments is right, and that the second is wrong. The contention on behalf of Matthew Wilson's children was presented in a very ingenious but, to my mind, wholly unconvincing fashion. It was, as I understood it, to the effect first, that the codicil, so far as it restricted Matthew's interest to a bare liferent, was a valid exercise of the reserved power, inasmuch as it gave him a "share" of the residue; and second, that, even if the appointment to his children was invalid, owing to their being strangers to the reserved power, the result was merely to bring one back to the terms of the marriage contract, under which, it was argued, Matthew's children would take the unappointed fee of his share, by virtue of the destination therein contained. I shall deal with the two branches of this argument separately. As regards the first branch, I think that the decided cases indicate that, under certain circumstances, it may be within the right of one exercising a power of apportionment to restrict the share of one of the objects of the power to a mere liferent, but only if the fee of that share is appointed to some one or more of the objects of the power. I think that there is no doubt that the children of Mr Matthew Wilson must be regarded in this matter as strangers to the power. An argument to the contrary was suggested, upon the view that the marriage contract makes, in a certain event, which has not happened, a provision for grandchildren of the testator. But this argument is, in my judgment, wholly untenable. Gillon's Trs., 1890, 17 R. 435, is a direct authority to the effect that, if a share of the fund is apportioned to an object of the power in liferent, and to strangers to the power—viz. his children—in fee, the appointment is wholly bad. The point now under consideration appears to me to have been accurately figured and dealt with by Lord M'Laren in the case of Neill's Trs., 1902, 4 F. 636. His Lordship said (at p. 640): "I only wish to add one general observation as to the question whether under a power of appointment it is lawful to the appointer to sever out a liferent for one person. That would entirely depend on how the fee is disposed of. If it is lawful to give £5 to one of the appointees and the balance to the others, it could hardly be held to be objectionable to give so much a year to one party, if the capital is divided among the objects of power." Lord M'Laren's opinion was referred to by the learned judges in the later cases of Dalziel's Trs., 1905, 7 F. 545, per Lord President Dunedin at p. 553, and Middleton's Trs., 1906, 8 F. 1037, per Lord Kyllachy at p. 1042 and Lord Stormonth Darling at p. 1044. I may also note the case of Warrand's Trs., 1901, 3 F. 369. It seems to me, therefore, that the first branch of the argument presented for the children of Matthew Wilson can hardly be supported, because the appointment made by the codicil—to himself in liferent allenarly, and to his children (being strangers to the power) in fee—is wholly invalid. But if one turns to the second branch of the argument, it is, in my judgment, entitled to no better measure of success. A sufficient and, in my opinion, conclusive answer to it can be briefly stated. Even upon the assumption that the appointment of a liferent allenarly to Matthew Wilson was a valid exercise of the power, and that accordingly we must revert to the terms of the marriage contract to discover the right, by its destination, to the fee of the share of residue in question, the argument for the children of Matthew is, in my judgment, in no way bettered. It is, to my mind, obvious that no case has here arisen of a child of the testator having died, before receiving his share leaving lawful issue, so as to let Matthew's children in, under the destination. In the first place, Matthew, who is alive, would ex hypothesi be entitled to receive his "share," viz. his liferent allenarly of the share of residue effeiring to him; and in the second place, his children could not, in that view, be entitled to claim the "share of their parent equally among them." This seems to me a sufficient answer to the claim on behalf of these grandchildren of the testator. It is not, therefore, necessary to decide as to the soundness, or the reverse, of a further argument which was plausibly stated to the effect that, upon the assumption postulated by the grandchildren's claim, one would not be called upon to revert to the destination contained in the marriage contract at all, because, if the introduction of the grandchildren, strangers to the power, by the codicil, was ultra vires of the appointer, the apportionment of the fee contained in the trust settlement would stand good, not having been revoked by the codicil of 11th September 1905.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the claim for the tutors and curators of Matthew Gemmill Wilson's children is ill founded, and must be repelled, and that the claim for Matthew Gemmill Wilson must be sustained, subject to some adjustment as to deductions.

I understood, at the debate, that the question which I have now decided was the only point of real controversy in the case; and that, this being determined, the parties would have no difficulty in adjusting the terms of an interlocutor which should give effect to the claims of all the parties.—26*th June* 1907.

Slander — Newspaper — Innuendo — "Thief" — Terms of Newspaper Article Held Not to Support Innuendo of Charge of Theft.

Reclaiming Notes against Interlocutors of Lord Mackenzie.

These actions were raised at the instance of George Campbell and Robert Hay respectively against John Ritchie & Co., and concluded for damages in respect of a slander said to be contained in the issue of the "Edinburgh Evening Dispatch" of 26th December 1906. The averments for the pursuer Campbell were as follows:—

Cond. 1. On 26th December 1906 the pursuer was convicted in the Sheriff Court of the Sheriffdom of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh, and fined 4s. sterling following on a complaint of the Procurator-Fiscal of Court of Midlothian for the public interest, of having, along with another on 2nd December 1906, being a date within the period specified in the Order aftermentioned, on Sea Road, near Lauriston Farm in the parish of Cramond and county of Edinburgh, taken three green linnets and a grey linnet, both species of wild birds named in said Order, contrary to the Wild Birds Protection (County of Midlothian) Order 1905, made by the Secretary for Scotland in pursuance of the powers conferred upon him by the Wild Birds Protection Acts 1880 and 1896.

2nd Div. — Campbell v. John Ritchie & Co. Hay v. John Ritchie & Co.

Cond. 2. On 26th December 1906 the defenders, who are the printers, proprietors, and publishers of "The Edinburgh Evening Dispatch" newspaper, published in their issue of said newspaper the following report upon the conviction:—"Bird-liming in Midlothian. Effect of an important new Order. Protection for linnets. As the result of a new Order to apply to Midlothian under the Wild Birds Protection Regulations it is hoped that the prevalent practice of bird-liming for linnets, siskins, wrens, etc., will be stamped out. In the past the Midlothian police have been able to deal with thieves who captured in this way owls and the larger birds, and now the smaller birds will have an equal measure of protection. One of the first cases under the new Order was dealt with at Edinburgh Sheriff Court to-day, when George Campbell, coal porter, Church Place, Edinburgh, and Robert Hay, coal porter, St Stephen's Place, were fined 4s. each or three days for having on 2nd December in Sea Road, near Lauriston Farm, Cramond, taken three green linnets and one grey linnet.

"The mode of operations of the bird-limers is as follows:—The thieves set up decoy birds in cages in a hedge in the vicinity of a house where the birds on which they have an eye are. The hedge itself is strewn with twigs coated with lime, and the thieves have merely to wait till the birds, attracted by the presence of the occupants of the decoy cages, flutter on to the hedge and are caught by the lime."

Cond. 3. The foresaid statements are of and concerning the pursuer. They are false and calumnious, and were made maliciously and without probable or any cause. They charge the pursuer with being a thief and with having stolen said birds, whereas the conviction against him was merely of having contravened the terms of the said Wild Birds Protection Order. Such a contravention does not infer that the contravener has been guilty of the crime of theft or is in any way dishonest, yet the defenders in their said paragraph, in reporting the conviction of the pursuer and commenting thereon and on the methods of bird-limers by which method the pursuer took or aided in taking the birds in question, made use of the word "thieves" on three separate occasions, and thereby led the general public to believe that the pursuer was guilty of the crime of theft and had been convicted of that crime.

The averments for the pursuer Hay were in the same terms.

Each of the pursuers proposed an issue in the following terms:—

It being admitted that the defenders are the printers, proprietors, and publishers of "The Edinburgh Evening Dispatch" newspaper published in Edinburgh; it being also admitted that in the number of the said newspaper which bears date and was printed and published in Edinburgh upon the 26th day of December 1906, there was printed the report set forth in the Schedule annexed hereto,—

2nd Div.
Campbell v. John Ritchie & Co.
Hay v. John Ritchie & Co.

Whether the said report is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer had been guilty of theft, to his loss, injury, and damage?

Damages laid at £100.

Schedule.

[The Schedule contained the article quoted supra in Cond. 2.]

On 22nd May 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) approved of the issues.

The Defenders reclaimed, and argued: An issue should be refused where, as here, a jury could not reasonably give a verdict for the pursuers. The article in question could not support the meaning that the pursuers had been guilty of theft in a criminal sense. The word "thief" was applied to bird-limers as a class and not to the pursuers as individuals, and was used merely as a term of reproach (Bruce, 1901, 4 F. 171; Watson, 1890, 17 R. 404; Agnew, 1906, 8 F. 422; Archer, 18 R. 719; Meikle, 1893, 20 R. 928; Wardlaw, 1898, 25 R. 879; M'Neill, 1883, 10 R. 867).

Argued for the Respondents: To call a person a thief is plainly actionable, and that is what the defenders called the pursuers in the article in question. Whether the defenders' language was slanderous or not, was a question for a jury, and an issue should be allowed.

The Court disallowed the issues and dismissed the actions.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor pronounced by Lord Mackenzie on 22nd May last, by which his Lordship approved of an issue for the trial of an action of damages for libel brought by George Campbell, a coal porter in Edinburgh, against the proprietors of the "Evening Dispatch" newspaper. The issue thus approved of by the Lord Ordinary sets out in a schedule the whole of the paragraph of which the pursuer complains as defamatory, and it asks the question whether the said "report" is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer had been guilty of theft, to his loss, injury and damage.

Now, the paragraph which the pursuer calls a report is partly report and partly comment. In so far as it is a report the pursuer finds no fault with it. He admits that on 26th December last he was convicted in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh of having committed a contravention of the Wild Birds Protection Order of 1905 by having taken four linnets, a species of small birds named in the Order, within the prohibited time, for which contravention he was fined 4s. So far there is nothing to complain of. But the writer of the paragraph, not content with a mere report, goes on to comment upon the incident, and in describing (correctly enough) the methods of what he calls the "bird-limers," he uses three times the word "thieves," and expresses the hope that the prevalent practice of bird-liming will be stamped out. In the use of the word "thieves"—a rather foolish, because inappropriate, word—the pursuer sees his opportunity. Accordingly he proposes as the question for the jury whether the paragraph represents that the pursuer had been guilty of theft. I do not think that the pursuer could have avoided an innuendo of this kind, because if the paragraph did not come up to that, it would not have been libellous at all.

The question, therefore, which we have to decide is whether the words used will bear the innuendo—in other words, whether a jury, having the whole paragraph before them, could reasonably say that it meant to charge the pursuer with theft. Now, I quite concede that, where such a question is doubtful, the proper tribunal to decide it is a jury. Evidence is led before them of persons who have read the words complained of, and can say what impression was made upon their minds. That is the ordinary and proper way, according to our practice, of arriving at a just conclusion as to what the words were really calculated to convey. But that is all qualified by this, that the matter must be in itself doubtful, and that evidence is really required as to the effect produced upon the minds of ordinary readers. I suppose the Lord Ordinary was of opinion, although we do not know precisely what his reasons were, that there was sufficient doubt about the paragraph to require that the case should be laid before a jury.

In that I am sorry that I cannot agree with him. Reading the paragraph as a whole—and that is what we are bound to do—I do not think that any reader of the newspaper could, on reasonable grounds, reach the conclusion that it charged the pursuer with having been guilty of theft. Consequently, I do not think that any jury could, on reasonable grounds, return a verdict for the pursuer. The actual offence with which the pursuer was charged, the plea which he tendered, the penalty which was inflicted upon him, are all correctly set forth. Even the modus operandi of the class of bird-limers is not said to be misrepresented. The only thing complained of is that a word was used in connection with the class of bird-limers which was manifestly exaggerated and inappropriate. How that could reasonably imply that the pursuer had been guilty of theft I am altogether at a loss to see; and therefore I propose that we shall recal the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and find that there is no issuable matter on record.

Lord Low.—It is rather unfortunate that the Lord Ordinary has given no note of the reasons which induced him in this case to allow an issue. We have, however, had the advantage of a very good argument, and I have, and I confess without much difficulty, come to a conclusion different from that at which the Lord Ordinary arrived. The issue proposed is to the effect that the report in the defenders' newspaper represents that "the pursuer had been guilty of theft." The question, accordingly, is whether the article, when fairly read, can be regarded as being capable of bearing that meaning. I think that it cannot. It is quite plain that it does not directly charge the pursuers with theft. The report is headed: "Bird-liming in Midlothian. Effect of an important new Order. Protection for linnets." It then commences by saying that, "as the result of a new Order, to apply to Midlothian, under the Wild Birds Protection Regulations, it is hoped that the prevalent practice of bird-liming for linnets, siskins, wrens, etc., will be stamped out." Omitting in the meantime a sentence to which I shall refer presently, the report proceeds to say: "One of the first cases under the new Order was dealt with at Edinburgh Sheriff Court to-day, when George Campbell and another were fined 4s. each, for having taken three green linnets and one grey linnet." That is the only part of the report which in any way refers directly to the pursuer, and it is not complained of. It is, in fact, admittedly correct. But then the writer of the article, who is evidently a gentleman with strong humanitarian views upon the subject of bird-catching, proceeds to discourse (in the sentence which I omitted, and in the concluding sentences of the article) upon the methods of those who practise the capture of birds by means of bird-lime, and whom he describes as "thieves." Now the pursuer's argument is that seeing that the writer of the article asserts that all bird-limers are thieves, and states (quite truly) that the pursuer was convicted of capturing birds by means of bird-lime, the plain inference is that he represents that the pursuer is a thief, and has been guilty of theft. The logic of the argument is sound enough, but there still remains the question, What did the writer of the article mean by "thief"? I think it is perfectly plain that he did not use the word in the sense contended for by the pursuer, but in another sense, in which it is sometimes (probably incorrectly) used, viz. as designating a person who contrives to get some advantage to which he is not morally entitled although he keeps within his strict legal rights. The pursuer's innuendo accordingly, in my opinion, fails, and he is not entitled to the issue which he asks.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of opinion that in these two actions the first plea in law for the defenders ought to be sustained, and the actions dismissed.

The actions conclude for damages for an alleged slander said to be contained in what the pursuers term a "report upon the conviction" of the pursuers on 26th December 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, and the question is whether the said report can reasonably be held to contain or to import a charge of the crime of theft against the pursuers, or can be reasonably supposed to "lead the general public to believe that the pursuers were guilty of the crime of theft, and had been convicted of that crime." I am of opinion that it would be impossible for any reasonable person to read the report as importing a charge of theft.

The report must be read as a whole; and so reading it, I think it is made plain beyond all possibility of mistake that what the pursuers did was, not to commit the crime of theft, but, in the words of the report, to "take three green linnets and one grey linnet," and that what they were convicted of was not stealing, but catching small birds by means of bird-lime. In my view it would be impossible for any reasonable person to take any other meaning out of the report complained of. The headlines are—

"BIRD-LIMING IN MIDLOTHIAN.

"EFFECT OF AN IMPORTANT NEW ORDER.

"PROTECTION FOR LINNETS."

And then the report goes on to say that one of the first cases under the new Order was dealt with at the Edinburgh Sheriff Court that day, and then proceeds to name the defenders and state the sentence pronounced on them and the offence for which they were convicted. All these statements are absolutely correct, and are not called in question. But it is said that in three places in the report the word "thieves" is used as designating bird-limers, and that the use of this word imports a charge of the crime of theft, and would lead members of the public to believe that the pursuers had been convicted of that crime. I think this is an untenable position. The word "thief" of itself no doubt primarily means a person who steals the property of others, but it also is used as an abusive epithet; and in the said report where it first occurs it refers to persons who capture owls and the larger birds, but it is not averred for the pursuers that they ever captured such birds. Coming next to the passage which is particularly complained of as referring to the pursuers, it is found that instead of being directed against them individually, the passage opens thus:—"The mode of operations of the bird-limers is as follows:—The thieves set up decoy birds in cages in a hedge in the vicinity of a house where the birds on which they have an eye are. The hedge itself is strewn with twigs coated with lime, and the thieves have merely to wait till the birds, attracted by the presence of the occupants of the decoy cages, flutter on to the hedge and are caught by the lime."

Now it needs hardly to be pointed out that what the bird-limers are here described as doing is not stealing but catching birds, although the author of the report, foolishly as I think, uses a rather extravagant term of abuse towards those who practise bird-liming. It is plain, however, that it does not accuse bird-limers as a class of the crime of theft, but merely of performing the operations described. It is of importance to notice also that it is in connection with a class, and not with individuals, that the word "thieves" is here used, and this would bring the case within the principle laid down in the case of Wardlaw, 1898, 25 R. 879, to the effect that intemperate and foolish language directed against a class will not entitle an individual belonging to that class to sue for slander in respect of such language. While I agree with this, I must say I have some difficulty in holding that the words in Wardlaw's case did not sufficiently identify individuals so as to take that particular case out of the category to which the above doctrine applies. I therefore think that the passage of the report which deals with the facts attending the conviction is perfectly inconsistent with a charge of theft, and the information supplied to the public as to the operations of bird-limers in general, is also couched in such language as conclusively to show that the word "thieves" was used as an abusive term and not as intending to mean that the bird-limers were guilty of the crime of theft. Every one knows that the capturing of wild birds is not theft, although it might, as regards game birds, come under another category, which the least educated of the populace understand—viz. that of poaching. On these grounds I hold that the report complained of is not slanderous, because, although the word "thieves" is used, it was impossible, reading the report as a whole, for a person, even of the humblest intelligence, to be misled into the belief that the pursuers had been guilty of the crime of theft, and plainly no reasonable person would ever suppose such a thing.

Thereafter the defenders moved for expenses. The Court refused the motion.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The Court is of opinion that there should be no award of expenses, as the action was to some extent provoked by the exaggerated language used in the article.—22*nd June* 1907.

Ship—Cargo—Quantity Shipped—No Bill of Lading—Delivery—Goods Put Out of Ship and Placed on Quay—Goods Subsequently Transferred to Consignees' Carts — Ship's Responsibility Ceasing When Goods Landed on Quay—Ship Held to Have Delivered Whole Quantity Shipped Although No Receipts Produced and No Tally Taken at Ship's Side.

(Appeal from Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Dundee.)

This was an action brought by Messrs M. Langlands & Son, shipowners, Dundee, against Messrs D. M'Master & Co., manufacturers, Dundee, to recover a sum of £53, 0s. 3d., being the balance of freight in respect of goods which the pursuers had carried from Liverpool to Dundee on behalf of the defenders. The defenders claimed right to retain the sum of £39 in respect of short delivery, and they tendered £21, 10s. in full of the sum sued for.

In January 1904 the defenders bought a quantity of damaged jute cloth called Hessians at an auction sale at Liverpool. On 20th January 1904 Mr M'Master, the sole partner of defenders' firm, entered into a verbal contract with the pursuers' representatives at Liverpool for the conveyance of the goods from Liverpool to Dundee. He handed to the pursuers a delivery order which he had obtained from the auctioneers. The goods were uplifted from the auctioneers by carters employed by the pursuers, and were shipped on three different vessels belonging to the pursuers, the "Princess Victoria," the "Princess Olga," and the "Princess Maud." No bill of lading was granted.

On the arrival of the ships at Dundee the pursuers gave notice of arrival to the defenders' agents, the East Port Calendering Company, to whom the pursuers had been instructed to deliver the goods. It appeared that the goods were put out of the ship and placed on the quay, or in a shed on the quay, by a squad of stevedores called the Dundee Stevedoring Company, who were employed and paid by the shipowners. The goods were then transferred to carts belonging to the East Port Calendering Company by a squad of porters called the Liverpool and Hamburg porters, who were employed and paid by the consignees. The Dundee Stevedoring Company and the Liverpool and Hamburg porters were the same persons under different names. No tally was taken at the ship's side, but the pursuers' clerks generally took receipts from the carters employed by the consignees. It appeared from the receipts that the quantity of Hessians received by the carters was 37 bales and 2171 loose pieces.

The defenders maintained that the quantity of Hessians delivered to the pursuers at Liverpool was 44 bales and 2095 loose pieces. As the quantity received by the defenders at Dundee was 37 bales and 2171 loose pieces, it followed that the pursuers had delivered at Dundee 7 bales less and 76 pieces more than, in the view of the defenders, they ought to have delivered. The defenders maintained that the seven missing bales contained 134 pieces, and that there was thus a shortage of 58 pieces.

The pursuers maintained that they had delivered at Dundee the whole Hessians which they had received at Liverpool. They denied having received 44 bales and 2095 pieces at Liverpool. Alternatively, on the assumption that they had received that quantity, they maintained that the seven missing bales were represented by the 76 extra pieces which they delivered at Dundee. On the assumption that any goods received by the pursuers at Liverpool had not been received by the defenders at Dundee, the pursuers maintained that the missing goods had been lost after delivery, at a time when they were no longer responsible for the goods.

The pursuers also maintained that they were not liable for the loss of the defenders' goods in respect (1) that they were not common carriers, and (2) that their sailing conditions formed part of the contract between the pursuers and the defenders. The Court found it unnecessary to decide the questions raised by these contentions.

On 28th February 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Campbell Smith) decerned against the defenders in terms of their tender.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff, who, on 4th April 1906, recalled the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor and decerned against the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition.

The Defenders appealed, and argued: The contract between the parties was a contract for the conveyance of the defenders' goods from the auctioneers' premises at Liverpool to Dundee, and it was proved that the pursuers had uplifted the whole goods sold to the defenders (i.e. 44 bales and 2095 loose pieces). The pursuers were therefore bound to account for that quantity. It was further proved that the whole quantity had been put on board ship. Now only 37 bales and 2171 loose pieces were delivered at Dundee. There was a shortage of 58 pieces, and the defenders were entitled to deduct their value. The pursuers were responsible for the goods until the goods reached the consignees' carts. Even if the goods were held to be delivered when they reached the quay, it was for the ship to shew that this had been done (Henry Smith & Co. v. Bedwin Steam Navigation Co., 1895, 23 R. (H.L.) 1). The ship might easily have put this beyond question by tallying the goods at the ship's side. But there was no tally until the goods arrived at the consignees' carts, and the carters' receipts showed that there was a shortage. It was not proved that the goods ever came over the ship's side. The pursuers were therefore liable.

Argued for the Respondents: The pursuers were liable as insurers only for goods which were actually put on board ship. The conveyance of the goods from the auctioneers' premises to the ship at Liverpool depended on a separate contract. If any goods were lost during the transit from the auctioneers' premises to the ship the pursuers were liable only if the loss were due to their negligence, and there was no attempt to prove negligence. There was no bill of lading, and the quantity put on board had not been proved. The pursuers had proved affirmatively that the whole goods put on board at Liverpool had been put out of the ship at Dundee. Even if it were held that 44 bales and 2095 pieces had been shipped there was no shortage. The defenders maintained that pursuers had delivered 7 bales too few and 76 pieces too many. The 76 pieces were the missing seven bales broken up. The goods were delivered as soon as they reached the quay (British Shipowners Co. Ltd. v. Grimond, 1876, 3 R. 968; Knight Steamship Co. v. Fleming, Douglas & Co., 1898, 25 R. 1070). If any goods had been lost subsequent to their being landed on the quay the pursuers were not responsible. It was immaterial that the goods had not arrived at the carts. The defenders, if they were to succeed, must exclude this possibility, and they had not done so.

The Court affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree with the Sheriff in his conclusions, and in the main in his analysis of the evidence, and I do not propose in the observations which I offer to enter minutely into questions of detail. The question is, whether the respondents Langlands & Son, a firm of Liverpool shipowners, are liable to the appellants for an apparent deficiency in the quantity of jute goods, called Hessians, received by the appellants at Dundee, when compared with the quantity shipped or supposed to be shipped at Liverpool. The goods in question were part of the salvage of two wrecks. They were damaged by seawater, and were purchased by the appellants at a low price at an auction sale at Liverpool. The deficiency only applied to the goods got from the wreck of the "Highland Scot," with which alone we are concerned. By the contract of carriage, as proved, the respondents undertook to carry a quantity of jute, estimated at from 100 to 150 tons in weight, from Liverpool to Dundee at the rate of ten shillings per ton, which included the cost of lifting the goods and loading at Liverpool. The respondents received from

1st Div.

'M. Langlands & Son v. D. M'Master & Co.

Lord M'Laren.

the appellants the auctioneers' delivery orders entitling them to uplift the jute from the dock where it was stored.

They employed carters to bring the jute goods to another dock where they were to be shipped, and the jute was sent in portions in three of the respondents' ships which sailed at different times, all, I think, within ten days of the receipt of the goods at Liverpool. No bills of lading were issued, and apparently the respondents were not even asked for receipts for specific quantities. This is not very surprising when it is considered that the goods were damaged goods purchased at a low price, and that in the contract of carriage the goods were treated like goods in bulk, and charged by weight.

The absence of specific receipts is, however, in my opinion, not material to the question of liability, because I am satisfied on the evidence that all the jute sold to the appellants ex "Highland Scot" was collected by the respondents, and put on board their ships, and was carried safely to Dundee. In particular, the auctioneers' foreman, Boultbee, gives his assurance that all the goods sold to Mr M'Master were delivered to Messrs Langlands or the persons employed by them. Equally clear and unshaken is the statement of the respondents' wharfinger, that all the jute brought by the carters was put on board their ships under his personal supervision. It is admitted that at the Liverpool docks the theft of bulky goods is practically impossible. The next step in tracing the goods is the custody and care of the goods on the respective voyages. The master and the chief mate of each of the ships were examined, and their evidence is to the effect that all the jute put on board at Liverpool was carried to Dundee, and that no mistakes were made. From their evidence I think that it is also reasonably certain that all the jute carried to Dundee for the appellants was put over the ship's side in each case, and either delivered straight into the appellants' carts, which were waiting to receive it, or, when the carts were not there, placed under a shed on the quay which was appropriated to the reception of goods in course of loading or unloading.

Now the jute as salved consisted in part of bales containing an uncertain number of pieces in each, and in part of loose pieces. When the jute was delivered at Liverpool, there were, I think, seven broken bales containing 134 pieces which became loose pieces in the course of the voyage, and at least two other bales are said to have gone to pieces in handling, thus increasing the number of loose pieces. After allowing for these changes, and treating all the bales as delivered, there was a deficiency on arrival at the calendering establishment at Dundee of a number of loose pieces, estimated at fifty-eight.

I understood that counsel on both sides were satisfied that the deficiency was in the cargo carried by the "Princess Olga," one of the respondents' steamers. I think it is also common ground, at all events it is clear on the evidence, that all the bales are accounted for, and that the deficiency arose on the tally of the loose pieces. The missing pieces seem to have disappeared after they were landed at Dundee, because I think the respondents have satisfactorily discharged themselves of the obligation to prove that all the goods entrusted to their care were brought safely to Dundee.

Now the appellants' case was put in two ways. First, they say the ship can only be legally discharged of its obligation by producing receipts from the consignees, or the carters employed by them, for the entire quantity of goods which were put on board. Alternatively they say there must at least be taken what they call a tally of the goods put over the ship's side, corresponding with the quantity put on board.

I think the first proposition is not maintainable, because it supposes a state of facts which is impossible in practice—that at every moment of time when the ship is unloading there should always be a cart on the spot ready to receive the goods and a carter to give a receipt. But even if a sufficient number of carts are sent to receive the cargo, it will unavoidably happen that from time to time the unloading goes on somewhat faster than the carting; and it is out of the question to say that the ship is to suspend the business of unloading until carts arrive. In this case the ship followed the usual practice of unloading into the shed provided for the reception of the goods, from which the goods were taken by the carts as they arrived. If any of the goods disappeared from the quay (which is a not improbable explanation of the deficiency) I do not think that the ship can be made responsible, because the contract of carriage is at an end as soon as the goods are put on shore. There may be exceptions, as in the case where the indorsee of a bill of lading does not come forward on the ship's arrival and the goods have to be stored. But here the consignee received notice and sent carts for the goods against the ship's arrival. If, then, there was any possibility of pilfering, it was the business of the consignee, and not of the shipowner, to have a person stationed at the landing shed to look after the goods until they were carted away.

The objection that no tally was taken of the goods as landed raises a different question. It is evident that if a tally is to be of any use in fixing responsibility, it must be taken by two persons representing the two parties respectively. Now, if the case of the appellant were that he had sent a representative to check the quantities landed, and that the ship's officers had refused to co-operate in taking a tally, or had professed that there was not time for effective checking, I should have thought there was force in the argument. But it is not said that the respondents were asked to take a tally of the goods, and if they did not think it necessary to do so for their own protection, the only effect of the omission, if it be such, is that the respondents must prove that they landed all the goods which they received at Liverpool. I think they have proved their case on this point, and I will only add that a tally, while it might have saved the cost of this litigation, would have been of no avail for tracing the missing pieces, because there were no marks of identification of any kind on the loose pieces.

In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to consider the respondents' points: (1) that they do not hold themselves out as common carriers; and (2) that they have disaffirmed liability for loss of goods, by notices sent to all their customers. I think, however, it is safe to affirm that if a shipowner runs his ships as general ships, and takes goods from every one who offers to send them, he is in fact a common carrier, and his saying that he is not a common carrier will not alter the fact. We should then have to consider the effect of the notice disaffirming all responsibility for the safe delivery of goods which the shipowner had contracted to carry, including the two questions which have been so often considered, whether the other party may be taken to have accepted the condition, and whether it is a reasonable condition. There is perhaps a third question, Whether there can be a contract in which the one party is liable to pay freight and the other party is under no obligation to deliver the goods? But as I am of opinion that the respondents have performed their obligation (which would attach to them as common carriers) by restoring the goods on the completion of the voyage, I do not propose to answer any of these questions.

It follows that the respondents are entitled to our decree for the unpaid part of the freight of the goods from Liverpool to Dundee, and that the appellants' counter-claim should be disallowed.

D, First Case—Scottish Union and National Insurance Company v. Inland Revenue, 1889, 16 R. 461, 474, Followed.

Case.

This was a case under the Taxes Management Act 1880, between the General Accident Assurance Corporation Ltd. and the Surveyor of Taxes, Perth, on appeal from the Commissioners, who had refused to allow the appellants, in calculating profits for the purposes of income tax, to make a deduction in respect of unexpired risks amounting to one-third of their annual premium income.

The case stated:—

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts and for executing the Acts relating to Inhabited House Duties for the District of the City of Perth, held at Perth on the 15th day of December 1905—

The General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, General Buildings, Perth (hereinafter referred to as "The Company"), appealed against an assessment for the year ending 5th April 1906, on the sum of £20,950 (duty, £1047, 10s.) made upon it under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts in respect of the profits of the business carried on by it, on the ground that in arriving at the assessable profits no deduction had been allowed to meet losses on unexpired risks.

The assessment was made under 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 35, sect. 100, first case; 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 34, sect. 2; and 5 Edw. VII. cap. 4, sect. 6; and the sum assessed is the amount, on an average of three years ending 31st December 1904, arrived at by reference to the Company's revenue accounts as follows:—

The amount on which the Company claims to be assessed.

I. The following facts were admitted or proved:—

1. The Company was incorporated on 23rd February 1891, under the Companies Acts, as a Company limited by shares. The subscribed capital of the Company as on 31st December 1904 was £400,000, divided into 400,000 shares of £1 each. The paid-up capital then amounted to £99,997.
2. The objects of the Company as set forth in the third Article of its Memorandum of Association then in force were, inter alia:—"(a) To undertake and carry on the business of Accident, Employers' Liability, Fidelity, Guarantee, Third Party, Burglary or Theft, Fire, Marine, Vehicle, Plate Glass, and Mortgage, or other investment insurances, or any of them, and all or any other kinds of Insurances of the like or a similar nature . . . . excepting Life Insurance."
3. The Company's Articles of Association provide, inter alia:—
   "87. The Directors may, with the sanction of the Company in general meeting, declare a dividend to be paid to the members in proportion to the amount paid up in pursuance of calls upon the shares held by them, having regard to any preference or priority attaching to such shares respectively."
   "89. No dividend shall be payable except out of the income and profits arising from the investments and business of the Company."
   "90. The Directors may, before paying or recommending any dividend, set aside out of the profits of the Company such sums as they think proper as a Reserve Fund, to meet contingencies or for equalising dividends, bonuses, or for other matters required by or connected with the business of the Company, or any part thereof; and the Directors shall invest separately from other funds the sums so set apart as a Reserve Fund."
   "96. Once at least in every year the Directors shall lay before the Company in general meeting a Balance Sheet and Statement of the Income and Expenditure made up to a date not more than four months before such meeting, and shall send to each shareholder, at least seven days prior to such meeting, a printed copy of such Balance Sheet and Statement. . . ."
4. The Company makes up its accounts to the 31st December in each year. For each of the years ending 31st December 1902, 31st December 1903, and 31st December 1904, the Company paid the dividends shewn in its Reports and Accounts.

5. The business carried on by the Company up to 31st December 1904 consisted of Fire, Sickness, Accident, and Guarantee Insurances. The net premium income for the year 1902 was £231,354, 14s. 10d.; for the year 1903, £262,479, 8s. 3d.; and for the year 1904 (exclusive of £52,940 for monthly payment premiums), £306,258, 2s. 6d.

6. Insurances are effected with the Company at all periods of the year. All its Fire Policies, and much the larger proportion of all its other Policies, are granted for one year. Some of the Policies endure for one month only.

7. It is the practice of Insurance Companies to estimate the unexpired risk at any given date on yearly policies of insurance, whether against Fire, Sickness, or Accident, at 33⅓ per cent. of the total premium income of the year. In the case of policies granted by this Company for one month, it estimates the unexpired risk at any given date at 50 per cent. of one month's premium income.

8. The annual accounts made up by the Company, in terms of the Companies Acts, shew the results of the Company's business in all its branches in one Revenue Account. Each year's Revenue Account credits premiums, interest, and other income received, and debits losses, expenses of management, and other disbursements made during the year, and brings out a balance which, for each of the years 1902, 1903, and 1904, was a credit balance or surplus.

9. This surplus is described in the Reports by the Directors of the Company as "the balance at credit of Revenue Account after providing for estimated claims" (i.e. claims made but not settled) "and outstanding accounts." In their Reports the Directors recommend that a certain proportion of this surplus shall be appropriated to the payment of dividend, interim (previously declared) and final; that a certain proportion shall be placed to reserve; and that the balance shall be carried forward to next year's account, and these recommendations are considered at the annual meetings of the Company held in March or April each year and adopted, a fixed amount of the balance of the Revenue Account being thus appropriated to interim dividend, final dividend, and reserve.

10. The amount paid in dividends for each of the years 1902, 1903, and 1904, was £9999. The amount placed to reserve for the year 1902 was £14,000, and for each of the years 1903 and 1904, £20,000.

11. The amount of the reserve as at 31st December 1904 was £150,000, made up of £85,500 set aside from Revenue Account and of £64,500 derived from premiums on the issue, during the period from the year 1896 to the year 1902, of new shares in the Company, which latter sum was carried direct to reserve, and was not credited in the Revenue Accounts, and on which no income tax has been paid. The amount of the deduction claimed by the Company for unexpired risks at 31st December 1904 is £104,291, 18s. The Reserve is described in the Annual Balance Sheets as "Reserve Fund, including reserve for unexpired risks." In the opinion of the Commissioners, no part of the Company's Revenue is specifically appropriated to a Reserve for unexpired risks, and no losses arising during the period of unexpired risks are charged to Reserve Fund. The income of each year has hitherto been sufficient to meet the losses on the unexpired risks of the previous year as well as its own losses, and to allow of an addition being made to the reserve. The losses on the unexpired risks of any year are paid out of the income of the following year, and in arriving at the amount of the profits for such following year for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, a deduction is allowed in respect of such payments.

12. In arriving at the assessable profits of the Company for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts in any year a deduction for the unexpired risks of that year has never been allowed.

II. The Company contended that, before arriving at the profits for the year for income tax purposes, the deductions for unexpired risks made in the foregoing particulars of income should be allowed; that, in the case of any insurance company with yearly policies, and in particular, in the case of a company whose premium income was rapidly increasing, it was clearly necessary to provide for unexpired risks before the true profit could be ascertained; and that, if this were so, the appellants were entitled to the deductions claimed, whether they had made provision for unexpired risks in their annual accounts or not. It was further contended that, in point of fact, such provision had been made in the annual accounts, because the Balance Sheet contained an account entered as "Reserve Fund, including amount reserved for unexpired risks," and to that account the Company had each year carried a large proportion of the balance of revenue. It was further contended that the case differed entirely from that of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company v. Inland Revenue, 1889, 16 R., pp. 461 and 474, relied on by the Surveyor of Taxes, in respect (1) that in that case the premium income was practically stationary, and (2) that no provision whatever had been made in the accounts for unexpired risk.

III. The Surveyor of Taxes (Mr James M'Gowan) maintained (1) that in arriving at the amount of the assessable profits of the Company the whole of the premiums received by the Company in any year ought to be taken into account as profits of that year, notwithstanding that the risks covered by a portion of such premiums may extend into the subsequent year (Imperial Fire Insurance Company v. Wilson, 1876, 35 L.T.R. 271; 1 Tax Cases 71); (2) that the Company is not entitled to make yearly the deduction claimed for unexpired risks in respect that the deduction is not one of the expressly enumerated deductions authorised by the provisions of the Income Tax Act to be made in estimating its annual profits (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 100 and 159); (3) that the unexpired risks ought not to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of income tax payable by the Company, in respect that the accounts of the Company, on which the assessment made is based, show that such risks are not taken into account for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of profits divisible among the shareholders of the Company, and that it is only after declaring the dividend out of the profits that any sum is placed to General Reserve; and (4) that the present case is governed by the opinion of the Court in the cases of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, and the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company v. Inland Revenue, 1889, 16 R. 461 and 474. In the latter case it was stated that "in the Fire Department of the business it has for many years been the custom of the Company, on 31st December, when the books are closed for the year, to set aside one third of the net premiums received during the past year to provide for liabilities on current policies" (Stated Case, p. 6).

IV. The Commissioners, on consideration of the facts and arguments submitted to them, being of opinion that the assessment on the Company was made in accordance with the instructions given by the Court in the cases of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company and Others v. Inland Revenue, dismissed the appeal and confirmed the assessment.

Counsel for the appellants cited, in addition to the decisions mentioned in the case, Rance's case, 1870, 6 Ch. App. 104.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord M'Laren. — There is no doubt that the question which has been argued before us is a question of great importance to insurance companies, whose business in the aggregate is very large, and if it had come up for the first time, we should have desired to hear a full argument upon it. But the point is not new, because it was first considered nearly thirty years ago by the Court of Exchequer in England in The Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Wilson, and eighteen years ago it was considered by this Division of the Court in the case of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. In the collective opinion of the Court, which was delivered by Lord President Inglis, the distinction (which had long before been recognised) is clearly drawn between the character of the business done by fire insurance offices and the character of the business done by life insurance offices, the one being an annual contract of indemnity and the other being a prospective contract which may endure for the whole course of the life of the person making the contract, provided he continues to pay his premiums. Obviously these two classes of insurance business have to be treated on different principles. Now, with regard to fire insurance, their Lordships, who had the English case before them, were satisfied with the rules there laid down, and they were content in a single sentence to express the ratio of that judgment—that the contract was an annual contract, and that while a complete deduction could not be made in the year in which the premiums were paid, yet what was not made in that year was allowed in the following year, and thus approximate justice was done between the Crown and the subject. That, according to the opinion of the Court of Exchequer in England and the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, is the best approximation we can make to profits under the somewhat stringent conditions of the Income Tax Acts. Now we are asked to reconsider the question. I do not think that any of your Lordships would hold that this Division of the Court would take it upon itself to consider the question as if it had not been already decided by our own Division, and I do not see anything in the circumstances of the case which ought to lead us to refer it to a larger Court. I think, on the contrary, the acquiescence for eighteen years in the principle of that decision shews that the insurance companies have not felt aggrieved by the rule there laid down. But, sitting as one Division of the Court, I think it is enough to say that we confirm the decision of the Commissioners.

Lord Kinnear.—Mr Constable conceded that he could not prevail in this case unless we are to overrule the judgment in the case of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Co., and the other case which was considered at the same time. I cannot doubt that that decision is binding upon this Court, and I think we are not entitled to disregard it. If it is to be challenged, it must be challenged elsewhere. So far as we are concerned, we are bound to follow it.

Lord Pearson.—I take the same view.—4th June 1907.

Parochial Board of Auchtermuchty, 1880, 7 R. 986, and Gillanders v. Campbell, 1884, 12 R. 309, Followed.

Special Case.

The parties to this Special Case were the Parish Council of the City Parish of Edinburgh, First Parties, and the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Councillors of the City of Edinburgh, Second Parties.

The questions submitted to the Court raised a number of points as to assessments imposed by the First Parties.

The following were the statutory enactments referred to as set forth in the case.

Sect. 22 of the Act of 1832 (2 Will. IV. cap. 87) provides: "The police offices, watch-houses, and other buildings or grounds within the said bounds connected with the establishment of the said police shall be exempted from the payment of all cess, minister's stipend, road money, poor's-rates, and police duties, imposed or to be imposed."

The Edinburgh Police Act 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 113), sect. 58, provides: "The police offices, station houses, dwelling-houses, and other buildings or grounds within the limits of this Act connected with the police establishment shall be exempted from the payment of all cess, minister's stipend, road money, poor's-rates, and police assessments, imposed or to be imposed."

By the Edinburgh Municipality Extension Act 1856, the municipal boundaries of the city were made co-extensive with the police bounndaries, and the powers and duties of the Commissioners of Police under the previous Police Acts were transferred to and vested in the second parties, who thenceforward were the administrators of both the municipal or common good properties and duties, and the various properties and duties, which had previously been under the Commissioners of Police.

By the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 132), the Acts of 1848 and 1856 were repealed. Sect. 70 provided: "The burgh assessments shall not be imposed in respect of the Royal Palace of Holyrood, Queen's Park, Arthur's Seat, Duddingston Loch, nor houses or buildings in the Castle of Edinburgh, nor the Courts of Justice, General Register House, City Chambers, County Buildings, Prison of Edinburgh, nor the University of Edinburgh and the buildings connected therewith, except those parts which are used as houses, nor the Royal Infirmary, the Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Sick Children, nor the Assembly Hall of the Church of Scotland, the Free Church College, the Free Church Assembly Hall, the Synod Hall of the United Presbyterian Church, and the buildings connected therewith, so long as these shall continue to be solely used for ecclesiastical purposes or shall not be let for hire for other purposes, except those parts which are used as houses; or in respect of any house or building which is solely occupied for purposes of public charity, or any premises exempted from taxation by public law: and the public parks, gardens, and bleaching greens, drying greens and grounds, public buildings, public wash-houses, baths, gymnasiums, open spaces, the police offices, station houses, and other buildings or grounds connected with the police establishment, or provided or upheld out of the burgh assessments, shall be exempted from the payment of such assessments, and the said police offices, station houses, houses, and other buildings or grounds connected with the police establishment shall also continue to be exempted from the payment of all cess or poor-rates imposed or to be imposed." By sect. 5 the word "house" is interpreted to mean "dwelling-house."

1st Div.

Parish Council of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The Education (Scotland) Act 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sect. 44, provides: "Any sum required to meet a deficiency in the school fund, whether for satisfying present or future liabilities, shall be provided by means of a local rate within the parish or burgh in the school fund of which the deficiency exists. The School Board of each parish and burgh shall annually, and not later than the 12th day of June in each year, certify to the Parochial Board or other authority charged with the duty of levying the assessment for relief of the poor in such parish or burgh the amount of the deficiency in the school fund required to be provided by means of a local rate, and the said Parochial Board or other authority is hereby authorised and required to add the same under the name of 'School Rate' to the next assessment for relief of the poor, and to lay on and assess the same, one-half upon the owners and the other half on the occupiers of all lands and heritages, and to levy and collect the same along with the assessment for relief of the poor when that assessment is so imposed and levied, and to pay over the amount to the School Board . . . . and should there be no assessment for the poor, or should that assessment not be laid, one-half on the owners and the other half on the occupiers of all lands and heritages within such parish or burgh, the School Board shall be entitled and bound directly to assess for and levy the school rate in the same manner as if it were poor's assessment duly authorised to be assessed and levied in the same manner, and for that purpose shall have all the powers and authorities of any Parochial Board or other authority with respect to assessing, levying, and collecting poor's assessment, and the school rate shall in all cases be levied and collected in the same manner as poor's assessment, and the laws applicable for the time to the imposition, collection, and recovery of poor's assessment shall be applicable to the school rate."

1st Div.

Parish Council of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The following statement of facts is taken from Articles 8 and 10 of the Special Case (certain passages as to the former practice in regard to the payment of rates being omitted).

"8. Under the provisions of the 1879 Act, the second parties were required to appoint, inter alia, the following officials for carrying on the government of the city placed by the statutes upon them, viz. a "collector" (defined by sect. 5 of the said Act to mean "the collector of police and other local rates leviable under this or any general or local Act of Parliament"), an inspector of lighting and cleansing, a burgh engineer, a medical officer of health and surgeon of police, a chief constable, a prosecutor in the Police Court, a clerk of the Police Court, and a firemaster. The second parties also appoint (1) a town clerk, who, in addition to his ordinary duties as town clerk, performs the duties formerly discharged by the clerk appointed by the Police Commissioners under the Act of 1848, and (2) an official who, in addition to being city chamberlain, performs the duties of the police treasurer.

"10. The properties in respect of which the first parties have imposed poor and school rates upon the second parties (which rates the second parties decline to pay) are properties owned, occupied, and used by the second parties, or occupied and used by the second parties for carrying on the duties of administration placed by the statutes upon them. These properties embrace the following:—

"(1) The Police Chambers, No. 1 Parliament Square. At present the Police Chambers, in addition to being the headquarters of the police or watching force, also contain the following—the Police Court-room and relative offices for the Clerk of Court and Public Prosecutor, a room for the Judge of Police, a room for the Medical Officer of Health and Surgeon of Police, and the office of the Burgh Engineer and Master of Works. There are also two houses on the top flat occupied rent-free by the Deputy Chief Constable and the caretaker of the chambers, who are required to live in them in connection with their services. In addition to the above, the Police Chambers until a few years ago contained the following:—The headquarters of the fire brigade (now removed to the new chief fire station at Lauriston Place), the offices of the Collector of Police and other local rates, and the Inspector of Lighting and Cleansing (now removed to more commodious premises in the High Street adjoining the City Chambers), and the offices of the Medical Officer of Health and Surgeon of Police and Sanitary Inspector (now also removed to more commodious premises in the High Street, except that the Medical Officer of Health and Surgeon of Police still retains one room in the Police Chambers). The Collector of Police Rates, in addition to collecting the burgh assessments, also collects the charges for electric current, his office and staff being used for both these purposes. . . . The various premises included in the Police Chambers are not entered separately in the Valuation Roll, a cumulo rent being entered for the whole building.

"(2) The City Chambers, Royal Exchange. These premises are used partly for police, partly for municipal, and partly for judicial purposes, and comprise the following:—Council and committee rooms and relative premises; Burgh Court-room (used also as Dean of Guild Court-room) and relative offices for the Clerk of Court and Procurator-Fiscal; offices of the Town Clerk, the City Chamberlain and Treasurer of Police, the City Superintendent of Works, the City Road Surveyor, the City Gardener, the Inspector of Hackney Carriages, and Council Officers; and houses occupied rent-free by the housekeeper and two other officers who are required to live in them in connection with their services. . . . Since 1873 the City Chambers have been greatly extended. For the purposes of the city accounts one-fourth of their upkeep is now charged against the municipal funds, and three-fourths against the burgh assessments. The work of the police department, in proportion to the municipal department, has greatly increased in recent years. The various premises included in the City Chambers are not entered separately in the Valuation Roll, a cumulo rent being entered for the whole building.

"(3) Houses not contiguous to branch police stations occupied rent-free by officers of the police or watching force, who are required to live in them in connection with their services. . . .

"(4) Properties connected with the fire-engines department, comprising the chief fire station, branch fire stations, houses in chief and branch fire station buildings, or contiguous thereto, occupied rent-free by the firemaster and members of the fire brigade, who are required to live in them in connection with their services, and houses similarly occupied by members of the fire brigade, but which are not contiguous to branch fire stations. . . .

"(5) Properties connected with the lighting and cleansing department, comprising the offices of the Inspector of Lighting and Cleansing, workshops, stables, yards and stores for the department, muster rooms, mud tooms, refuse destructor, and refuse loading banks. . . .

"(6) The offices of the Medical Officer of Health and Surgeon of Police, the Sanitary Inspector, and the Collector of Police. Until a few years ago these offices were situated in the Police Chambers. . . .

"(7) Workshops, stores, yards, etc., in connection with the Burgh Engineer's department. . . .

"(8) Offices, yards, and stone depôts of the Roads Department. . . ."

The contentions of parties were set forth in the case as follows:—

12. In these circumstances, the first parties maintain that they are entitled to assess properties falling under the heads enumerated in Article 10 hereof for both poor and school rates. They maintain that any exemption in a local Act from burdens imposed by a public general statute must be strictly interpreted, and that the exemption in question is limited to premises connected with the police establishment—that is, the ordinary organised civil police of the city, maintained for the preservation of order and prevention of crime. In particular, with reference to free houses occupied by members of the police force, the first parties maintain that these represent wages or salary, and that unless they actually form part of the police offices, stations, and other premises specially exempted by said clause, they are rateable. Further, with particular reference to the Police Chambers, No. 1 Parliament Square, and the City Chambers, the first parties maintain that as these are not used exclusively in connection with the police establishment, the said subjects are not entitled to exemption, at least until the rental has been allocated. The first parties further maintain that all these contentions apply equally to school rate as to poor rate in respect of the provisions of sect. 44 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1872. Alternatively, the first parties maintain that all the said subjects are and were assessable in so far as used for purposes not connected with the police establishment, strictly so called.

13. The second parties maintain (1) That the phrase "police establishment" used in sect. 58 of the Act of 1848 means the whole organisation which the Commissioners of Police appointed under that Act were required to set up for the purpose of carrying out its provisions, and does not mean merely the watching force; (2) that the phrase "police establishment" in sect. 70 of the Act of 1879 means similarly the whole organisation which the second parties are required by statute to set up, and for which they are entitled to levy rates, and does not mean merely the watching force; or, in any event, it means such part of the organisation which the second parties were required to set up under the 1879 Act as they were authorised to maintain under the 1848 Act; (3) that the second parties are entitled to exemption from poor rates on all the properties occupied and used by them in carrying out the provisions of the statutes providing for the administration of the city, or, in any event, on all properties occupied and used by them for purposes for which they required properties under the 1848 Act; and (4) that they are entitled to exemption from poor rates in respect of the subjects specified in Article 10 hereof. The second parties do not claim exemption from poor rates in respect of properties which, although maintained out of the burgh assessments, are not occupied or used in connection with the administration of the city,—as, for example, properties dedicated to the use or recreation of members of the public, such as public parks, public baths, public wash-houses, free libraries, etc. The second parties maintain in any event that they are entitled to exemption from poor rates in respect of the portions of the Police Chambers occupied by the Watching Department and as a Court-room and as accommodation for the Clerk of Court and Public Prosecutor and their staffs, to an extent proportionate to the ratio borne by these portions to the whole building. The second parties further maintain that they are entitled to exemption from poor rates in respect of the portions of the City Chambers occupied by the Burgh Court-room, and the offices of the Clerk of Court and Procurator-Fiscal, and the portion of the Police Chambers occupied by the Police Court-room, the Clerk of the Police Court, and the Public Prosecutor, on the ground that they are premises dedicated to the administration of justice, and that such premises are exempt from taxation. The second parties also maintain that, in view of the terms of sect. 44 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1872, the first parties are not entitled to levy school rates on any properties which are exempt from poor rates.

The Questions of Law were as follows:—

1. Does the exemption from liability to poor rates contained in the 70th section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act 1879 apply only to the offices, stations, and other premises connected with the police establishment in the sense contended for by the first parties in Article 12 hereof?

   Or, alternatively,

   Does it apply to subjects or premises belonging to or leased by the second parties and occupied in the conduct of the following departments, or any of them, viz.:—
   (1) The Burgh Engineer's Department.
   (2) The Department of the Medical Officer of Health and Surgeon of Police.
   (3) The Town Clerk's Department, with the exception of the proportion effeiring to the Common Good or proper municipal business.
   (4) The Treasurer of Police Department.
   (5) The City Superintendent of Works Department, with the exception of the proportion effeiring to the Common Good properties.
   (6) The City Roads Department.
   (7) The Fire Department.
   (8) The Lighting Department.
   (9) The Cleansing Department.
   (10) The Sanitary Inspector's Department.
   (11) The Collector of Police Department.
2. Are the first parties entitled to assess for poor rates houses belonging to or leased by the second parties, not contiguous to police stations, and occupied rent free by members of the police force?
3. Where a building belonging to or leased by the second parties is entered at a cumulo rent in the Valuation Roll, and parts of such building are occupied by departments whose premises are exempt from poor rates and parts by departments whose premises are not so exempt, are the first parties entitled to recover poor rates from the second parties on the cumulo rent of the building?

   Or, alternatively,

   Should the said rent be rateably apportioned as between the parts of the premises which are exempt and the parts of the premises which are not exempt, and the poor rate levied accordingly?
4. Should a rateable apportionment be made in the case of premises occupied partly in connection with departments to which the exemption from poor rates applies and partly in connection with departments to which said exemption does not apply, and the poor rate levied accordingly?
5. Are the second parties entitled to exemption from poor rates in respect of (a) the portion of the City Chambers occupied by the Burgh Court-room, and the offices of the Clerk of the Burgh Court and Procurator-Fiscal; and (b) the portion of the Police Chambers occupied by the Police Court-room and the offices of the Clerk of Court and Public Prosecutor?
6. Are the first parties entitled to levy school rates on properties which are exempt from poor rates?

1st Div.

Parish Council of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Argued for the First Parties: Query 1. Apart from the case of Crown property, the presumption was against exemption, and it was for the second parties to shew that they were exempt (Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trs. v. Cameron, 1865, 11 Clark (H.L.) 443; Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Surveyor of Taxes, 1889, 17 R. 73). The words "police establishment" might be read as including the whole city administration apart from the common good. But in their primary meaning the words included only those functions of preserving order and suppressing crime which were functions of the imperial government (Coomber v. Justices of Berkshire, 1883, L.R. 9 A.C. 61; Surveyor of Taxes v. Smith, 1901, 4 F. 31). It was no answer to say that in this view the exemption did no more than exempt only premises which were exempt at common law. The framer of the section had seen fit to exempt from burgh assessments the palace of Holyrood and other Crown property, which were unquestionably exempt at common law. No doubt the word "continue" referred back to the old statutes of 1832 and 1848. But the practice under these statutes (the details of which were set forth in the special case but are not material for the purposes of this report) was irrelevant. The doctrine of contemporanea expositio did not apply to modern statutes (Clyde Navigation Trs. v. Laird, 1883, 10 R. (H.L.) 77, per Lord Watson at p. 83). The first alternative of question 1 should be answered in the affirmative, and the second alternative in the negative. Query 2. The houses occupied by members of the police force were merely rented houses, and were truly a portion of the men's wages. Therefore they were not exempt (Advocate-General v. Beattie, 1856, 18 D. 378; Rex v. Matthews, 1777, Caldecott 1; Showers v. Chelmsford Union, 1890, 60 L J. Mags. Cases, 1 and 55). They might have been exempt if they had formed part of police station premises (Cross v. West Derby Union, 1899, 16 T.L.R. 120), but this was not the case. Query 3. Where separate parts of premises were used for police purposes, and separate parts for municipal purposes, the second parties were not entitled to exemption until they allocated the rent so as to show the value of the premises which still remained assessable. It was for the second parties to make out their exemption. Further, the second parties were and the first parties were not in a position to ascertain the true value of the separate parts of the premises (Cowan & Strachan v. Inland Revenue, 1880, 7 R. 491). Query 4. Where the same premises were used partly for police and partly for municipal purposes, and local separation was impossible, the premises were not exempt. The premises were either connected with the police establishment or they were not. It was necessary to ascertain their true character, and a money allocation was incompetent. The second parties were not entitled to exemption except in the case of premises which were used wholly for police purposes (College Street U.F. Church Trs. v. Parish Council of Edinburgh, 1901, 3 F. 414). Query 5. This query should be answered in the negative. The second parties were not entitled to exemption until they had allocated the rent. Query 6. Exemption from poor rates did not infer exemption from school rates. Sect. 44 of the Education Act imported the law relating to the imposition of poor rate, but not the exemptions therefrom (Hogg v. Parochial Board of Auchtermuchty, 1880, 7 R. 986; Gillanders v. Campbell, 1884, 12 R. 309).

1st Div.

Parish Council of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Argued for the Second Parties: The words "police establishment" included all departments of city government which the second parties were bound by their statutes to set up as distinguished from such subjects as parks and bowling greens, which the second parties were entitled, but were not under statutory obligation, to acquire. If the first parties' construction were sound, it must be applied to the exemption from burgh assessments, and would lead to the anomalous result that the second parties would have to pay rates to themselves in respect of the subjects in question. The word "continue" in sect. 70 referred back to the previous Acts of 1832 and 1848, and the practice under these Acts was important, as showing that the subjects in question were exempt (Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, p. 459). Query 2. Sect. 70 exempted houses connected with the police establishment. By sect. 5 the word "house" was interpreted to mean "dwelling-house." It followed that houses occupied by members of the police force were exempt. Query 3. The first alternative should be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative (Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Surveyor of Taxes, cit.). There was no practical difficulty in allocating the rent. The first parties were bound to make deductions for repairs from the rent appearing in the Valuation Roll (Aberdeen Parish Council v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1906, 8 F. 1072), and it was just as easy to make a deduction in respect of parts of the premises which were not assessable. Query 4. Where the same premises were used at one time for police purposes, and at another for municipal purposes, a money allocation should be made (Magistrates of Edinburgh v. The Surveyor of Taxes, cit.). Query 5. This query should be answered in the affirmative. It raised only the question of allocation. Query 6. Wherever the second parties were entitled to exemption from poor rates they were also exempt from school rates. Sect. 44 of the Education Act imported the whole law relating to the collection of the poor rate, including exemptions. The ministers' cases (Hogg, cit., and Gillanders, cit.) were distinguishable. There the exemption was personal to the parish minister. Here the exemption was claimed in respect of subjects.

The Court answered the first alternative of the first question in the affirmative and the second alternative in the negative; the second question in the negative; the second alternative of the third question in the affirmative; the fourth question in the negative; the fifth question in the affirmative; and the sixth question in the affirmative except as to the subjects described in question five, which at common law are exempt from taxation.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by Lord M'Laren.

Lord M'Laren.—By a series of local statutes, the last of which is entitled The Edinburgh Police Act 1848, the control of certain departments of local administration was vested in a representative body called the Police Commission. By the 58th section of this Act certain buildings were exempted from the payment of local rates, poor rate being expressly mentioned. In the description of the buildings exempted the words used are "police offices, station houses, dwelling-houses, and other buildings or grounds within the limits of this Act connected with the police establishment." The first question for consideration is, whether the expressions "police" and "police establishment" are to be construed according to the ordinary and more restricted meaning of an organisation for the prevention of crime and the maintenance of public order, or are to be taken in a wider sense as including other departments of municipal administration constituted by statute. As a guide to the true meaning of the words in question, it may be useful to consider what is the extent of the exemption from taxation which may be claimed by public authorities independently of special statutory exemption. The most authoritative statement of the law on this subject is the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Coomber v. The Justices of Berkshire. The question was as to the liability to taxation of a county assize court with its offices. Lord Blackburn delivered the leading opinion, but perhaps the clearest statement of the principle is a passage quoted by Lord Watson from Lord Blackburn's opinion in a previous case: "Long series of cases have established that where property is occupied for the purposes of the government of the country, including under that head the police and the administration of justice, no one is rateable in respect of such occupation" (9 App. Ca. 72).

In 1848, when the Edinburgh Police Act was passed, it cannot be said that the application of this principle or its extent were fully understood; indeed I am not sure that the limits of the principle are even yet thoroughly settled. It was therefore very natural that the Police Commissioners, in the Act which they obtained from Parliament, should seek to have a settlement of this question for themselves. On the other hand, I think it is unlikely that they should have sought, or that Parliament should have granted, exemptions from taxation that were independent of the general law as to the incidence of taxation on public property. If, then, there is any ambiguity in the words "police" and "police establishment," as used in the Police Act of 1848, sound construction requires that we should give to these words a meaning which is consistent with the general law, rather than to interpret them in the wider sense, which would include buildings appropriated to purely municipal purposes for the exemption of which no good reason can be assigned.

I ought to state that there is a later Act than that of 1848, viz. the Act of 1879, passed after the Police Board had been merged in the Town Council. But the exemption (which is contained in sect. 70) is only a repetition of the exemption in the 1848 Act in identical terms.

The first question in the case includes a large number of alternatives; but as the answers to these all depend on the application of the principle of construction which I have announced, it will be sufficient to state the decision of the Court under each head.

(1) and (2). Departments of burgh engineer and medical officer of health. These are departments of municipal administration, and do not fall within the exemption.

(3) and (4). The business of the town clerk's department and of the treasurer of police are said to include the administration of funds which are raised for proper police purposes. But the greater part of the work done in these departments is municipal business, and as it is impossible to make a local separation, exemption cannot be claimed under these heads. It would be contrary to the spirit of all the authorities to make a money allocation of the premises used for such purposes; because the principle is, that unless the building is used exclusively for purposes connected with the service of the Crown, the exemption will not hold.

These observations apply also to heads (10) and (11).

(5) and (6). The works and roads here referred to were not under the care of the Police Commission during the time when there was a Police Commission distinct from the Town Council, and the exemption cannot be maintained.

(7), (8), and (9). Fire prevention and lighting and cleansing were within the functions of the Police Commission as defined by the recited statutes, but it is not therefore to be assumed that the buildings used for these purposes are exempt from total taxation. If it had been intended that no building used for any of the public purposes which were controlled by the Police Commission should be assessed for poor rates, this might easily have been expressed as a general exemption of all the property of the Commission. But the exemption is not of this general character. Sect. 58 of the Police Act of 1848 (p. 5 of the Case) enumerates the classes of buildings which are to be exempted from local taxation. These are, briefly, police offices and buildings on grounds connected with the police establishment; and it could not be intended under this description to include buildings appropriated to lighting and cleansing or the prevention of fire.

The result is that the exemption does not apply to any of the buildings enumerated under the second alternative of the first question. The first alternative of the first question will therefore fall to be answered in the affirmative and the second alternative in the negative.

1ST DIV.

Parish Council of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Lord M'Laren.

2. We consider that the houses here described are covered by the expression, "police offices, station-houses and dwelling-houses" used in the 58th section of the Act of 1848, and substantially re-enacted by the Act of 1879. The question will accordingly be answered in the negative.

3. Where a local separation of the subjects entered in cumulo can be made, as in the case of the burgh court room and the police court room and their precincts, the second parties will be entitled to have these subjects separately valued. As regards the current year we cannot give any useful decision, as the parties have not put a value upon the subjects for which exemption is claimed.

4. We answer this question in the negative.

5. We answer this question in the affirmative.

6. It is settled by concurring decisions of the two Divisions of this Court, that what are termed class-exemptions from assessment for poor rate are not extended to school rate (Hogg, 7 R. 986, and Gillanders, 12 R. 309). The Education Act does not authorise such exemptions, and the provision that the school rate is to be collected along with the poor rate is held to be a merely administrative provision with a view to economical collection of the rates, and not as intended to identify the rates.

In the case of Gillanders, the Lord President, after stating the principle that no person can claim exemption from a tax or rate imposed by statute unless the statute gives him the exemption, goes on to say that there is one exception to this rule, the case of Crown property, an exception depending on the constitutional principle that the Crown cannot be taxed without its consent. Under this exception it is clear that the second parties are entitled to exemption from school rates as well as poor rates in respect of the buildings described in question 5, viz. the court rooms and their adjuncts, as being property appropriated to the service of the Crown, although heritably vested in the magistrates and council of Edinburgh.

But with respect to the other police buildings which are exempted from poor rates by these local statutes, the exemption would not apply to school rates. The claim of the second parties to exemption from school rates in respect of police offices, barracks, and police officers' houses, is based on the theory that these buildings are appropriated to the service of the Crown. Now it is true that in the case of Coomber the county building which was held by the House of Lords to be exempted from income tax included a police station which was a part of the block of buildings erected for the purposes of an assize court. But in that case the police station was really an adjunct of the assize court, and it would be carrying the principle too far to treat the central police office of Edinburgh and the police stations and barracks throughout the city as adjuncts or pertinents of the police court, which is a court of very limited jurisdiction. Unless they can be so treated, so as to fall within the general exemption of Crown property from imperial and local taxation, these buildings must be considered as subject to payment of school rates. This question, accordingly, must be answered in the affirmative, except as to the subjects described in the fifth question, which at common law are exempt from taxation.—27th June 1907.

The pursuer, who was a clerk and journalist in Edinburgh, raised this action of damages for slander against the defenders, who carried on a clothier's business in Edinburgh and elsewhere. The following statement of the circumstances giving rise to the action is taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

"The slander complained of in this action is contained in a letter written by the defenders' manager, W. O. Hall, to the pursuer. The circumstances in which the letter was written, according to the pursuer's averments, are these. On or prior to 2nd February 1907 the pursuer purchased an overcoat at the defender's Edinburgh shop. The coat was delivered on 2nd February; and I think I may assume the price was payable on delivery. The pursuer found that it did not fit, and as he had occasion to use it he asked the porter to leave it, which he did, on the pursuer's promise to call and settle with the defenders. He did not do so at once, and on 11th February the letter founded on was written. On the following day the pursuer paid the price of the overcoat."

The letter, which was in the schedule appended to the proposed issue, was in the following terms:—

27 North Bridge,
Edinburgh, Feby. 11/07.

Mr Handasyde,
41 Bruntsfield Gdns.

Dear Sir,

We beg to call your attention to our memo of the 7th inst., the terms of which you have failed to comply. You also promised our assistant on the 8th inst. that you would call and see our manager on the 9th inst. in respect to the payment of the Overcoat, this also you have failed to do.

We have consulted our agent on the matter, who points out that you having insisted on keeping the Overcoat and refusing to pay for it in the face of our protest makes the case one of theft and for the police authorities to take up.

We therefore herewith give you notice that unless the Overcoat is settled here by 12 oc. noon Tuesday, 12th inst., we shall at once instruct our agent to proceed with the case.—Yours faithfully,

For J. Hepworth & Son, Limited,
W. O. H.

The pursuer averred that the letter was written by Hall as manager of the business, and within the scope of his authority, and for his masters' benefit.

The defenders pleaded (1) that the averments of the pursuer were irrelevant; (2) that the statements in the letter were not slanderous; (3) that the occasion being privileged, malice must go into the issue, and that no facts and circumstances inferring malice were averred; (4) that Mr Hall in writing said letter acted outwith the scope of his employment.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the first plea in law for the defenders, and approved of the following issue as amended for the trial of the cause:—

Whether, on or about the eleventh day of February nineteen hundred and seven, the defenders, by their manager, W. O. Hall, wrote and dispatched to the pursuer a letter in the terms contained in the Schedule hereto annexed; and whether the statements in said letter are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer had been guilty of theft, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage?

Lord Salvesen [after stating the facts as above].—I cannot doubt that on the face of it the letter is slanderous, as imputing dishonesty to the pursuer. It distinctly asserts that his conduct amounted to theft, and was one for the police authorities to take up; and I think the last sentence is capable of meaning that unless payment were made, instructions would be given for criminal proceedings against the pursuer. The defenders, however, plead that the letter was privileged, and that therefore malice must go into the issue. I think the question is one of difficulty, but I have come to be of opinion that the slanderous statement was not prima facie privileged. There is no plea of veritas, and accordingly the imputation on the pursuer's character must be held to have been false. The defenders had, of course, a perfect right to communicate with the pursuer on the subject of the overcoat, and to urge him, under the threat of civil proceedings, to make payment; but the pursuer's averments do not disclose that the defenders had anything but a civil claim against him. If goods are sold on the footing that payment is to be made on delivery, and payment is not so made, the creditor is entitled, in his option, either to have the goods restored or to payment of the price; but the failure to pay on delivery in terms of the contract does not justify the creditor in imputing dishonesty to his customer or threatening him with criminal proceedings. Robertson, 1828, 4 Bing., p. 670; Rae v. M'Lay, 1852, 14 D. 988; Mackay v. M'Cankie, 1883, 10 R. 537; and Ramsay v. M'Lay & Co., 1890, 18 R. 130, are authorities more or less in point. Should a case of privilege be disclosed at the trial, the defenders will be sufficiently protected by the judge's direction to the jury. I may add that if, contrary to my opinion, malice must go into the issue, this is not a case where special facts and circumstances inferring malice require to be averred. In Brown v. Fraser, 1906, 8 F. 1000, the Lord Justice-Clerk said: "When the case arises out of the pursuer having been accused or handed over to the police on a criminal charge, I cannot understand how it can be laid down as a general rule that it is necessary in every case that facts independent of the case complained of and its surrounding circumstances should be averred, showing antecedent malice on the part of the defender. It would be very undesirable if that were so, as in cases of handing over to the police the whole matter may arise in a moment, without any previous questions between the parties, and the malice alleged may arise only at the time of the pursuer being accused." I think these observations are equally applicable to a case where a person is threatened with criminal proceedings for which the defender admits there was no warrant, and where the proof of malice depends, not on any private grudge, but on the recklessness of the conduct displayed.

The defenders further urged that as the letter in question was written, not by a director of the limited company who are sued, but only by the manager of their Edinburgh shop, the Company could not be held responsible. That of course depends upon whether the writer acted within the scope of his authority; but here there is a distinct averment that he did so act, and also that he acted for his master's benefit. The case of Ellis, 1905, 7 F. 629, settles that in such circumstances the master will be responsible for his servant's slander, just as he is for any other wrong committed by the servant in the course of his service and for his master's benefit. If it be true, however, as the defenders aver, that Hall, the writer of the letter, was personally responsible to them for the price of goods sold in the shop of which he had charge, the pursuer may have difficulty in proving his case, but that is not a matter of relevancy. I shall therefore repel the first plea in law for the defenders, and approve of the issue as amended.—13*th June* 1907.

Process — Contingency — Motion for Transmission of Sheriff Court Process—Action by Law Agent in Court of Session for Sum Due on Accounting—Action of Accounting in Sheriff Court by Client Against Agent for Larger Sum—Lis Alibi Pendens—Court of Session Act 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sect. 74.

This was an action in the Court of Session by a solicitor against a client for a sum of £394 odds alleged to be due by the client to the agent on a just accounting. An action had previously been raised in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen by the client against the agent, concluding for an accounting, or, failing an accounting, for £1000 as the balance due him.

In the Court of Session action the pursuer moved for transmission of the Sheriff Court process ob contingentiam in terms of sect. 74 of the Court of Session Act 1868, which is in the following terms:—

> In place of advocations of actions and proceedings in inferior Courts ob contingentiam of a process in the Court of Session, it shall be lawful for the party desiring to remove any such action or proceeding to the Court of Session to lay before the Lord Ordinary, or the Division of the Court before which such Court of Session process shall actually be at the time, a copy of the inferior court record, or of such pleadings as may have been lodged, and of the interlocutors in the cause, certified by the clerk of the said inferior court, and to move for the transmission of the inferior court process to the Court of Session, and if, upon consideration thereof, the said Lord Ordinary or Division of the Court shall be of opinion that there is contingency between the two processes, he or they shall grant warrant to the clerk of the inferior court process for the transmission thereof; and upon such transmission being made, the said process shall thenceforth be proceeded with in all respects as if it had been advocated ob contingentiam to the Court of Session according to the present law and practice.

In support of his motion the pursuer argued (first) that transmission should be granted, as the result of the one case would decide in whole or in part the other (Robertson v. Duke of Athole, infra; and (secondly) that the test was whether the two actions would be conjoined or not, if both raised in the Sheriff Court, and clearly these two actions would be. By sect. 74 of the Court of Session Act 1868, transmission was substituted for advocation, and where contingency exists the Court has no choice but to grant warrant for transmission.

The defender opposed the pursuer's motion, and argued (first), assuming contingency to exist, the authorities shew that the Court will not transmit a Sheriff Court process to the Court of Session if the effect of transmission will be to deprive defenders in the Court of Session of the opportunity of stating preliminary pleas in the Court of Session process. Here the action should either be dismissed as incompetent on the plea of lis alibi pendens, or sisted until the determination of the Sheriff Court action (Greig v. Johnston, 1835, 13 S. 635; Lowe's Trs. v. Lowe, 1893, 1 S.L.T. 29; 50 Geo. III. cap. 112, sect. 86; Mackay's Practice, p. 271; Fleming v. Morrison, 1835, 13 S. 859); (secondly), there was no contingency here in the sense of sect. 74. The statute clearly brought out the contrast between a transmission from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session and a transmission from one Lord Ordinary to another (Mackay, p. 268; 48 Geo. III. cap. 151, sect. 9).

The Lord Ordinary granted the pursuer's motion for transmission of the process.

Lord Guthrie.—The summons in this action is dated 4th February 1907. The pursuer asks at this stage of the case for transmission on the ground of contingency of a process in an action raised against him by the defender in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire on 7th August 1906, six months before the raising of the present action. Both actions are between the same parties and they are concerned with the same subject-matter, namely, the state of accounts between the parties. The conclusions are different. In the Aberdeen action the present defender Junor sues the present pursuer Wilson for an account, or for £1000. In this action Wilson sues Junor for £394, 7s. 6d. as the balance due to him on a just accounting.

Junor opposes transmission, and pleads lis alibi pendens. I think his plea is bad, and that transmission must be granted. Wilson alleges in the Sheriff Court action at Junor's instance that, instead of being Junor's debtor, Junor is due him £394. Wilson may shew in the Sheriff Court action that he is not Junor's debtor, but he cannot get decree for any sum due to him. He is, therefore, clearly entitled to have his claim constituted, and to raise his action for that purpose now, either in the Sheriff Court or in the Court of Session. He has chosen to do so in the Court of Session, and this action is no more open to the plea of lis alibi than a Sheriff Court action with the same conclusions would be.

I think I am bound, under the 74th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868, to grant the pursuer's motion for transmission of the Sheriff Court process. The contingency is clear, and the section is imperative. The parties are the same; the subject-matter is the same, and decision in the one case would or might settle part of the dispute in the other case (Duke of Athole v. Robertson, 1869, 8 M. 304, per Moncreiff, L.J.C.; Reid's Trs. v. Reid, 1873, 45 Scot Jurist 191, per Inglis, L.P. In his Lordship's opinion the sentence "connection means no more than contingency" is apparently a misreport for "contingency means more than connection."

Even if I had a discretion, I would not refuse the motion. Accounts have been ordered and lodged in the Sheriff Court action, but the Sheriff-Substitute has not yet applied his mind to the merits of the dispute between the parties. The Sheriff Court action might be decided in favour of Wilson without any such complete investigation into the whole accounts as is necessary to do justice between the parties. For instance, once the Sheriff reached the conclusion that nothing was due to Junor, he would not proceed further in the accounting. If the Sheriff Court process is transmitted probably the actions will be conjoined, and the Aberdeen procedure, with the documents lodged there, will be available in the conjoined actions.—27th June 1907.

HARBOUR—DOCK—CHARGES — LEITH HARBOUR AND DOCKS ACT 1892 (55 AND 56 VICT. CAP. clxxvii), SECT. 58, SCHEDULE (B)—SPECIAL CHARGE IMPOSED BY HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS FOR LOCKING VESSELS IN OR OUT OF DOCKS—HELD THAT VESSELS ENTITLED TO ACCESS TO AND EGRESS FROM DOCKS FREE OF ANY RATE OTHER THAN RATE PAYABLE UNDER SECT. 58 AND SCHEDULE (B) OF ACT OF 1892, AT ALL TIMES WHEN ACCESS AND EGRESS COULD BE GIVEN WITH SAFETY BY MEANS OF LOCKS OR OTHERWISE.

This was an action at the instance of Robert Somerville, shipowner, Dalkeith, and certain other shipowners, against the Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith, incorporated by The Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1875, concluding for, inter alia, declarator that the pursuers, upon payment of the rates made payable by sect. 58 of an Act of Parliament entitled The Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 177), and by Schedule (B) to the said Act, were entitled to have access to and egress from the harbour and docks of Leith given to all ships, vessels, barks, boats, or lighters belonging to them or any of them, free of any rate or charge other than the rates made payable by sect. 58 and Schedule (B) of the said Act, and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety, either by means of the locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and for declarator that the defenders had no right to levy from the pursuers any dues or charges other than the rates made payable as aforesaid for any ships belonging to the pursuers obtaining access to or egress from the said harbour and docks by means of the locks through which the said docks were approached; and for reduction of two Minutes of the defenders, dated 8th September 1905 and 13th July 1906; and for repetition of sums charged illegally against the pursuers over and above the rates specified in the said Act and Schedule (B) thereof.

Somerville and Others v. Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith.

By sect. 33 of The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. cap. 27), which is incorporated with The Leith Harbour and Docks Acts of 1875 and 1892, it is provided that "Upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the Special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods and the embarking and landing of passengers."

By sect. 2 of the said Act of 1847, which is also incorporated with The Leith Harbour and Docks Acts of 1875 and 1892,

"The expression 'the Special Act' shall be construed to mean any Act which shall be hereafter passed authorising the construction or improving of a harbour, dock, or pier, and with which this Act shall be incorporated," and

"The expression 'the harbour, dock, or pier' shall mean the harbour, dock, or pier and the works connected therewith by the Special Act authorised to be constructed;"

By sect. 58 of The Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 177), it is, inter alia, provided that:

"From and after the commencement of this Act, section 74 of the Act of 1875 is hereby repealed, and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, and they are hereby authorised from and after that date to demand, levy, collect, and receive . . . . from the owners of every ship, vessel, bark, boat, or lighter coming into and going out of the harbour and docks or precincts of the port aforesaid, or the agents or managers of such owners, the rates on vessels specified in Schedule (B) to this Act—both subject to and in conformity with the regulations applicable to such Schedules (A) and (B) contained in Schedule (C) to this Act."

Schedule (B), which contains a table of the rates payable on vessels, provides that the rates are to be payable

"per register ton per inward voyage in each year between Whitsunday and Whitsunday."

By sect. 59 of the said Act of 1892 it is provided:

"The Commissioners may from time to time vary the rates by this Act authorised to be levied, or any of them, by reducing or raising the same in such way and manner and to such extent as they deem expedient or necessary, and may reduce or increase the rates on vessels from any place or places specified in Branch I. of Schedule (B) to this Act, without altering the rates on vessels from any other place or places specified in the same group therewith in the said branch of such schedule: Provided always, that no rates shall be increased to more than one-fourth above the amount which would have been leviable in conformity with the schedules of rates annexed to the Act of 1875, and that such rates shall at all times be charged equally to all persons in respect of vessels of the same class or description, arriving from or sailing for the same port or ports, and in respect of the same class or description of goods, and for and in respect of anything whatsoever for which such rates are exigible, and that, before any increase on the rates shall take effect, at least twenty-one days' previous notice thereof shall be given in at least one newspaper published in Edinburgh or Leith."

On or about 8th September 1905 the defenders, by Minute, passed a resolution in the following terms:—

"(1) Locking in and out of vessels should be allowed in the Albert and Imperial Docks; (2) Locking should be limited to two hours after high water; (3) No locking should be allowed when the water on the Imperial Dock sill is less than 21 ft. 6 in.; (4) No vessel should be locked unless arrangements have been timeously made with the dockmaster, according to regulations to be issued by the superintendent; (5) The dock master should have power to decline to lock in or out any vessel without giving reasons; (6) A charge of £2 for each locking should be made against each vessel arranging to be locked in or out; £1 to be returned in the event of a ship arranging to be locked in or out and not taking advantage of the arrangement."

This resolution was subsequently modified by Minute of the defenders dated 13th July 1906, by which the charge for locking vessels in and out of the Imperial and Albert Docks was reduced to £1 per vessel. The defenders did not publish any notice of the imposition of this charge for locking in any newspaper, in terms of sect. 59 of the Act of 1892.

Sect. 76 of The Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 160) enacts that the Commissioners

"shall be entitled to make all reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and plant, machinery, or appliances provided by them for the despatch of business at the harbour and docks, or the convenience of shipmasters, merchants, and others concerned with the traffic thereat, in so far as such charges are not expressly provided for by this Act."

Sect. 60 of The Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 177) enacts that the Commissioners

"shall be entitled to make all reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and use of plant, machinery, and appliances provided by them for the despatch of business at the harbour and docks, or the convenience of shipmasters, merchants, and others concerned with the traffic thereat, in so far as such charges are not expressly provided for by this Act."

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor: "Finds and declares in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, viz. that the pursuers, upon payment of the rates made payable by sect. 58 of an Act of Parliament entitled The Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1892, and by Schedule (B) to the said Act, are entitled to have access to and egress from the harbour and docks of Leith given to all ships, vessels, barks, boats, or lighters belonging to them or any of them, free of any rate or charge other than the rates made payable by sect. 58 and Schedule (B) of the said Act, and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety either by means of the locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and when accommodation is available; further, decerns and ordains the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the various sums set forth in the petitory conclusion of the summons; finds it unnecessary to dispose of the remaining conclusions of the summons."

Lord Dundas.—The pursuers are owners of a fleet of steamships trading regularly between Leith and ports in England and on the Continent. The defenders are the Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith, incorporated by the Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 160). The main (if not the only) question is whether or not the pursuers, upon payment of the rates made payable by sect. 58 of the Leith Harbour and Docks Act 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 177) and Schedule (B) to said Act, are entitled to have access to and egress from the harbour and docks of Leith given to their ships and other craft, free of any other rate or charge, "and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety, either by means of the locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and when accommodation is available." This question is one of importance to the parties, but I have not found it to be attended with serious doubt or difficulty. It relates, as explained in the condescendence, really to the three docks known as the Albert, the Edinburgh, and the Imperial respectively, which are, like most modern docks, approached through locks. These three docks are the largest in Leith harbour, and are suitable for, and used by, the pursuers' vessels. It may be convenient at the outset to explain the general nature and character of the various docks at Leith, all of which are shown on the small hand-map with which I was furnished at the discussion. The old docks (East and West) were opened about 1806. They were constructed under the authority of an old Act, and were, as the map indicates, approached by a lock; but I am informed that as matter of fact this lock has not been used for a long period—more than forty years. The Victoria Dock was constructed about 1852, without the authority of any special Act of Parliament. It has a gate, but no lock. The Albert Dock was opened in 1869, without the authority of any special Act. It is approached by a lock, and is now connected by waterway with the Imperial and also with the Edinburgh Docks. The Edinburgh Dock was opened in 1881, and was among the works authorised by the said Act of 1875. It lies to the east of, and is approached from, the Albert Dock, through an open passage opened by a swing bridge. The Imperial Dock was authorised by the said Act of 1892, and was opened in 1902. Its entrance lock is mentioned in sect. 22 (2) and (3) of the Act.

The question now in dispute was sharply raised when the defenders passed, on 8th September 1905, a resolution, varied later by a resolution dated 13th July 1906, both of which are quoted in Art. 5 of the Condescendence, by which the defenders, for the first time, imposed a pecuniary charge for the locking in or out of vessels going to or from the three docks with which this case is concerned.

The substantive case stated for the pursuers is based upon the following statutory enactments. By sect. 33 of "The Harbour, Docks and Piers Clauses Act 1847" (10 Vict. cap. 27), it is provided that "upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the embarking and landing of passengers." By sect. 2 of the same Act, "the expression the harbour, dock or pier shall mean the harbour, dock or pier and the works connected therewith by the Special Act authorised to be constructed"; and sect. 4 provides that "the word 'rate' shall mean any rate or duty or other payment in the nature thereof payable under the special Act." Sect. 4 of the Special Act of 1875 (repeated by sect. 4 of the Special Act of 1892) enacts that "the expression 'harbour and docks' means and includes the port and harbour of Leith, and the harbours, docks, quays, piers, and whole other works and property included in the undertaking defined and vested in the Commissioners by this Act, and all future additions thereto and extensions thereof." Sect. 58 of the said Act of 1892 authorises the Commissioners to levy and collect, inter alia, "from the owners of every ship, vessel, bark, boat, or lighter, coming into or going out of the harbour and docks or precincts of the port aforesaid, or the agents or managers of such owners, the rates on vessels specified in Schedule (B) to this Act. . . ."

Upon a construction of these sections, the pursuers argue that their vessels are entitled, upon payment of the rates prescribed by sect. 58 and Schedule (B) of the special Act of 1892, to free access to or egress from the whole harbour, docks, and piers of Leith, including those parts of the same which are accessible only by locks, at all times when such access or egress can be accomplished with safety, and when accommodation is available. As to these last conditions, they concede that the discretion must lie with the defenders' harbourmaster, so long as he exercises it fairly and in bona fide. I should here explain that the parties agreed in stating that for two or three hours before high water at each tide the gates of the locks lie open, and that for some hours thereafter (as to the number of these the parties were not in agreement) the operation of locking a vessel in or out can be carried on with perfect safety; but the defenders say that if the pursuers' contention is given effect to they "will be obliged to keep a large staff of experienced men on duty day and night for the purpose of working the lock gates, and will thus be involved in heavy additional expense." The matter is thus one of expenditure pure and simple. I am of opinion that the pursuers' argument is well founded. I think that the statutory provisions to which I have referred give shipowners and others an absolute right, upon payment of the rates prescribed, to demand access to or egress from all parts of the harbour or docks to or from which such access or egress can be afforded with safety and due regard to accommodation. A contrary hypothesis might, I think, result in anomalies. In the case, for example, of a harbour to which access can only be obtained by the opening of gates, it would seem that vessels could not demand right to enter the harbour at all, except upon payment of some extra charge over and above the rate. But the defenders argued, in the first place, that the pursuers' construction of the Acts would violate the obligation which is admittedly incumbent upon harbour commissioners to treat all classes of shipping upon equal terms. They explained (and it was not disputed) that many vessels—even of the larger classes—coming to Leith do not, in fact, go into docks at all, but take up their berths in the areas coloured brown on the hand-map; that others are in use to resort to the Victoria Dock, or to the old docks; that others, again, are content to obtain entrance to or exit from the three docks in question at the times, above referred to, when the lock gates are lying open; and that some of the vessels which frequent the port of Leith are, owing to their great length, unable to enter these docks at all.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Somerville and Others v. Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith.

The defenders put their case so high as to say that they would not be legally entitled, looking to their duty of equal treatment, to afford to the pursuers' ships the privilege of entry to and exit from the docks in question, at times when it was necessary for that purpose to work the lock-gates, without some special charge being made over and above the prescribed "rates." In my judgment, this argument is fallacious. It is, no doubt, true that at all ports there are different classes of shipping, with different habits, capacities, and requirements. But if the pursuers' view of this matter is right, as I think it is, all vessels (including those belonging to them) which desired, and were physically able, to enter these docks would require to be equally dealt with; and it is, I think, nothing to the purpose to say that there are other ships at Leith which either can not, or do not, desire to enter the docks at all times when it would be possible to do so with safety, and having regard to accommodation. Then the defenders relied strongly upon sect. 76 of the Act of 1875, which is practically repeated by sect. 60 of the Act of 1892. Those sections authorise the defenders to "make all reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and use of plant, machinery, or appliances provided by them . . . . in so far as such charges are not expressly provided for by this Act." But if the pursuers' view as to the policy of the Acts and the construction of the sections previously dealt with is correct, as I think it is, getting in or out of these docks at all times when the gates can with safety and propriety be opened does not appear to me to be a matter of "work done," or "services rendered," or "facilities afforded," or "use of plant, machinery, or appliances provided." It is matter of right, upon payment of the "rates." These sections seem to me to have reference, not to anything done in the exercise of that right, but to special facilities which may be asked and received after the vessel has obtained due access to the harbour and docks. This view is, in my judgment, confirmed by the total absence in the Acts (with the exception of sect. 22 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1892) of any reference to locks and of any express right on the Commissioners' part to charge for locking vessels in or out. Such operations must, I think, be regarded as mere incidents in that free access to the harbour and docks which is to be had by vessels upon payment of the rates. The defenders also referred to sects. 51 and 52 of the General Act of 1847. But I can find nothing there to authorise the Commissioners or their harbourmaster to impose an extra charge for locking operations, as they bear to do by their "resolutions," quoted upon the record. The defenders have power to pass bye-laws for various purposes, and under certain conditions—sect. 83 of the General Act of 1847, and sect. 71 of the Special Act of 1875—but, for obvious reasons, they shrank from saying that the desired result could be achieved in that manner; and I do not think that it could.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the pursuers' argument is substantially right, and that they are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of their first crave of the summons. Their counsel stated that if I should be of that view they would not press for the further declarator sought, nor for the conclusions for interdict and for reduction. The defenders' counsel, on the other hand, conceded that, if the first declaratory conclusion were to be granted, they did not oppose decree going forth in terms of the petitory conclusion.—21*st June* 1907.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 678.)

The circumstances of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note and the prior report.

After a proof had been taken the Lord Ordinary dismissed the note, holding (1) that the pursuers were partners, and were entitled to sue; (2) that they had not established an exclusive right to the name "Irish Linen Company"; (3) that they had not proved that the respondent had passed off, or attempted to pass off, his goods as theirs; and (4) that a representation by the complainers that they were manufacturers of the goods sold by them, whereas they were only retailers thereof, would not have barred them from obtaining the remedy sought, if they could have established any right to it.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is an application for interdict at the instance of five brothers of the name of Plotzker, who are described as carrying on business under the style of Irish Linen Company, against Hessel Lucas, who is described as carrying on business at 23 Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, under the name Irish Linen Company. The prayer is to prohibit the respondent (1) from carrying on business under the style or title of "Irish Linen Company"; and (2) from passing off or attempting to pass off his goods as and for the goods of the complainers.

The first plea for the respondent is that the instance in the note is defective. This plea was repelled as reported in Plotzker v. Lucas (S.C. 1907, 315; 14 S.L.T. 678). The judgment then pronounced was to the effect that what the complainers require to prove first of all is that the persons designated in the instance are carrying on business in common with a view to profit, and that that business is carried on under the style and title of Irish Linen Company; that is to say the complainers must prove that they are suing in respect of a partnership right.

The complainers are Marcus Plotzker, living in London, William Plotzker, living in Manchester; Herman Plotzker, living in Southport, David Plotzker, living in Sheffield, and Bernard Plotzker, living in Glasgow.

The first time when the style Irish Linen Company appears to have been used by the complainers was in March 1902, when a shop was opened in Birmingham by Marcus, his partner in this venture being his brother William. Previous to that, William had been carrying on a drapery business at 10 Acomb Street, Manchester, under the name of W. Williams & Co. The name Irish Linen Company did not appear upon these premises, although, after the business of the Irish Linen Company was developed, Acomb Street was treated as the head office down to November 1906, when the head office was removed to Fleet Street, London. The business increased rapidly. William Plotzker was undoubtedly the master mind in the undertaking, and I have no doubt that it was mainly to his energy and ability that the growth of the business was due. He gives in his evidence a list of eighteen shops which have been opened since 1902. Seven of these are in London. There are also shops at Birmingham, Bradford, Manchester, Leeds, Leicester, Sheffield, Nottingham, Cardiff, Southport, and two in Glasgow. The rents paid range from £150 to £1079 per annum.

The case for the complainers is that William and Marcus assumed as partners the other brothers, as and when the shops were opened, and that since the action was commenced a sixth brother (Lessor) has also been made a partner. There is no written contract of co-partnery. William Plotzker states, and his evidence is corroborated by Marcus, Herman, and Bernard, who were examined as witnesses, that the brothers are in partnership, that the management of the shops is distributed among the brothers, and that they are all entitled to share in the profits according to the turnover in the respective shops for which they are responsible. The goods which they sell are mainly shirts and collars which come from Ireland and are sent direct to the branches. In the case of large orders to premises newly opened it is usual for the Irish manufacturer to write to the head office for confirmation before forwarding the goods. A certain stock of goods was kept at Acomb Street, and is kept at Fleet Street, from which a branch may be supplied if necessary. The appearance of the shops is more or less uniform, green being the prevailing colour of the sign-boards, except in the case of Union Street, Glasgow, which, on account of a restriction by the landlords, is brown. Each shop has a sign-board which bears "Irish Linen Company." In some cases there is added "Factories, Belfast and Londonderry," and this is the case with regard to the shop in Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow. The windows are dressed to a uniform pattern, and the goods exhibited have attached to them tickets with a green edge and white centre. Stationery of a uniform pattern with green heading and "Irish Linen Company" is issued from the head office to the branches. A small book is circulated which bears on the front page the name "Irish Linen Company," a statement that they are manufacturers of shirts, collars, etc., the name of the branch, and the statement that they have factories at Belfast and Londonderry. Advertisements containing these particulars are inserted in newspapers, apparently not in daily papers (at least none such have been produced), but in magazines such as "The Strand" and weekly papers such as "Country Life." The cost of advertising is borne by the branches proportionately. The complainers have a registered trade mark which bears "Irish Linen Company, Manufacturers. Trade mark. None genuine without this trade mark," and it is in evidence that the goods which they sell are stamped with this trade mark. It does not appear when this trade mark was registered. A system of exchange prevails among the branches, by which a customer who has bought goods at one of the shops may get them exchanged at another. The business appears to have been very successful. It is said the company have an annual turnover of £140,000. Mr Leinster, the Londonderry manufacturer, states that their payments to him come to about £15,000 a year. Mr Sheills, another Londonderry manufacturer, states that they pay him about £16,000 or £17,000 a year. There have apparently been as yet no losses on any of the branches. The profits upon the branches were remitted first to the head office at Acomb Street, Manchester, and latterly to the head office in Fleet Street, London, and have been applied in opening new branches and extending the business. A book is kept for each branch in the branch itself, which shows the business done there, and a duplicate is kept in the head office. Stationery and circulars are issued from the head office to the branches.

The respondent says that these facts are insufficient to instruct partnership. The criticism that he makes is that no balance sheet has been produced, and that none has ever been prepared; that there is no statement of the amount of capital contributed by each partner; that none of the books kept at the head office have been produced, and that the state of the bank account there has not been disclosed; that the shop at 10 Acomb Street, Manchester, bears the name of W. Williams & Co., not "Irish Linen Company"; that at the various branches the leases have been granted to the respective brothers as individuals; and that the branch bank accounts are also kept in their names and not in the name of the firm. The complainers explain that the pressure of work in extending their business has been such that it is only now that accountants have been set to work to make up a balance sheet. There is no doubt that the complainers were regarded by such persons as Leinster and Shiells, as well as by Griffiths, their salesman, as carrying on business in partnership. The alternatives would be that William was the sole owner, the other brothers working as his servants; or that each brother had his own shop or shops; or that there was a combination to use the name "Irish Linen Company," each brother being solely liable for the debts of the branch for which he was responsible. I see no reason to doubt the evidence given by the Plotzkers. I think the probable inference from the facts proved is that they were in partnership, and I think sufficient facts have been proved to warrant this inference. I am accordingly of opinion that they have proved sufficient to entitle them to insist in the present application for interdict.

The next question is whether they were entitled to prevent the respondent from carrying on business under the style or title of "Irish Linen Company." This means that they have the sole and exclusive right to use this trade name. No question of trade mark has been raised in the case. Now the name "Irish Linen Company" is one which primarily is just descriptive of a company which sells Irish linen. Accordingly the complainers must establish that their name has acquired in the market a secondary sense; that is to say, that goods sold under that name no longer mean simply goods sold by a company dealing in Irish linen, but mean and are understood to mean goods sold solely by the complainers; and that the mere use by the respondent of that name is per se deceptive. The first difficulty in the way of the complainers is that they do not appear to have been the first inventors of the name. The evidence is, I think, clear that the name was in use at Hove, the Isle of Man, and Belfast, before the complainers adopted it. The evidence is not so clear in regard to its use at Torquay, but it seems to have been used at Harrogate. It also appears to have been used at Scarborough so far back as the year 1892. In the Isle of Man it was first used in 1894. It was suggested on behalf of the complainers that the Mohuns' business was household linen and not shirts and collars. I do not think this is of much importance when the question is one of exclusive right to the name. On this branch of the case the complainers carried their argument so far as to say that they would be entitled to stop the use of the name Irish Linen Company, not only in every town in England, but also every town in Scotland and, crossing to Ireland, to prohibit it even in Dublin. Taking the case of Scotland, which is what we are immediately concerned with, the evidence shews that down to June 1905 the complainers had no shop in Scotland at all. They then opened the Sauchiehall Street shop in Glasgow. The respondent opened his shop in Nicolson Street, Edinburgh, on 31st August 1906. I think it is impossible, on the evidence, to hold that the complainers have captured the Scotch market so as to entitle them to a monopoly of the name Irish Linen Company, and I am accordingly of opinion that they are not entitled to interdict in terms of the first branch of the prayer of the note.

The question then arises whether the complainers have succeeded in proving that the respondent has passed off or attempted to pass off his goods as theirs. The principle to be applied to this part of the case is laid down in Reddaway v. Banham (1896, A.C. 199), by Lord Herschell at p. 209 thus:—"The principle which is applicable to this class of cases was, in my judgment, well laid down by Lord Kingsdown in Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. (1865, 11 Clark H.L. 523 at p. 538). It had been previously enunciated in much the same way by Lord Langdale in the case of Croft v. Day (1845, 7 Beav. 84). Lord Kingsdown's words were as follows:—'The fundamental rule is, that one man has no right to put off his goods for sale as the goods of a rival trader, and he cannot, therefore (in the language of Lord Langdale, in the case of Perry v. Truefit, 1842, 6 Beav. 66), be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person.'" It is not necessary in order to get interdict to prove a fraudulent intention on the part of the respondent (Cellular Clothing Co. v. Maxton & Murray, 1899, 1 F. (H.L.) 29, per L.C. Halsbury at p. 31).

In the present case what the complainers allege is that not only does the respondent use the same name as they do, but that his window dressing and window tickets so resemble theirs that they are calculated to mislead, and have misled, customers into thinking that the shop at Nicolson Street is a branch of their business. The peculiarity of the present case which makes it unlike any of those cited at the hearing is that we are here dealing with retailers, not manufacturers. What the complainers are trying to do is to prevent the respondent retailing goods irrespective of any question as to their manufacture. No doubt the complainers do represent in their advertisements and circulars that they are manufacturers, but the case made for them was not that the respondent was passing off goods as manufactured by the complainers which were in truth manufactured by some one else. Their case is that the respondent, as a retailer, was adopting means which would have the effect of diverting their customers. As regards the complainers' claim to be manufacturers, it appears that William Plotzker had in the year 1902 a factory at Londonderry, the rent of which was £1, 17s. 6d. He admits that he could not give it personal supervision, and had to give it up. It is maintained, however, that although the goods they sell are made by such manufacturers as Leinster and Sheills, there is on the part of William Plotzker a certain selection of raw material and designing of shapes. It is in evidence that certain machinery at Leinster's manufactory is set apart for complainers' business, and that they have a special stock room there. Special plant is also reserved for them in James Sheills' manufactory in Londonderry. In reality, however, both the complainers and the respondent are selling goods which are made by third parties. The respondent gets goods which he sells from John A. Sheills in Belfast. The complainers get goods which they sell from James Sheills in Londonderry. The case is, therefore, not one in which any representation is made in regard to a manufactured article. The complainers' case is that the respondent has used means in exposing his goods for sale which induce customers to believe his shop is a branch of theirs.

It is not clear what prompted the respondent to go into the shirt and collar trade. He seems to have been a commercial traveller in furniture, jewellery, etc., before 1902, when he went to South Africa for about three years. His brother, Harris Lucas, who is a horse-dealer, seems to have been acting along with him in the establishment of the Nicolson Street shop, although he says he had no general authority to act for him. The shop was taken in the month of May 1906. The first thing that was done was to employ the witness Grant, who is a shopfitter in Edinburgh. According to his evidence—and he seemed a reliable witness—it was he who suggested that the signboard should bear the name "Irish Linen Company." The evidence of the respondent is that at this time he had never heard of the Plotzkers in connection with this or any other business. A suggestion was made by some of the complainers' witnesses that the respondent knew of the Irish Linen Company, because the Plotzkers and the Lucases were connected by marriage. The respondent, on the other hand, says that it was on the occasion of a visit to the Isle of Man that he got the idea of the name Irish Linen Company. Against this is the fact that there is no mention of Isle of Man on record, although there is mention of an Irish Linen Company at Harrogate. The evidence of Leinster rather confirms the idea that Harris Lucas at least knew something of the complainers' business. The next step was that Harris Lucas went to Ireland early in July 1906 to interview Leinster. He says that he got his name out of a directory. Nothing passed between them on the occasion of this meeting in regard to the Plotzkers. It was on the occasion of a second visit that Harris Lucas paid to Ireland, about the 23rd of July, that Leinster says Harris Lucas mentioned that he was thinking of trading as the Irish Linen Company, when he (Leinster) warned him against doing so, on account of the complainers' business with that name. By this time the signboard had been put on the respondent's shop. The respondent was told by Harris of his conversation with Leinster, but considered that he was within his rights in using the name Irish Linen Company. The respondent then gave an order to the witness Wood, a ticket writer in Edinburgh, to prepare tickets for his shop. The designs of the tickets were left to Wood, who used for them dies which he had had for more than twenty years. They are lighter in colour than the complainers', and I do not think can be said to be an imitation. The window dressing was left to Chamberlain, who carried it out according to his own ideas without any suggestion from Harris or Hessel Lucas. The shop was opened on 31st August.

One difficulty about this part of the case is in connection with Harris Lucas, whom I did not consider a satisfactory witness. I think it is proved by the evidence of Griffiths and M'Call that he visited the complainers' shop in Sauchiehall Street—they say about the month of August—and took stock of its contents. I also think it proved by the evidence of Peters, a ticket writer in Glasgow, that Harris Lucas instructed him to copy the tickets in the Sauchiehall Street shop. Whether this visit to Peters was before or after the visit to the Outer House. Lord Mackenzie. — Plotzker and Others v. Lucas.

Sauchiehall Street shop spoken to by Griffiths and M'Call is not clear. The commission given by Harris Lucas to Peters came to nothing, and the tickets were in point of fact supplied by Wood. Whatever the motive was that induced Harris Lucas to act as he did in Glasgow, I do not think the respondent is necessarily affected by what he did, and I think it is proved that Grant, Wood, and Chamberlain did their work on Hessel's instructions, without any intentions of copying the complainers' Sauchiehall Street shop. I think that the result of the evidence is to show that, from whatever cause, the respondent came to believe that there would be a demand for Irish linen shirts and collars in Edinburgh. Even if he believed that custom could be attracted by a shop of the particular design which had attracted custom in Glasgow, I do not think he would be doing anything illegitimate in employing the same means, provided it was only to attract custom and not to divert customers from the complainers. I think the evidence as to the existence of customers of the complainers in Edinburgh is inconclusive. In the first place, Bernard Plotzker, who is in charge of the Sauchiehall Street shop and the shop in Union Street, Glasgow, subsequently opened, cannot name a single Edinburgh customer. The complainers' agent who examined the list of customers in the Fleet Street books states that he made up a list which contained thirty Edinburgh customers. This list was, however, not produced, and there has been no opportunity of finding out who these customers are. Griffiths, the salesman in Sauchiehall Street, says there are a number of customers in Edinburgh. Here, again, there is a total absence of names, and no information is given as to the dates on which they were supplied. Two witnesses were adduced who were said to have been actually misled, the first an Indian of the name of Khory. He, however, only came to know of the Irish Linen Company in Sauchiehall Street in September 1906. This was after the respondent's shop was opened, and he only saw No. 75 of process, which is the respondent's advertisement, in a theatre programme, on which the complainers founded a strong argument, in October 1906. The other witness, Greenhorn, states that he has got goods from the complainers for two years. This was from Acomb Street, Manchester, a shop which, according to the evidence, never had "Irish Linen Company" on it, but only bore the name William Williams & Company. It does not appear that the complainers advertised in any distinctively Edinburgh or indeed in any distinctively Scotch newspaper. I am inclined to take the view of the respondent's business which is put by his shopman. He says that it is a retail business which depends on customers passing the shop and being attracted by the goods, and going in and buying, and that the business stands on its own legs and depends on its own attractions. As Lord Macnaghten puts it in the case of Montgomery v. Thomson (1891, A.C. 217 at p. 223), the question is whether the respondent went to Nicolson Street simply with the object of stealing the complainers' trade, and in the hope of reaping where he had not sown. I am unable to take this view of the respondent's conduct, and therefore think the complainers have failed to make out a case of passing off.

There only remains the point which is stated in the 13th plea in law for the respondent. [Plea 13:—"In respect that the complainers have made false statements to the public to induce trade, as condescended on, they are barred from insisting in the present proceedings."] The argument in support of it is founded on such cases as Newman v. Pinto (1887, 4 R. P.C. 508), and Bile Beans Manufacturing Co. v. Davidson (1906, 8 F. 1181). I do not think these cases have any bearing on the present. There is no suggestion that the shirts and collars supplied by the complainers did not come from Ireland; and whatever view may be taken of the accuracy of their representation that they are manufacturers, there is nothing to bring the case nearly up to what is required in the authorities referred to. If the complainers had been able to make out a case for interdict I should not have held that they were barred from getting it by any representations they made.

For the reasons above mentioned I am of opinion that they have failed to make out their case, and that accordingly the note should be refused, with expenses.—22*nd June* 1907.

83. Elliott v. Charles W. Cassils & Company and Others.

Partnership — Dissolved Partnership—Differences Between Partners—Accounting — Action of Accounting Pending in Sheriff Court — Petition for Judicial Factor—Appointment Refused — Partnership Act 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 39), sect. 39.

This was a petition by John Wilson Elliott, merchant, Glasgow, presented under sect. 39 of the Partnership Act 1890, and also at common law, for sequestration of the partnership or joint adventure between him and Charles W. Cassils & Co., calico printers, Glasgow, and Charles Cassils and Charles William Cassils, the individual partners of said firm, with a view to profit in soft goods and general merchandise, and the appointment of a judicial factor to wind up the co-partnery.

Sect. 39 of the Partnership Act 1890 is in these terms:—

On the dissolution of a partnership every partner is entitled, as against the other partners in the firm, and all persons claiming through them in respect of their interests as partners, to have the property of the partnership applied in payment of the debts and liabilities of the firm, and to have the surplus assets after such payment applied in payment of what may be due to the partners respectively after deducting what may be due from them as partners to the firm; and for that purpose any partner or his representatives may, on the termination of the partnership, apply to the Court to wind up the business and affairs of the firm.

The petitioner made, inter alia, the following averments:—

The terms of the co-partnery were arranged between the petitioner and the said Charles Cassils. It was agreed that the co-partnery should be terminable at will, that each of the partners should be interested in the profits and losses to the extent of one-half, and that the profits should be divided between the partners as and when available. No capital was contributed by either party, and none was required for the purpose of the business.

The business of the co-partnery, which was successful, was by mutual arrangement transacted in the name of the said Charles W. Cassils & Co., who had control of the financial arrangements, and acted as cashiers for the concern. They from time to time received the sums due to, and made payment of the sums due by, the co-partnery.

The parties carried on the co-partnery under the arrangement mentioned until 20th February 1907, when the same was terminated by notice given by the petitioner to the said Charles W. Cassils & Co., which was thereafter duly confirmed and accepted by them. The petitioner from time to time received sums against his share of profits, but throughout the currency of the co-partnery a large sum stood and presently stands at his credit. On the co-partnery being terminated as aforesaid, the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. prepared a trial balance-sheet as at 20th February 1907, and submitted same to the petitioner. The said balance-sheet shews that at that date the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. held a sum of cash amounting to over £2500 belonging to the co-partnery, against which there were certain liabilities outstanding, but the same are small in number and amount, and are more than met by outstanding book-debts and other claims due to the concern.

During the currency of the co-partnery the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the said individual partners thereof, wrongfully and in breach of their duty, failed to keep the cash balances arising on the co-partnery trading separate from their own monies, but immixed the same with and used and applied them for their own purposes, and in particular in furthering their own separate business of calico printers. In particular, on or about 19th July 1905, part of the co-partnery funds, amounting to £1200 or thereby, was, without the authority and consent of the petitioner, applied by them in the purchase, or in part payment of the purchase price, of certain copper rollers. Said rollers are presently being used by them for their own behoof in their calico printing business, and are alleged by them to be their exclusive property. From the use thereof large profits have accrued to them, but they decline to recognise their liability to account therefor to the petitioner. It is believed and averred that at or about the time in question practically the whole balance at the credit of the co-partnery had been applied by the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the said individual partners thereof to their own uses, and were at risk in their separate business. The business of the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. has latterly been in an unsatisfactory state, owing to losses sustained and to excessive drawings on the part of the said Charles Cassils.

The trial balance-sheet, dated 1st April 1907, before mentioned, purports to bring out a sum of £478, 1s. 6d. as the divisible assets of the concern. Said balance-sheet is in many respects inaccurate; the liabilities therein stated, amounting to over £400, are either not due by the co-partnery, or in whole or in part cancelled by admitted credit entries. Further, the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the individual partners thereof wrongfully claim to retain a sum of £150 per annum during the last two years of the co-partnery in respect of alleged services rendered. In said balance-sheet no stock has been taken into account, and no provision made for interest on cash balances or for outstanding debts, some of which, it is believed and averred, have been collected by the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. without advising the petitioner or crediting him therewith.

The petitioner has invited the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the said individual partners thereof to concur with him in appointing a neutral person to wind up the affairs of the co-partnery, but they decline to do so. The petitioner has also demanded access to the bank pass-books in order to investigate the application by them of the co-partnery funds. This also has been refused. The cash balance at credit of the co-partnery, amounting to over £2000, and the whole stock-in-trade, are presently in the hands or under the control of the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the said individual partners thereof. Looking to the questions which have arisen between the parties, and more particularly the questions as to the liability of the said Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the said individual partners thereof to the co-partnery in respect of their unauthorised user of the co-partnery funds, their purchase of the said rollers, and their liability to deliver the same and to account for the profits accruing from their use of said rollers, it is expedient and necessary, in order to secure the petitioner's interest, that the affairs of the co-partnery should be sequestrated and a judicial factor appointed to wind up the co-partnery.

Answers were lodged for Charles W. Cassils & Co. and the said Charles Cassils and Charles William Cassils, in which, inter alia, the following averments were made:—

The respondents were approached by the petitioner in May 1902, in consequence of the failure of a business in Belfast, with which he had been connected, and with a view to assisting him they entered into the joint-adventure referred to. The respondents have an office and staff, and conduct a large business in Glasgow as calico printers and merchants. The petitioner has no business premises, and resides in lodgings in Glasgow. It was arranged between the parties that a sum of £150 should be charged annually against the joint-adventure in respect of the use of the respondents' name, business premises, and staff, and this sum was duly debited against the joint-adventure from time to time. A special set of books was kept by the respondents for the joint-adventure, and all funds were passed through their general bank account with the petitioner's full knowledge and consent and in accordance with the arrangement between the parties. The petitioner had daily access to the cash book, and was fully conversant with all the cash transactions of the joint-adventure, and he never on any occasion took objection to the manner in which the accounts and cash were dealt with. During the subsistence of the joint-adventure the petitioner was by arrangement allowed to draw £20 per month in anticipation of profits, but in point of fact he drew sums considerably in excess of this amount, which were duly debited against him. There was no fixed period for the division of profits, and although trial balances were made out from time to time, no concluded balance-sheet was ever adjusted nor any final settlement of accounts demanded by the petitioner until his withdrawal from the joint-adventure. The petitioner in May 1906 was requested by the respondents to furnish a statement of the stock which he had in hand belonging to the joint-adventure, but declined to do so, and on the respondents investigating matters for themselves, they found that the petitioner had in his previous statements misrepresented to them the stocks held by him on which the trial balances had been framed, and that greatly exaggerated profits had in consequence been shown. The petitioner, in consequence of these discoveries by the respondents, intimated his withdrawal from the joint-adventure.

On receiving the petitioner's said letter of withdrawal, the respondents informed him that they would proceed to realise the remaining assets of the joint-adventure, and bring the same to a close with all possible speed in accordance with the subsisting arrangements between the parties. The petitioner, however, brought an action against the respondents in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, concluding for payment of £826, 8s. 11d., and for warrant to sell various goods which he alleged to form part of the stock in trade of the joint-adventure. The petitioner's claims in the said action are greatly exaggerated and in large part unfounded, and the result of the proceedings thus taken by him has been to prevent the respondents winding up the affairs of the joint-adventure, and duly accounting to the petitioner for his share therein.

The respondents, on receiving the petitioner's notice of withdrawal, proceeded to frame a trial balance-sheet in order to ascertain approximately how the affairs of the joint-adventure stood. A copy of the said trial balance-sheet is produced herewith, bringing out a sum of £478, 1s. 6d. at the credit of the same. As against this balance there will be required a sum of £430 in order to pay for work done in connection with pending contracts, and what remains is liable to be absorbed in paying claims in respect of goods sold by the joint-adventure. There is, further, an unascertained liability against the joint-adventure in respect of the expenses of an action presently depending in the Court of Session, nominally at the instance of the respondents' firm, but in reality for behoof of the joint-adventure, against Ernest Absalon, merchant, Brussels. An order for proof has been pronounced in this action, and until the final determination of the case there is in this connection a large contingent liability for expenses, of which the petitioner is liable in his proportion. The petitioner has, moreover, collected certain sums and holds certain accounts in his own name which belong to the joint-adventure, but, although called upon to do so, he declines to furnish an account thereof.

The Petitioner argued that he had made out a case for the appointment of a factor in respect (first), that the respondents, in whom he had lost confidence, admittedly had monies of his in their hands; and (secondly), that his want of confidence was justified by his demand to see the books being refused and the respondents' declinature to appoint a neutral person to wind up the concern. No reasonable offer had been made by the respondents as in the case of Gow, infra, and an action in which the petitioner's and respondents' interests were divergent was pending in the Sheriff Court (Lindley on Partnership, 5th edition, p. 547; II. Bell's Comm. p. 524; Pirie, 1892, L.R. 1 Ch. 633).

The Respondents argued that the petition should be refused, as the questions between the parties were merely questions of accounting, and these questions could all be fought out in the Sheriff Court action (Gow v. Schulze, infra; Collins, 1852, 14 D. 540, and 1853, 1 Macq. 385).

The Lord Ordinary refused the prayer of the petition.

Lord Guthrie.—The partnership or joint-adventure in soft goods, in which the petitioner and the respondents were equally interested, was entered into on 17th May 1902. It was terminable at will, and the petitioner dissolved it by notice given on 20th February 1907. It is now being wound up by the petitioner and the respondents, and, on account of differences which have arisen between the parties in winding up the concern, the petitioner asks the appointment of a judicial factor to take over and complete the winding up.

The case of Gow v. Schulze, 1877, 4 R. 928, shows on the one hand that if, from disputes between the partners of a dissolved firm, the assets of the firm cannot be realised to advantage and the debts duly paid, a judicial factor will be appointed. In this case there are disputes between the partners of a dissolved firm, but not in regard to collecting debts or paying creditors. In the Sheriff Court action referred to in the Answers, the petitioner states: "The outstanding liabilities of the said partnership or joint-adventure are small in number and amount, and are more than balanced by outstanding book debts and claims due to the concern."

But Gow v. Schulze also shews that the existence of questions of accounting between the partners of a dissolved firm forms no sufficient ground for the appointment of a judicial factor, because such questions cannot be dealt with by a judicial factor, but must form the subject of an action or actions between the parties. In this case the questions between the petitioner and the respondents resolve themselves into questions of accounting, including (a) a question as to the use of partnership funds in connection with the respondents' separate business as calico printers; (b) the respondents' right to credit themselves with £150 a year during the last two years of the partnership in respect of alleged services rendered; (c) a question whether the petitioner did not draw more than he was entitled to draw; and (d) whether the respondents have credited the partnership with all the sums collected by them from the firm's debtors. These questions and others are all involved in an action at present pending in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, raised by the petitioner against the respondents.

I may add that the petitioner's averments as to the financial position of the respondents are too vague to be considered.

I therefore refuse the petition, with expenses.—27th June 1907.

84. Macdougall v. Bremner.

Contract—Validity—Pactum Illicitum—Agreement Between A, a Building Superintendent, and B, a Measurer Employed by A to Measure Certain Buildings for A's Principal, That B Should Pay Commission to A on Measuring Job—Circumstances in Which Court Refused to Enforce Contract Although No Plea Against Its Validity Was Stated on Record.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

In this action William Brown Macdougall, the son and assignee of Robert Macdougall, sought to recover from John Bremner, a measurer, the sum of £68, 4s. 3d. alleged to be due as commission on a measuring job stipulated for in a verbal agreement entered into between the defender and the said Robert Macdougall, the pursuer's author.

The pursuer's averments were to the following effect:—

Cond. 1. During the years 1902 to 1906 Mr John Cyril Macdougall, 44 Granby Terrace, Hillhead, Glasgow, was in course of erecting four tenements of dwelling-houses at the corner of Albany Street and Kelburn Street North, Kelvinside, Glasgow. Robert Macdougall, residing at 44 Granby Terrace aforesaid, the father of the said John Cyril Macdougall, had full charge and control of the building operations on behalf of his said son.

Cond. 2. During or about the month of May 1902 the said Robert Macdougall, in pursuit of his conduct of the said building operations, agreed to employ and did employ the defender, John Bremner, as measurer for the said job. It was a condition of the employment of the said John Bremner by the said Robert Macdougall, expressly agreed to by the former when the latter agreed to employ him as aforesaid (the bargain both as to the employment and as to the after-mentioned commission being made verbally between the defender and the said Robert Macdougall), that the former should pay to the latter in respect of such employment a commission of three-quarters per cent. upon the total amount of the contracts of the various tradesmen as the same should be ascertained by the measurement of the said John Bremner. The said total amount of these contracts is £9095, and the amount of said commission payable to the said Robert Macdougall in terms of said arrangement is £68, 4s. 3d.

1st Div.

Macdougall v. Bremner.

Cond. 3. By assignation dated 21st June 1906, the said Robert Macdougall assigned to the pursuer William Brown Macdougall (his son), his whole right, title, and interest in and to his claim against the defender John Bremner for the said sum of £68, 4s. 3d. sterling, being the amount of his said commission.

The defender denied the contract and pleaded, inter alia: "(1) The action is irrelevant."

On 25th July 1906 the Sheriff Substitute (Fyfe) pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Having heard parties' procurators and considered the closed record, Sustains defender's first plea; dismisses the action."
